INTRODUCTION

THE present volume covers the period extending from the public reading to the Patriot troops in New York of the Declaration of Independence, on July 9th, 1776, to the celebration, in September-October, 1909, of the 300th anniversary of the arrival of Henry Hudson, and completes the Chronology, and the Iconography, with the exception of the Index volume, which will also contain the Bibliography and the Addenda, the latter including reproductions of the more important views, etc., which have come to light since the publication of the earlier volumes, and the completed Landmark Map, showing the original grants above Wall Street and their later sub-division. It is expected that this final volume will be issued early in the Autumn of 1927.

The author is keenly conscious of the many short-comings of his work, of which perhaps the most regrettable is its voluminousness. He realises, alas too late, that, without very serious loss, the material which now fills six almost unwieldy volumes might have been condensed into four volumes of only moderate thickness. The wide extent of the field covered, and his own inexperience, especially in the early stages of the work, explain, although they do not excuse, this prolixity. A modicum of consolation, to both author and reader, is to be found in the fact that this very prolixity may sometimes save the student the labour of consulting a quoted authority, or supply some helpful side-light or some hint which would have been lacking if further condensation or the more drastic elimination of seemingly unimportant details had been insisted upon.

Although many regrettable errors in the earlier volumes have been corrected, and some serious omissions supplied, the author realises that errors still exist, and fears that it will not prove possible to discover and to correct all of them in the final volume. For these, and for all other short-comings, he asks the indulgence of the reader. Doubtless many of the remaining errors could have been corrected by further and more searching proof-reading, but this would have entailed still further delay in the completion of a work that has already been extended to a point which must sorely have taxed the patience of the subscribers.

One further specific apology is due the reader:—The capitalization throughout the Chronology is ragged and often illogical. It is the result of an attempted compromise between conflicting theories, and, like most compromises, has proved unsatisfactory to all concerned.

Before accepting as final statements made in the Chronology, the reader should consult the Addenda, under corresponding dates, for possible corrections.

Perhaps the most important contribution to the present volume is the extensive series of extracts from the William Smith Papers acquired by the New York Public Library in 1915, and comprehensively considered for the first time in connection with this work. These papers contain much new information, and throw many interesting side lights on events in New York, especially during the Revolutionary Period.

The long hoped-for publication, in 1924, of the Van Rappard Documents, under the able editorship of Mr. van Laer, although an event of considerable importance, historically, has not added as much to our knowledge of the early years, just before and just after the settlement, as the titles of those documents gave reason to expect. Nevertheless, their careful examination, in connection with the sequence of events recorded in the Chronology during the years immediately preceding and following 1626, and in that year itself, should convince any open-minded student that houses had been built and farms established on Manhattan Island before the Summer of 1626. Furthermore, the “Instructions for Willem Verhulst” (Document C) show conclusively that a fort was in existence on Noten (Governor’s) Island in 1624.1

A note added at the end of the “Provisional Regulations” (Document A), which note is lacking in the copy of the “Regulations” in the Rijksarchief, discovered by Dr. Wieder in 1912, clearly establishes the fact that these articles, which were adopted by the Assembly of the Nineteen on March 28, 1624, were intended for the expedition sailing a few days later on the “Nieu Nederlandt.”2 This note reads as follows:—“The foregoing articles having been read

1 This fort, as will be shown later, presumably had been established in 1623, by the leaders of the “Mackerel” expedition, although references are found in the early records to a fort on the North River, “Even before the year 1614.”

2 Mr. van Laer is evidently right in thus interpreting the Dutch text, which at first sight seems to read “Nieu Verdriet,” which reading, adopted by Dr. Wieder in his catalogue description of the Van Rappard Documents, led the author into confusing complications in treating this period in Vol. IV.
to the Colonists going over in the ship ‘Nieu Nederlandt,’ they took the oath of allegiance this 30th day of March, anno 1624. Underneath was written: Before Df Claes Petersz and Gharrard Schaep. Was signed: D. Mostaert.” These “Provisional Regulations” also establish the fact that the colonists sailing on the “Nieu Nederlandt” were “bound to remain at the place of their destination with their families for the space of six consecutive years”—or until May, 1630. This fact, taken in connection with Kiliaen van Rensselaer’s letter presented to the directors of the West India Company on April 27, 1634, in which he speaks of the six farms on Manhattan Island as having been leased (re-leased) for the term of six years, beginning the first day of May, 1630, is in itself almost conclusive proof that these farms were originally assigned in 1624, and the inference seems clear that work upon them began shortly thereafter. Indeed, we know from Wassenaer (see Chronology under 1624) that “as soon as our people arrived there [New Netherland] they proceeded to clear and plant. Before this vessel [the “Nieu Nederlandt”] had left, the Winter harvest was far advanced.”

It will be recalled that de Rasière, in his letter to Samuel Blommaert, probably written in the Autumn of 1628, refers to these farms as having at that time been ploughed “at the most eight times”—if we accept Jameson’s translation in the Narratives of New Netherland. As two crops were sown each year, this, as pointed out in Vol. IV, would carry the first ploughing back to the Autumn of 1624, a few months after the arrival of the “Nieu Nederlandt.” However, it is only fair to state that this translation has been questioned. The original text reads: “dat t’meeste 8 mal geploucht sal zijn.” If “t’meeste” is taken to be an abbreviation of ten meeste, the translation “at the most,” given in the Narratives, is correct. Such a contraction, however, as Mr. van Laer points out, is very unusual. If het meeste is meant, the meaning would be that most of the 60 morgens had been ploughed eight times, not necessarily twice a year for four years, but perhaps more frequently over a shorter period—to improve the condition of the soil.

In addition to these specific arguments, the whole tenor of Documents A, C, and D indicates that these documents constitute the first official regulations and instructions issued under the charter of the West India Company to colonists going to the Hudson River, and de Rasière’s letter of September 23, 1626, (Document F), while tantalizingly deficient in important details, unquestionably depicts a settlement which had been established more than four months.

Although little can be added to the theories regarding the settlement advanced in Vol. IV, the author feels more strongly than ever that serious consideration must be given to the second, more detailed, and evidently carefully revised, statement of Catelina Trico, which statement he still believes can be reconciled more easily with the recorded facts than any theory yet advanced on the subject by historians. The fact that in this second statement the date of the expedition is given as 1623, whereas in the first 1623 or 1624 is given, is not really significant; evidently, the salient fact in Catelina Trico’s recollection was that the expedition started during the Winter season of 1623-24. It would not be strange if, in the long interval, she had forgotten whether it sailed before or after January first.

In the light of the new information supplied by the Van Rappard Documents, the outstanding facts and events leading up to the settlement, so far as we now know them, may be restated briefly as follows:

1609. Hudson explores the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island.

1614. The New Netherland Company is formed, granting to certain merchants of Amsterdam and Hoorn an exclusive charter to make four trading voyages during a period of three years, beginning January 1, 1615, to the region in this document for the first time designated as New Netherland.

1618, January 1. The charter of the New Netherland Company expires. The trading expeditions, however, continued while negotiations were in progress to establish a general West India Company, on the basis of plans which had been advocated by Willem Usselinx since 1592.

1621, June 3. The West India Company charter is granted, for a period of twenty-four years, giving the subscribers a monopoly of trade between Dutch ports and the coasts of North and South America, as well as the West coast of Africa. The main purpose of the Company, however, was to weaken the power of Spain, by capturing her ships and attacking her colonies.

1621, June 9. The States General forbids all private trading within the limits covered by the Company’s charter, except to those who shall send out ships before the first of July, to return with their cargoes within one year from that date. In September, however, special permits were issued to a number of traders, on the same condition—that they should return before the 1st of July, 1622. Although this condition was not strictly complied with, private traders gradually withdrew their ships from the territory of the Company.

1623, June 21. The organization of the West India Company is completed; by the Autumn of this year the capital stock amounted to over seven million guilders, of which nearly one half had been furnished by the Amsterdam Chamber.
INTRODUCTION

Toward the end of June, "The Directors of the West India Company, finding that the inhabitants of these lands [the Netherlands], by order of the Lords States, have left the coasts of the West Indies [New Netherland], in order to maintain the continuity of trade, send three ships out of the country, the 'Oranje Boom,' the 'Grypende Arent,' and the 'Liefde,' in the hope of securing the first advantages for the Company, [the organization of] which is not yet consummated." This doubtless means that the subscriptions had not yet been completed.

In marginal notes, Wassenaer states that these were, respectively, the first, second, and third, ships sent out by the West India Company. From the context it seems clear that this expedition did not visit New Netherland.

Other ships followed, and we know from Wassenaer that by November, 1623, fifteen in all had been sent out, of which, so far as we can tell, only one visited New Netherland—the "Mackerel," a yacht of 60 tons.

1623, July 16. The "Mackerel," bound for New Netherland, sails from the Texel, in company with the "Pigeon," which carries Jesse de Forest and his band of Walloons, destined for the Amazon. On September 14 they parted company, near the Madeira Islands. The "Mackerel," setting her course toward New Netherland, reached there on December 12, and was still in the Hudson River when the "Nieu Nederlandt" arrived, in May, 1624. She returned shortly thereafter, reaching Holland probably in August.

Although we have no definite information that colonists were sent on the "Mackerel," from numerous references in the Van Rappard Documents, and elsewhere in the early Dutch records, it seems probable that this yacht was a sort of official scout, and that, in addition to traders, she brought over a few colonists having a semi-official status, perhaps as official observers or prospectors for the West India Company, which would account for a remark in Kiliaen van Rensselaer's "memorial," presented, on Nov. 25, 1634, to the directors of the West India Company, in which he makes the explicit statement that "Sundry Colonists, as early as 1623, had been conveyed thither [to New Netherland] with instructions to dwell there as free persons and to secure all trade" (Van Rensselaer Bowier M.S.S., page 235), a statement which, as has been recorded in Vol. IV, appears in various forms during the second quarter of the 17th Century.

It seems also a likely supposition that the "Mackerel" on this voyage established the fort at the mouth of the South (Delaware) River, as well as that on Noten (Governor's) Island, both of which, as recorded in Vol. IV, were referred to in numerous documents of the period as having been established in this year.
The "Mackerel" is the only vessel that is known to have visited the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island during the year 1623. The next ship referred to in the surviving Dutch records as having come to these parts was the one on which Krol is said to have sailed, on January 25, 1624. De Laet, in the 1630 edition of his "Nieuwe Wereldt," makes the significant remark that "into New Netherland, and upon both of these rivers [the North and South Rivers] ... several colonies have been sent by the Directors of the Chartered West India Company from the very commencement of that Company, to wit, from the year 1623, in order to continue possession of those quarters, and to maintain the trade in Peltres."

1623, November 3. Adriaen Jorisz. Thienpont appears before a session of the Assembly of the XIX of the West India Company, and requests "permission to make ready a yacht to trade their merchandise, and bring home their people" from the Rio de Montagne (Hudson River); whereupon it was resolved that a ship be sent "to the Virginias, which shall be equipped by the Chamber of Amsterdam with the necessary cargo to continue the trade, for which purpose they may also take with them 5 or 6 families of the Colonists, in order to make a beginning of settlement there, and on that occasion bring here the goods secured in return for the aforesaid merchandise and people." It seems clear that, as a direct result of this resolution, the "Nieu Nederlandt" expedition was despatched, shortly after March 30, 1624, and in all probability Thienpont accompanied it.

1624, January 25. A note in the "Copie-Boek" of the Church Consistory of Amsterdam informs us that on this date Bastiaen Jansz. Krol (a "comforter of the sick" in the employ of the West India Company) "sailed for the West Indies," from which statement it has been assumed that he went to New Netherland; it is possible, however, that he sailed with the fleet of Admiral Willekens, and visited Manhattan Island on his return voyage. The name of the ship is not given, and no further reference to her has been found, although de Laet states that in 1624 two ships were sent to New Netherland.

Under February of this year, Wassenaer records: "a ship is being fitted out under a commission from the West India Company, and freighted with families to plant a colony among these people." The context shows that New Netherland is meant, and this is evidently a reference to the "Nieu Nederlandt" expedition.

1624, March 30, or shortly thereafter. The "Nieu Nederlandt" expedition sails for New Netherland. We are told by Wassenaer that Cornelis Jacobsz. May of Hoorn was the skipper, and that the "Nieu Nederlandt" carried "a Company of 30 families, mostly Walloons, to plant a Colony there."
INTRODUCTION

We know from Van Rappard Document A that this vessel sailed under instructions known as the “Provisional Regulations for Colonists,” which had been adopted by the Assembly of the Nineteen of the West India Company, on March 28.

Although no mention is made of any other ship taking part in this expedition, it seems quite possible that there was a second ship, perhaps the “Eendracht,” or “Unity,” and that Thienpont was its commander, in which case Catelina Trico’s second statement will be seen to coincide very closely with the known facts, and with those which are assumed in this summary, it is believed with reasonable justification. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that the “Nieu Nederlandt,” although a ship of 130 lasts (260 tons), could hardly have accommodated 30 families, in addition to their belongings and the crew.

The “Nieu Nederlandt” expedition probably reached the mouth of the Hudson about the middle of May, and we know that she found there the yacht “Mackerel.” It seems plausible that, as stated by Catelina Trico, 8 men were left “to take possession” of Manhattan Island, or perhaps they joined the garrison on Noten (Governor’s) Island, which, as we have already seen, had been established by 1623.

1624, October. Some time in this month—probably before the 28th—the “Nieu Nederlandt” reached Holland, on her return from the Hudson River.

1625, January 28. A letter bearing this date (erroneously entered under 1624 in the Chronology, Vol. IV), written by the Privy Council to the mayor of Plymouth, authorises the arrest of a Dutch ship “ryding in the haven at Plymouth called the ‘Orange Tree’ [the “Oranje Boom”] of Amsterdam, being of the burthen of one hundred and fifty tunes, or thereabouts, and bound to a place in America which is comprehended in a grant made by his Maj: upon just consideration to divers of his subjects.” The captain of the ship must exhibit his commission and the “plat which he hath,” and in the meantime a “stay of the ship” is commanded.

Wassenaer, commenting on the storms which raged in Northern Europe during January of this year, states: “the ship with the families lay at Plymouth. Getting a favourable wind, it also wished to go to sea, but was visited by the plague in such a way that already eleven persons had died and twenty more were still sick belonging to the families of the Walloons who were to be transported thither to the colony [New Netherland]. The assistant super-cargo had also been sick, but was now getting better."

Buchelius, in his notes on the East and West India Companies, under date of February, says: "It is said that some farmers were [are] to be sent to Virginia to cultivate the land in some region discovered by our countrymen."

These references are all, doubtless, to the ship on which Krol made his second voyage, which probably did not reach Manhattan Island before April.

It seems clear that Verhulst must have sailed on the "Oranje Boom," and that the "Instructions" issued to him should therefore be dated shortly before January 28, 1625. These "Instructions" provided that Verhulst should "duly distribute over the places that are already occupied the families now going over." It is in this document also that the reference to the fort on Noten Island is found.

1625, end of April. At this time, an "extraordinary shipment" was sent to New Netherland, to strengthen the "colony" there. This was the well-known expedition for which Hulst undertook the responsibility. It sailed on the ships "Macreel," "Paert," "Koe," and "Schaep," and was destined, solely, for the North River, and especially for the immediate neighbourhood of Manhattan Island. This expedition, we now know, was commanded by Gerrit Fongersz., and carried the "Further Instructions" for Wm. Verhulst and the Council in New Netherland, dated April 22, which "Instructions" contained a recommendation that, if the West side of the Hudson, near the mouth, were not found suitable for a settlement, the "hook of the Manattes, north of Noten Island," should next be considered.

We know further from Wassenaer that the cattle were "on their arrival [probably about the end of June, only a couple of months after the arrival of Verhulst on the "Oranje Boom"] first landed on Nut [Noten] Island, three miles up the river, where they remained a day or two. There being no means of pasturing them there they were shipped in sloops and boats to the Manhates, right opposite the said island. Being put out to pasture there they throve well, but afterward full twenty in all died. The opinion is, that they had eaten something bad from uncultivated soil. But they went in the middle of September to meadow grass as good and as long as could be desired."

Referring in another place to the same event, Wassenaer states: "The cattle carried thither were removed upwards to a convenient place abounding with grass and pasture." What could be more natural than to suppose that this refers to the Company's farms, some parts of which, by this time, must have been ready to receive them, for between the arrival of Verhulst on the “Oranje Boom,” probably in April or May, and the middle of September, when the cattle were “removed upwards,” the “common farmers” who accompanied him were doubtless engaged in clearing the farms assigned to the “head-farmers,”¹ and the first crop was probably sown before the end of the month.

The “head-farmers” were now evidently in full possession of their farms, the leases for which had probably been made out either before they left Holland or immediately after their arrival in April, and dated back to the preceding first of May (1624), May 1 being, then as now, the usual date for the beginning of such leases.

Between the Summer of 1625 and the Spring of 1626, when Minuit returned from Holland and took command of the settlement, Cryn Fredericksz., who probably came over on the Hulft expedition, had doubtless made considerable progress in laying out and constructing Fort Amsterdam and the streets of the little settlement. It is plain that his “instructions” (Van Rappard Document E) could only be carried out in part, as the south end of Manhattan Island, the site finally selected for the settlement, was too narrow to permit of the dwellings being placed within the confines of a large fort, and the distance between the southern portion of the Wickquasgeak trail (later Broadway) and the two rivers was insufficient to allow of the farms being laid out near the fort.

1626, May 4. Peter Minuit arrives on the “Sea-Mew” (“Meeuwken”—literally “Little Seamew”). Some time between this date and the sailing of the “Arms of Amsterdam,” on September 23, he bought Manhattan Island from the Indians.

The following additional facts complete the outline of a theory which is perhaps as reasonable as any which has been advanced. At all events, the author believes that enough evidence has now been presented to convince even the most sceptical that the Fongersz.-Hulft expedition, which sailed shortly after April 22, 1625, with the five “head-farmers” and the cattle, settled permanently on Manhattan Island; that Verhulst’s expedition, which arrived a few months earlier, brought over the “hired-farmers,” and that some of the colonists on the “Nieu Nederlandt” probably settled on Manhattan Island, or in its immediate vicinity. Furthermore, we have seen that there is good reason to believe that some “free persons,” or settlers, came over on the “Mackerel,” and established themselves on Governor’s Island.—The arguments are not conclusive, but the author believes that they are convincing.

The reference in the “Instructions for Willem Verhulst” to the possible selection of “a still more suitable place than Noten Island for the fortification and the dwelling places of the colonists and farmers” seems to show that no farms had been laid out on Manhattan Island, or even locally assigned, up to the time when the “Nieu Nederlandt” left for Holland, bearing news and letters from the infant colony—probably toward the middle of September, 1624, between which date (but after November 21) and January 28, 1625, these “Instructions” were written. Moreover, we have no record of any ship or news arriving from the Hudson River between the return of the “Nieu Nederlandt,” before November first, 1624, and the departure of the so-called “Hulft Expedition,” with the “Further Instructions,” sometime after April 22, 1625.

The argument here advanced in favour of 1624 as the date of settlement requires the assumption either that the assignment of the “six farms” took place in America, after the departure of the “Nieu Nederlandt” and before the arrival of the “Oranje Boom,” or that it took place in Holland, some time after the sailing of the “Nieu Nederlandt,” and after the “head-farmers” had been selected, possibly early in 1625, but more likely at the end of 1624. In either case, we must suppose that the leases, in order to conform with the usual practice of the time, were dated back to the preceding May 1, shortly after which date the clearing of the farms on Manhattan Island was probably begun, under the direction of May. Although at first sight this assumption may appear far-fetched and unlikely, a careful examination of the various pertinent facts and conditions shows that it is at least a reasonable one, and it is the only way in which all of the known facts can be reconciled with the very explicit statements in the records that the farms, from the beginning, were leased for periods of six years, that the first lease period expired, and the new leases were made, in May, 1630, and that therefore, obviously, the original leases were dated May 1, 1624.

The clause in the “Provisional Regulations” providing that the commander and his council should allot to the colonists the “lands to be cultivated by them” evidently does not refer to the large farms or bouweries to be leased to the “head-farmers,” but to the small garden plots to be assigned to the colonists for their individual use.

We know from Baudartius that when “a ship arrived in August,” on her return from New Netherland,1 the colonists there were daily expecting the arrangement of cattle, "by the first ships." Furthermore, it is evident that those on Noten Island must have realised that this island was not large enough to accommodate a permanent settlement of importance, and that there was not sufficient pasturage for any considerable number of cattle. Moreover, as has already been recorded, we know from van Tienhoven and others that the Company undertook the first general clearing of the land leased to the farmers. What could be more natural than that, without awaiting further orders from the West India Company, May and his council should have determined that Manhattan Island, which lay so near at hand, was the most suitable place for an important fortified settlement at the mouth of the Hudson River, and that, without further delay, they should have begun to clear land there, while awaiting the arrival of the "head-farmers" and the cattle. Apparently the work had not been completed when these arrived in the Spring, but was finished in September, when the cattle were "removed upwards." Furthermore, it is not an unreasonable assumption that, if the assignment and leases had not already been made in Holland, they were now made, and dated back to May 1, 1624.

Whereas the second expedition, under Verhulst, was destined primarily for the South River, the third seems to have been sent directly to the North River. In connection with this expedition, reference is made for the first time to the "head-farmers," which the context clearly shows were those intended to assume direction, under lease, of the Company's farms. The farmers going over with Verhulst were referred to as "common farmers," or "hired farmers;" evidently they were farm labourers.

The original "Instructions" clearly refer to the "hired-farmers and the cattle to be sent thither in the ship 'Den Orangenboom,' and the following ship [ships?]—evidently a reference to the "Paert," "Koe," "Schaep," and "Ma-creel"][". As this reference occurs in a paragraph dealing specifically with the South River, it seems clear that at the time when these "Instructions" were prepared it was the intention to establish the principal settlement there, and not on the Hudson River. Furthermore, this reference, taken in connection with the fact that neither Wassenaer nor the "Provisional Regulations" refers specifically to farmers or cattle, seems to indicate that the "Nieu Nederlandt" colonists, although they may, and probably did, include some independent farmers, were for the most part composed of artisans, traders, and industrial workers.

The publication of the Van Rappard Documents has but whetted our appetite for more information, while it has strengthened the belief that, sooner or later, other similar records will be found. As yet no thorough examination has been made of the archives of the smaller provinces which once formed part of the Assembly of the XIX, nor has a systematic search been attempted among the family papers preserved in countless private muniment chests throughout the Netherlands. Until these sources have been exhausted, we should not despair of some day drawing aside the veil which has so long obscured the events of those mysterious years which lie between the completion of the organization of the West India company in 1623 and Minuit's arrival, as governor, in 1626.

Despite this exasperating hiatus, to the reader of the Iconography one fact must stand out unchallenged:—The City of New York is to be congratulated on the fullness of the records which remain of its past. Notwithstanding many vicissitudes, and some irreparable losses, there still remains, in its public archives, and in those at Albany and elsewhere, a very considerable part of the original documents which record its history, almost from the beginning. There is perhaps no other city of equal antiquity and importance, certainly no other such American city, whose archives are so complete.

It would indeed be a source of public congratulation, as well as a peculiar gratification to the author, should his work add to the growing interest in all that pertains to the history of our city, and thereby stimulate the movement, already sponsored by many eminent historians and others, to bring about a scientific arrangement of those records in a single archives building, so designed and built, and so situated, as to render them reasonably safe from fire, theft, damage, and deterioration, and as convenient as possible to serious students.

Now that the Iconography has been virtually completed, the many difficulties and disappointments connected with the work are forgotten, and there remains to the author only satisfaction in looking back over those long years of pleasant and intimate association, in a congenial task, with successive little groups of patient and enthusiastic co-workers and correspondents, who have borne the brunt of the fray, and have made his part little more than that of counsellor and critic. To them, far more than to him, belongs whatever there is of value in the work, and he can never adequately express or repay the debt of gratitude which he owes them.

CHAPTER III
THE REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD
1763-1776-1783
1776-1783

A BRIEF summary of the principal events of the Revolution Day Period, from the destruction of the statue of George III on the night of July 9, 1776, to the evacuation of the city by the British on Nov. 25, 1783, is contained in Vol. I, Chap. III.

A British officer writes from Staten Island to a correspondent in London: "Our army consisted of six thousand one hundred and fifty-five effective, on our embarkation at Halifax; they are now all safe landed here, and our head-quarters are at your late old friend Will Hick's mansion-house.

"The accounts given of the numbers of the whole army upon the island of New York, vary much; some pronounce them 12, 14, and others from 24, to 30,000 men; but we well know their numbers were very much exaggerated when entrenched before Boston.

"Mr. Washington's head-quarters were lately removed to the City Hall, upon the discovery of a design to seize and deliver his person to Governor Tryon; for which a drummer, who had deserted from the Royal Welch Fusiliers, was apprehended and hanged. A pardon and rewards were repeatedly offered to this young lad (not exceeding twelve years of age) if he would impeach his associates in the enterprise; but he, with a glorious disdain, continued inflexibly secret, and died resolute. The Provincial Convention of New-York have tried and sentenced the Mayor of their city to death, for holding a correspondence with Governor Tryon; and who should this prove to be but the facetious David Matthews. . . . should the sentence be executed, many shocking events of this kind will follow. On our landing we found Colonel De Lancey, Mr. Apthorpe, Major Bayard, Mr. Skinner of Jersey, Mr. Kempe of New York, Mr. Barrow, Paymaster of his Majesty's forces, Mr. Moore, &c. &c. The former of these gentlemen had been employed, at an advanced age, and in infirm state of health, upon the most laborious work in the Provincials entrenchments; he proves from his intimate acquaintance with the disposition of the inhabitants, and his accurate knowledge of the country, a valuable acquisition to our excellent General. . . ."

"We expect orders to land the army beyond King's Bridge, and make our approach to the city on the rear of the island; in which case Mr. Washington must present his front to us in a fair field, or submit to an alternative, which, in its event, will put an end to this hasty burly about Independence."—Kentish Gen. (Canterbury), Ag 17-21, 1779.

Since June 29 (p. 67), when alarm was created on account of the arrival at Sandy Hook of the fleet from Halifax, having on board the British army under Sir William Howe, "almost all business in town is knocked up." The fleet "now lays very quiet at the watering Place [for Robertson's view, see Ji 12], waiting for a reinforcement from England [which arrived on Aug. 12]. When they say they shall little regard our Batteries. We as little regard them, Our men are in high Sperrits and Ready to meet them at any Hour the town swarms with people, I doubt not But our army Consists of at least twenty thousand men, & the Country about us vary Willing to lend us there assistance, . . ."—From letter of Peter Elting to Capt. Richard Varick, in N. Y. City during the Am. Rev., 99-100.

Ensign Caleb Clap records in his diary: "several French Gentlemen have been at the Generals, and have been to the Congress, and are now come back to the General [see Je 20] It is Reported that we may depend on their Assistance by sea. . . ."

"their is now several small ones [vessels], that Cruze round here a Nights to watch the movements of the Enemy and see that the Tories do not go aboard. . . . Scarcely a day but what some desert from the Enemy. . . ."—Hist. Mag. 3d ser., III: 137.

Expressing doubt as to the French alliance with England's rebellious colonies (see F 6, 1778), Smith writes: "I dread France—She will be guided only by motives of Interest—No Promises will bind her—She will perceive it more advantageous to her Ambition to ferment animosities, than hastily to plunge into a War—She will
The following information, regarding certain fragments of the statue, was published in 1861: "A portion of the statue was taken to Litchfield, Conn., as a place of safety. On its arrival there, a shed was erected in an apple orchard, where Gov. Wolcott chanced a part of it up with a wood axe, and the girls had a frolic in running the bullets and making them into cartridges. A piece of the statue, forming the saddle cloth and cencerle, was carried to Norwalk, about four miles up the Sound. When Gov. Tryon was on his marauding expedition through Conn., it was moved with the military stores to Fort Franklin, then the seat of the coast party, which was called Raymond Corner. On the enemy approaching that place, the inhabitants threw this fragment of the statue together with the military stores into a swamp in the woods. There the lead lay until the winter of 1832-33, when it was discovered by a boy named Comstock, who was crossing the frozen swamp, at other times impassable, and recognized by a Mrs. Belden, a Revolutionary pensioner, residing in Wilton, and who had himself borne a conspicuous part in its destruction, as being a portion of the Equestrian statue of George III, erected in New York. The relic was in the possession of the uncle of the finder until the year 1844, when it was purchased by a gentleman of New York, who subsequently disposed of it to the late Thomas Riley, Esq., then proprietor of the Fifth Ward Hotel (see Mr. Cam. Coun., 1864, pp. 958, 621), where it may still be seen. There are still many tracings of the original gilding, and the fringe of the saddle cloth is distinctly perceptible. A large iron bullet mould, capable of casting twelve bullets at a time, and which was used in casting some of the lead of the King's statue into bullets, may be seen among the collections of the New York Historical Society."—Jour. of Solomon Nath, ed. by Bushnell (1861), 50-51, cit. Woodruff's Hist. of Litchfield, Conn., 42, and N. Y. H. S. Proc. (1844), 168.

Four pieces of the statue of George III, consisting of the tail of the horse and trappings, were plowed up on the farm of Peter S. Colby, at Wilton, Conn., in April, 1871, and were purchased by the N. Y. Hist. Soc. on June 4, 1876.—See MS. of a lecture, entitled "Marvin's Assay of Revolutionary E. P. '76-'77," delivered Nov. 1, 1910, by the librarian of the society, Robert H. Kyle; N. Y. H. S. Quart. Bull., Jl, 1920, p. 54.

The head of the statue was otherwise disposed of. Capt. John Montresor, in an account of his services, made the following note (without date) in his journal: "My hearing that the Rebels had cut the King's head off the Equestrian Statue (in the Centre of the Ellips, near the Fort) at New York, which represented George the third in the figure of Marcus Aurelius, and that they had cut the nose off, clipt the laurels that were wreathed round his head, and drove a musket Bullet part of the way through his Head, and otherwise disfigured it, and that it was carried to Moore's tavern, adjoining Fort Washington, on New York Island, in order to be fixed on a Spike on the Truck of that Flagstaff as soon as it could be got ready, I immediately sent Cory to the Rebel Camp in the beginning of September, 1776, to Cox, who kept the Tavern at King's Bridge, to steal it from thence, and to bury it, which was effected, and was dug up on our arrival, and I rewarded the men, and sent the head by the Lady Globe to Lord Townshend, in order to convince them at home of the Infamous Damage to the Statue, and the Enmity of this Restricted Country."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1881), 123-24. That the head reached its destination in England we know from The Diary and Letters of... Thomas Hutchinson, compiled by Peter O. Hutchinson (1886), II: 167. Hutchinson entered in his diary under date of Nov. 24, 1777: "Lady Townshend asked me if I had a mind to see an instance of American loyalty? and going to the Washington has taken up his Summer Quarters at your house [at Mr. Mortier's] on Richmond Hill; his tents & headquarters is General Robertson's, on the top of which they display the Continental Colours. — "Battle of Harlem H'ts," 219, citing the Haldimand MSS., Brit. Museum.

An officer under Gen. Howe writes from Staten Island to a correspondent in London: "According to the latest and best Accounts the Provincial Army is not so numerous as we have been in other places: the troops of the Battery as they called 'Brenon Island' is fortified with only a Parcel of unwidely Cannon from Ticonderoga, which are chiefly unfit for Service. Our only Fear is, that the Rebels will not choose to hazard a general Action, and our Suspicion on this Head is stronger, as we are told by Deserters, that they have Intrenchments, Ambuscades, Mines, and Forts, for a considerable Way into the Country. If this is really the Case, and they are determined to act upon the Defensive only, and to fire their Cities and Habitations upon the Sea- Coast, when we are upon the Point of Possessing them, Our Work will never be done; our Lives, on the contrary, will be in perpetual Danger from the innumerable Snares that are laid for them." — St. James's Chron. (London), Ag 20-23, 1776.

In Purvance of the Declaration for Independence, a general Goal Delivery, with respect to Debtors, took place here on Wednesday" (July 10).—N. Y. Merc. Jul 15, 1776. "One of the first fruits of Independence, the oppressed are set free."—N. Y. Packet, Jul 11, 1776.

1777

Capt. Robertson and Capt. Montresor go on "recommending" persons in a small boat, "supported by two Flat Boats with 20 Soldiers in each, besides the rowers, of the 43d." Robertson writes of this: "we went a little above Kennedys or Bedlow's Island between it & Red Hook where we could discover the Rebel Works pretty distinctly on Govr Island Paulus & Red Hooks — They fired two cannon at us over our heads one from Govr Island & the other from Red Hook also some Musquetry from Beddows Island."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Montresor erroneously records this expedition under August—Montresor's Jour., 121. See Jul 12.

The publication of the Declaration of Independence in the N. Y. Packet, on this day, is its first appearance in a New York newspaper. There is a copy in the N. Y. P. L. For other publications of it, see Jul 4.

The first draft of the "Articles of Confederation and perpetual union," drawn by John Dickinson, is presented to congress for consideration.—Jour. Cont. Cong. (Ford ed.), V: 546–54. The articles were adopted in amended form on Nov. 15, 1777 (q. v.).

1778

An officer under Gen. Howe writes from Staten Island: "Such strong intrenchments as the rebels have thrown up at New York were never before seen in an enemy's country; according to the best intimation, they extend miles together, are a considerable height, and have near 30,000 men to defend them. . . ."—Upcott Coll., IV: 375.

The "Phaenix," the "Rose," and three tenders leave the Watering Place at Staten Island "to pass New York & go up Hudson's River." As soon as they set sail, 6 or 8 Alarm Guns were fired at N. York.—The Ships proceeded w the greatest order & never retourn'd a Shot until they got between Paulus's Hook & the Town—at 1/2 past four they were pass'd every Battery—near the Town. . . . About an hour after We saw the Ships firing at Another Battery about 6 or 8 miles up the River on the E. side.—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Kemble's record reads: "About half after 1 in the Afternoon His Majesty's Ship Phaenix, Commanded by Capt. Parker, and the Rose, by Capt. Wallace, with the Tryal Schooner and two Tenders, got under sail to pass the Town of New York; in about forty minutes they got a breast of Paulus's Hook, before which time they did not fire a Shot, tho' they received the whole of the Rebels fire from Red Hook, Governors Island, the Battery, and from some Guns in the Town. When they opened Paulus's Hook they began to fire on both sides, on which the Rebels fled from their Works at Paulus's Hook, but returned at intervals to their Guns and fired them; at half past four the Ships were past all the Batteries, and as far as we could judge received little hurt.

At 7 o'Clock Lord Howe came to Anchor at the landing Place; was greeted by the Admiral and the Fleet, & after the General went on board to see his Brother. Number of Shot fired by the Rebels, 196.—Kemble's Jour. in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1883), 80.
A newspaper report says that the news having reached New York, that Lord Howe had arrived at Sandy Hook with a large fleet from England, "The army soon took the alarm, and in a few minutes every man was at his station, well provided with all necessaries for a vigorous defence, but as soon as the ships came near Bedlow's Island, they inclined towards the Jersey shore, to avoid our batteries that then began to play upon them from every quarter on both sides of the river, and notwithstanding they must have received considerable damage, they stood their course up Hudson's river firing several broadsides as they went along. . . . A strong southerly Wind, and the Tide of Flood facilitated the Ships getting above the Batteries near the Town, but we hear they were roughly handled about 12 Miles up the River, from whence they have not yet attempted to return, but we hear lay at Tarry-Town, about 30 Miles up the River, on Saturday Evening.

"Several Shot went thro' different Houses in the Town; two into the Yard of Mr. Veitch near Bowlis Hook; three into Capt. Clarke's House at Greenwich; one of which went thro' the Front and lodged in a Brick Wall at the Head of Miss Clarke's Bed, in her Chamber, a Second went thro' the House, and the Third destroyed several Trees before the Door, and took its Course into the Woods.

"A Ball also struck the House of Mr. Daniel Phoenix and from that took its Course to the new Dwelling of Mr. Christopher Smith, in the Opposite Side of the Street."—N. Y. Merc., 15 1776.

Robert N. Sayler states that during the firing "six men were killed; either some or all by ill-managing the cannon; though it is said that a couple were killed by the ship's firing. . . . The six were put this evening into one grave on the Bowling Green. The smoke of the firing drew over like a cloud; and the air was filled with the smell of the powder. This affair caused a great fright in the city. Women, and children, and some with their bundles came from the lower forts, and walked to the Bowery, which was lined with people. . . . Not long after this affair was over, the fleet below fired a Salute, Admiral Howe coming in from England."—New York, Campaign of 1776, part 2, 110-11. This is the only record found of the use of the Bowling Green for a burial place.

Solomon Dwayne, M. D., writing on July 15 from the general hospital to his sister, also stated: "... we had six fine fellows killed & 4 or 5 wounded at our Grand Battery, thro' mere Carelessness, or Ignorance. For, neglecting to swab ye Cannon at all, or doing it improperly, the cartridges took fire, and ye fatal Accidents ensued."

"The Wounded were brought to ye Hospital. . . One Ball came into ye Hospital Yard, struck ye ground at a little Distance from us, and bounded thro' ye board fence. I believe it was a 12 pound shott I think our situation as much exposed, as any in the City."—Hist. Mag., 2d ser., I: 28-29.

Smith writes of "An Alarm after I was got to Bed, with an account that two ships had passed the Forts below & anchored in the Bay 12 Miles below us—The men ordered to guard the River & the Watchman of Mr. Veitch's Neck (New York) a Detachment of Colo Hay's Regiment fired upon a Barge in her Approach to the Shore. I suspect they are sent up to receive Fugitives and Provisions, but the Vigilance & Heat of the Inhabitants will probably disappoint them unless they are strongly handed—The Committee resolve to write as I hear to General Washington for Aid. If he orders up Whale Boats to follow the Barges they can do little."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), V.

Robert N. Sayler says that while the men-of-war and the tenders were proceeding up the Hudson River, "Lt Howe in the Eagle—came up the Bay & cast Anchor at 7 o'clock after being saluted by Adm Shuldsman & the rest of the Ships—from this time forward I give the commencement of the dates."—Robert N. Sayler's Journal.

This date is found on two sepia views (18½ in. x 11¼ in.) drawn by Archibald Robertson, an engineer in the 47th Regiment of Foot. One is entitled "Taken from the heights above the watering place on Staten Island."—"View of the Bay & Town of New York w/ the Phoenix & Rose men of war passing this Battery & going up Hudson's River 12th July 1776," and the other "View of the Narrows between Long Island & Staten Island w/ our Fleet at Anchor & [Admiral] Lord Howe coming in from England—taken from the height above the Water Place Staten Island 12th July 1776."

These views are numbered 33 and 34 in a series of 54 American drawings, made by Robertson during the Revolutionary War, most of which are contained in a bound portfolio recently procured for the N. Y. Pub. Library from three descendants of Archibald Robertson in England, together with a series of journals covering the years 1762 and 1775-80, and some loose papers and sketches. This portfolio is an oblong book of fine drawing-paper, in marbled paper covers; the outside of the front cover bears the written name "Captain Robertson, Engineer;" the inside of the same cover, in the same handwriting, bears the inscription: "In case of any accident happening to me, I desire this book of sketches may be sealed up, and sent home by a safe conveyance, to Mr. Henry Robertson, No. 18 George Street, York Buildings, London. Arch. Robertson." See also J. 10, 1777.

The earliest dated view (1762) shows Moro Castle, Havana; those in the later series show Boston and its vicinity, beginning Jan. 4, 1776; Halifax and other points in Nova Scotia, the earliest being dated April 25, 1776; the English fleet en route from Halifax to New York, comprising seven marine views, dated from June 11 to 26, 1776; views of New York harbour, which are mentioned in the Chronology under the following dates: July 12, Sept. 8 and 9, Oct. 8, 1776; July 2, Aug. 22, Oct. 10, 1777; and Aug. 17, 1778. Still later views were made in Philadelphia. These drawings constitute probably the most important collection of American Revolutionary War views in existence. See also Mr 5, 1776; Ag 6, 1778; Ap 11, 1779.

This Archibald Robertson must not be confused with the painter of the same name, who came to America on Oct. 2, 1791 (p. 9)." 1776 Washington advises the secret committee of the convention of July 13 the state of New York that tory prisoners in the gend of New York should be removed. This committee was appointed expressly with reference to tories, or "disaffected persons." It was now sitting at New York, although the convention was at White Plains.—"Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 245-46; see also p. 274.

"The New York committee of safety resolves that "the members of the state shall be transmitted to the several Committees in the said State of New York, whom it might consider it necessary to employ in any Military concern, that no Reports or Papers of material concern be transmitted to the said Committees."

"Again in this City ought not he called out on any Military duty which the common Militia of this City and County are subject to." The captains of the fire companies are to fill the vacancies of firemen who "are entered in the Continental service, or have removed out of town; and that they pay strict attention to the state of the Engine and publick buckets."—Am. "In his journal on this day, Solomon Nash refers to being "Employ'd at the Laberry."—Jour. of Solomon Nash, ed. by Bushnell (N. Y., 1861), 24. On May 15 he had mentioned "piling up Shot to the Labetry."—Ibid., 14. Again, on Sept. 19, he said: "Being not well Left the Laboratory and Joined our Company."—Ibid., 34. See also his entry of Dec. 4—Ibid., 42. This place, hitherto unnoticed by historical writers, is referred to in the diary of James Fitch (see O 28) as being near the liberty-pole.

"This day A Flag of truce was sent to N. York containing an act of oblivion—but was not received because it was adrest'd to George Washington Esq & ca & a & that they only knew Gen Washington.—A Copy of the same was sent to Amboy & Received for the Congress."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.). See also Kemble's Jour., 67.

Referring to the same event, Washington's aide, Col. Webb, records in his journal: "A Flag of Truce from the fleet appeared, on which CoP Reed and myself, went down to meet it, about half way between Governors and Staten Islands. Lieutenant Brown, of the Eagle, offered a Letter from Lord Howe, directed George Washington, Esq', which no ace of its direction, we refused to Receive, and Parted with the usual Compliments."—Webb's Correspondence, I : 155 ; cf Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), V, under date of Jl 27.

The newspaper account of this important transaction is as follows: "... in the Afternoon of the 14th a Barge from the Fleet, appeared in the Bay with a White Flag, which was met by the General's Barge with several Gentlemen of the Army on board. The Flag was sent by Lord Howe, with a Letter to his Excellency General Washington. But as the Letter was improperly directed it was not received though much solicited by the Officer, who, we hear, said it contained nothing of a hostile Nature,—that Lord Howe came over in possession of unlimited Power, and was much concerned he had not arrived a few days sooner, which would have effectually prevented a Declamation, &c. &c..."—N. Y. Merc., Jl 22, 1776. See Jl 16 and 17.

Lord Howe and Gen. Howe issue, from Staten Island, a declaration reciting that they have been appointed "his Majesty's Commissioner and Commissioners, for granting his free and general pardons to all those, who, in the Tumult and Disorder of the Times, may have deviated from their just Allegiance, and who are willing, by a speedy Return to their Duty, to reap the Benefits of the Royal Favor;" that "due Consideration shall be had to the meritorious Services of all Persons, who shall aid and assist in restoring the publick Tranquillity;" and that "Pardons shall be granted, dutiful Representations received, and every suitable Encouragement given, for promoting such Measures as shall be conducive to the Establishment of the late Government, and Publick Peace."—N. Y. Merc., S 30, 1776.

Kemble says: "A Flag of Truce this day from the Rebels; one from Capt. Letters from Lord General Howe, but required the superscription, not being so honorable as they thought it ought to be. The Guard Sloop lying in the harbour, a fine Vessel, mounting fourteen Carriage Guns. The Rebels have this day brought two Guns, six pounders, and fixed them in the bank directly opposite Brigadier Agnew's Quarters on Staten Island."

A second flag of truce comes from the British fleet and is met "as before" (see Jl 14), but when a letter is offered, it is rejected "for the same Reason as the Former."—N. Y. Merc., Jl 22, 1776. See Jl 19.

The following extract from the minutes of the committee of safety, addressed "To the Inhabitants of the City and Colony of New York," is published: "Whereas the Convention of the State of New York did, on the 9th instant, unanimously resolve, that a Declaration of the Independence of the United States of America shall be transmitted to the several Committees in the said State of New York, with orders that it should be by them published with all convenient speed in their several districts," it is therefore resolved and ordered "That at twelve o'clock, on Thursday, at the City-Hall, in this city, the aforesaid Declaration be published; and where and where it is hoped every true friend to the rights and liberties of the Country will not fail to attend."—Am. Arch., I: 374.

Garret Abel, a member of the provincial congress, writes from White Plains to his wife: "I shall try next week to get permission to come and see you, as the consideration of forming a new government is postponed to the first of next month on account of the multiplicity of other necessary business which has come before the house since they have been here. We have only five New York members here at present, which is the exact number required to represent the city and county in Congress."—Whitemore, The Abel and Allied Families, 16.

Congress resolves: "That General Washington, in refusing to 17 receive a letter said to be sent from Lord Howe, addressed to George Washington, Esquire (see [Jl 14]), acted with a dignity becoming his station; and therefore this Congress do highly approve the same, and do direct that no letter of or from the Congress whatever, from the enemy, by the commander in Chief, or other the Commanders of the American army, but such as shall be directed to them in the characters they respectively sustain."—N. Sixteen or seventeen ships, part of the British fleet at Staten Island, "got under way and stood through the Narrows." Their destination was unknown to the patriots at New York.—Penn. Jour., Jl 24, 1776.

The "Declaration of Independency of the United States of America" is "published at the Court-House [the city hall on Wall St.]; where a Number of People, true Friends to the Rights and Liberties of this Country, attended, and signified their Approbation to it by loud Acclamations. After which the Coat of Arms of his Majesty George III. was tore to Pieces and burnt in the Presence of the Spectators."—N. Y. Merc., Jl 22, 1776. The American flag was hoisted immediately, and "it was proposed that the Bodies of Church stoves, have the Honour of taking down their coat of Arms in their Respective Churches themselves, and if not the People are allowed to proceed in the like manner as this day hér."—From "The Diary of Ensign Caleb Clap," in Hist. Mag., 3d ser., III: 248.

Rev. Charles Inglis, in his account of the "State of the Anglo-American Church," written on Oct. 31, 1776, states that, not only was the equestrian statue of the king pulled down, but that all the king's arms, even those on the signs of taverns, were destroyed. The committee of safety sent Inglis a message "to have the king's arms taken down in the church (Trinity), or else the mob would do it, and might deface and injure the churches." He complied. He said, further, that he found his vestry "unanimous for shutting up the Churches," choosing rather "to submit to that temporary inconvenience, than, by omitting the prayers for the king, give that mark of disaffection to their sovereign. To have prayed for him had been rather to the last degree—the inevitable consequence had been a demolition of the churches, and the destruction of all who frequented them. The whole rebel force was collected here, and the violent partizans from all parts of the continent... Things being thus situated, I shut up the churches. Even this was attended with great hazard for it was declaring, in the strongest manner, our disaffection and independence and that under the eyes of Washington and his army."—Doc. Hist. N. Y. (40 ed.), III: 642.

The newspaper report states: "Saturday Forenoon our people discovered a fourth Flag of Truce, whereupon the Mechanics Barge was sent to meet it, and conducted the Officer (said to be Adjutant General of the Forces under the Command of Lord Howe) to the Dwelling of Colonel Knox, in this City, where his Excellency General Washington, attended by his Body Guards, waited his Arrival, which was a little past one o'clock: The Interview was short, & the Particulars of it are not at all well known; . . . at parting much Courtesy was seen to pass between the Gentlemen who bore the Flag, and those of the Continental Forces who had the Honor to be present."—N. Y. Merc. II, 22, where it is stated that Col. Patterson was "received with great Pomp by a Guard, Conducted to Capt. Kennedy's House, where he saw a good Court, Gentlemen well dressed, &c."

What transpired in the interview was made public by order of that Official, and the Officer, as stated by the Col. Patterson addressed General Washington by the title of Excellency, Col. Patterson entered upon the business by saying, that Gen. Howe much regretted the difficulties which had arisen respecting the address of the letters to General Washington [see Jl 14, and 16] . . . that Lord Howe and Gen. Howe did not mean to derogate from the respect or rank of General Washington; that they held his person and character in the highest esteem; that the directions of Gen. Howe and Col. Knox were to be directly followed. He then produced a letter which he did not directly offer to General Washington, but observed that it was the same letter which had been sent, and laid it on the table, with a superscription to George Washington, &c. &c. &c. The General declined the letter, and said, that a letter directed to a person in a public character, should have some description or indication of it, otherwise it would appear a mere private letter; that it was true the &c. &c. &c. implicated every thing, and they also implied any thing. . . . that he should absolutely decline any letter directed to him as a private person, when it related to his public station. Col. Patterson then said . . . that he would endeavour as well as he could, to recollect General Howe's sentiments on the letter and resolve of Congress, sent him a few days before, respecting the treatment of our prisoners in Canada. 'That the affairs of Canada were in another department, not subject to the control of General Howe, but that he and Lord Howe utterly disapproved of every infringement on the rights of humanity' . . . and that he (Gen. Washington) was sensible that cruelty was not the characteristic of the British nation. . . . Gen. Washington then mentioned the case of Col. Allen, and the officers who had been confined in Boston gail.
As to the first, Col. Patterson answered that Gen. Howe had no knowledge of it but by information from Gen. Washington. . . . that as to the other prisoners at Boston, when ever the state of the army at Boston admitted it, they were treated with humanity and even indulgence . . . Col. Patterson then proceeded to say, that the goodness and benevolence of the Kings had induced him to appoint Lord Howe and Gen. Howe his Commissioners to accommodate this unhappy dispute, that they had great powers, and would derive the greatest pleasure from effecting an accommodation and that he (Col. Patterson) wished to have this visit considtered as making the first advances to this desirable object. Gen.
July Washington replied, that he was not vested with any powers on this subject, by those from whom he derived his authority and power.
But from what had appeared or transpired on this head, Lord Howe, and Gen. Howe were only to grant pardons; that those who had committed no fault wanted no pardon, that we were only defending what we deemed our indisputable right. Col. Patterson said that would open a very wide field for argument. He then expressed his apprehension that an adherence to forms was likely to obstruct business of the greatest importance.

"Col. Patterson behaved with the greatest attention and politeness during the whole business, expressing strong acknowledgements that the usual ceremony of blinding his eyes had been dispensed with.

the safety of New York during this period. They were published in

This summer, the mansion of James de Lancey, in the Bowery Division of the Out Ward (see L. M. R. K., III: 949), is said to have been occupied as a hospital for the American troops. Subsequently, during the war, the British troops occupied it for the same purpose.—Jones, Hist. of N. Y. City during the Rev. War, II: 544. No corroboration of this statement has been found.

Aug. 16 While the English fleet lay above the Narrows, north of Staten Island, a vessel, East-Point, attempted to destroy the ships of war by attacking them with a submarine machine, which had been invented and constructed by David Bushnell, a native of Saybrook. Bushnell's device was the first of its kind. The attempts to operate it against hostile ships failed, however, both at that point and later off Bloomingdale in the New River.

Charles Griswold obtained from Lee, some years later, when the latter was a resident of Lyme, Conn., a description of the submarine torpedo and of the attack, and sent it to Prof. Benjamin Silliman, of Yale College, Feb. 21, 1820, under the title "Submarine Navigation." This was published by Silliman in a magazine which he conducted, The Am. Jour. of Science, and Arts (Nov., 1820), I: 94. In view of the interesting fact that this American mechanical ingenuity at this early date, it appears fitting to reprint in full from this source Griswold's detailed description of the Bushnell machine, which was the unsuccessful pioneer in this mode of warfare. The account is as follows:

The idea of submarine warfare had ever occurred to any one, before the epoch of Bushnell's invention, yet it may be safely stated, that no ideas but his own ever came to any practical results. To him, I believe, the whole merit of this invention is unanimously agreed to belong.

"... all the information contained in the following pages, has been received from the only person in existence possessed of that information, and who was the very same that first embarked in this novel and perilous navigation.

"Mr. Ezra Lee, first a sergeant and afterwards an ensign in the revolutionary army, a respectable, worthy, and elderly citizen of this town, is the person to whom I have alluded; to him was committed the first essay for destroying a hostile ship by submarine explosion, and upon his statements an implicit reliance may be placed.

"Considering Bushnell's machine as the first of its kind, I think it will be pronounced to be remarkably complete throughout in its construction, and that such an invention furnishes evidence of those resources and creative powers which must rank him as a mechanical genius of the first order.

"Bushnell's machine was composed of several pieces of large oak timber, scooped out and fitted together, and its shape my informer compares to that of a round clam. It was bound around thoroughly with iron bands, the seams were corked, and the whole was smeared with tar, so as to prevent the possibility of the admission of water to the inside.

"It was of a capacity to contain one engineer, who might stand or sit, and enjoy sufficient elbow room for its proper management.

"The top or head was made of a metallic composition, exactly suited to the body, so as to be water-tight; this opened upon hinges, and formed the entrance to the machine. Six small pieces of thick glass were inserted in this head, for the admission of light; on a clear day and clear sea-water, says my informer, he could see to read at the depth of three fathoms. To keep it upright and properly balanced, seven hundred pounds of lead were fastened to the bottom, two hundred pounds of which were so contrived as to be discharged at any moment, to increase the buoyancy of the machine.

"But to enable the navigator when under water, to rise or sink at pleasure, there were two forcing pumps, by which water could be pressed out at the bottom; and also a spring, by applying the foot to which, a passage was formed for the admission of water. If the pumps should get deranged, then resort was had to letting off the lead ballast from the bottom.

"The navigator steered by a rudder, the tiller of which passed through the back of the machine at a water joint, and in one side was fixed a small pocket compass, with two pieces of shining wood, (sometimes called foxfire,) crossed upon its north point, and a single piece upon the last point. In the night, when no light entered through the head, this compass thus lighted, was all that served to guide the helmsman in his course.

"The ingenious inventor also provided a method for determining the depth of water at which the machine might at any time be. This was achieved by means of a glass tube, twelve inches in length, and about four in diameter, which was also attached to the side of the machine; this tube enclosed a piece of cork, that rose with the descent of the machine, and fell with its ascent, and one inch rise of the cork denoted a depth of about one fathom. The principle upon which such a result was produced, and also the mechanical contrivance of this tube, entirely escaped the observation of Mr. Lee, amidst the hurry and constant anxiety attendant upon such perilous navigation.

"But not the least ingenious part of this curious machine, was that by which the horizontal motion was communicated to it. This object was effected by means of two ears or paddles, formed precisely like the arms of a wind-mill, which revolved perpendicularly upon an axle-tree that projected in front; this axle-tree passed into the machine at a water joint, and was furnished with a crank, by which it was turned: the navigator being seated inside, with one hand laboured at the crank, and with the other steered with the tiller.

"The effect of paddles so constructed, and turned in the manner stated, by propelling or rather drawing a body after them under water, will readily occur to any one without explanation.

"These paddles were but twelve inches long, and about four wide. Two smaller paddles of the same description, also projected near the head, provided with a crank inside, by which the ascent of the machine could be assisted.

"The vigorous turning of the crank, says my informer, the machine could be propelled at the rate of about three miles an hour in still water. When beyond the reach of danger, or observation of an enemy, the machine was suffered to float with its head just rising from the water's surface, and while in this situation, air was constantly admitted through three small orifices in the head, which were closed when a descent was commenced.

"The efficient part of this machine of devastation, its magazine, remains to be spoken of. This was separate and distinct from the machine. It was shaped like an egg, and like the machine itself, was composed of solid pieces of oak scooped out, and in the same manner fitted together, and secured by iron bands, &c. One hundred and three pounds, a clock, a gunpowder, a clock and a gunlock, provided for, a good flint that would not miss fire, were the apparatus which it enclosed. This machine was attached to the back of the machine, a little above the rudder, by means of a screw, one end of which passed quite into the magazine, and there operated as a stop upon the movements of the clock, whilst its other end entered the machine. This clock could be withdrawn from the magazine, by which the latter was immediately detached, and the clock commenced going. The clock was set for running twenty or thirty minutes, at the end of which time, the lock struck, and fired the powder, and in the mean time the adventurer effectuated his escape.

"But the most difficult point of all to be gained, was to fasten this magazine to the bottom of the ship. Here a difficulty arose, which, and which alone, will appear in the ensuing narrative, defeated the successful operations of this warlike apparatus.

"Mr. Bushnell's contrivance was this—A very sharp iron screw was made to pass out from the top of the machine, communicating inside by a water joint; it was provided with a crank at its lower end, by which the engineer was to force it into the ship's bottom:
this screw was next to be disengaged from the machine, and left adhering to the ship's bottom. A line leading from this screw to the magazine, kept the latter in its destined position for blowing up the vessel."

Mr. Griswold then describes "the first attempt that was made to destroy a ship of war, all the facts of which," he repeats, he "received from the bold adventurer himself."

"It was in the month of August, 1776, when Admiral Howe lay with a formidable British fleet in New York bay, a little above the Narrows, and a numerous British force upon Staten Island, commanded by General Howe, threatened annihilation to the troops under Washington, that Mr. Bushnell requested General Parsons of the American army, to furnish him with two or three men to learn the navigation of his new machine, with a view of destroying some of the enemy's shipping.

"Gen. Parsons immediately sent for Lee, then a sergeant and two others, who had offered their services to go on board of a fire ship; and on Bushnell's request being made known to them, they enlisted themselves under him for this novel piece of service. The party went up into Long Island Sound with the machine, and made various experiments with it in the different harbors along shore, and after having become pretty thoroughly acquainted with the mode of acting it, they returned to the Sound; but from the their absence, the enemy had got possession of Long Island and Governor's Island. They therefore had the machine conveyed by land across from New-Rochelle to the Hudson river, and afterwards arrived with it at New-York.

"The British fleet now lay to the north of Staten Island with a large number of vessels, and were the objects against which this new mode of warfare was destined to act; the first serene night was fixed upon for the execution of this perilous enterprise, and sergeant Lee was to be the engineer. After the lapse of a few days, a favorable night arrived, and at 11 o'clock, a party embarked in two or three whale boats, with Bushnell's machine in tow. They rowed down as near the fleet as they dared, when sergeant Lee entered the machine, was cast off, and the boats returned.

"Lee now found the ebb tide rather too strong, and before he was aware, had drifted him down past the men of war; he however immediately got the machine about, and by hard labour at the crank for the space of five glasses by the ship's bells, or two and a half hours, he arrived under the stern of one of the ships at about slack water. Day was now dawned, and by the light of the moon he could see the people on board, and heard their conversation. This was the moment for dividing; he accordingly closed upward ahead, let in water, and descended under the ship's bottom.

"He now applied the screw, and did all in his power to make it enter, but owing probably in part to the ship's copper, and the want of an adequate pressure, to enable the screw to get a hold upon the bottom, his attempts all failed; at each essay the machine rebounded from the bottom, not having sufficient power to resist the impulse thus given to it. [Footnote: It yet remains a problem (1820), whether the difficulty here spoken of will ever be fully obviated. Mr. Fulton's torpedoes were never fairly brought to the test of experiment, though he and his friends entertained perfect confidence that they would not be found defective in any of their operations.]

"He next paddled along to a different part of her bottom, but in this maneuver he made a deviation, and instantly arose to the water's surface on the east side of the ship, exposed to the increasing light of the morning, and in imminent hazard of being discovered.
He immediately made another descent, with a view of making one more trial, but the fast approach of day, which would expose him to the enemy's boats, and render his escape difficult, if not impos-see, determined him, and he concluded that the best generalship would be to commence an immediate retreat.

"He now had before him a distance of more than four miles to traverse, but the tide was favourable. At Governor's Island great danger awaited him, for his compass having got out of order, he was under the necessity of looking out of the top of the machine very frequently to ascertain his course, and at best made a very irregular zigzag track.

"The soldiers at Governor's Island espied the machine, and curiosity drew several hundreds upon the parapet to watch its motions.
At last a party came down to the beach, shovelled off a barge, and rowed towards it. At that moment sergeant Lee thought he saw his certain destruction, and as a last act of defence, let go the magazine, expecting that they would seize that likewise, and thus all would be blest to atoms together.

"Providence however otherwise directed it: the enemy, after approaching within fifty or sixty yards of the machine, and seeing the magazine detached, began to suspect a yankee trick, took alarm and returned to the island.

"Approaching the city, he soon made a signal, the boats came to him and brought him safe and sound to the shore. The magazine in the mean time had drifted past Governor's Island into the East river, where it exploded with tremendous violence, throwing large columns of water and pieces of wood that composed it high into the air. Gen. Putnam, with many other officers, stood on the shore spectators of this explosion.

"In a few days the American army evacuated New-York, and the machine was taken up the North river. Another attempt was afterwards made by Lee upon another frigate that lay opposite Blooms-dale face Sept. 8; his object now was to fasten the magazine to the stern of the ship, close at the water's edge. But while attempting this, the watch discovered him, raised an alarm, and compelled him to abandon his enterprise. He then endeavoured to get under the frigate's bottom, but in this he failed, having descended too deep.
This terminated his experiments. [Am. Jour. of Science, and art.,

against the "Eagle," given by James Thacher, M.D., under date of Oct., 1776, in A Military Jour. during the Am. Rev. War (1853), invention against British shipping off New London; also the use of legs charged with powder, set adrift in the Delaware river in Oct., 1777, above the British shipping anchored there. The latter incident was the famous "Battle of the Kegs."

The convention also resolves: “That all quit-rents, formerly due and payable to the King of Great-Britain, within this State, are now due and owing to this Convention or such future government as may be hereafter established in this State.” — Jour. Provii. Cong., I: 554.

The committee of safety passes a resolution “That no lambs be killed and exposed to sale in any market of this city and county.” — N. Y. Packets, Aug 2, 1776.

Robertson records that the British on Staten Island “heard a firing of Cannon up the North River,” — Robertson’s Jour. (MS.). On Aug. 6, he added: “Understand the firing we heard in the North River the 3d was an Attack made by the Rebels in 4 Gondolas & Arm’d Vessels on the Phoenix & Rose when they were repulsed with loss, two are said to be sunk and that they likewise silenced a Battery on the shore & sent some Boats & brought the Cannon off.” — Ibid.

Smith’s observation is: “The Phoenix and Rose mean to escape and join the Fleet at Staten Island — The River was nearly obstructed off the North End of N York Island & Preparations made to set them on Fire. The Phoenix got aground in Tappan Bay above Fort Washington.” — Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V. See also Kemble’s Jour., 83. The provincial convention directs that a letter be sent to John Berrian, chairman of the committee of safety, requesting that he call upon Pres. Moore of the “College of New-York” (King’s College), or such governor of the college as may have the care of its telescope, and request its delivery to its Excellency General Washington. Should the instrument does not obtain it, he is requested to “cause the said telescope to be taken out of the City Hall” in the presence of himself and some others of the committee, and to deliver it. — Jour. Provii. Cong., I: 559.

The next day, Berrian and Henry Wilmot wrote to the convention that they had readily obtained the telescope by applying to the Rev. Mr. Inglis, and delivered it to an aide-de-camp whom Washington had appointed to receive it. They also reported that “they had procured all the books and papers belonging to the Receiver General’s office, and sent them under a guard by Lieut. Thomas Lawrence.” — Ibid., I: 561. A paragraph in a letter of this date from the convention to Washington, drafted by John R. Livingston, states that the telescope would be sent to Washington on a suggestion that it “might be of use in discovering the arrangements and operations of the enemy,” and with the “hope that it may in some measure contribute to the furthering your designs.” — Ibid., 557—58. The college building having been occupied by the American troops for a hospital, the books, apparatus, etc., had been deposited in the city hall. — See Ap 4, 6, 12, 4, 1776.

Y. Merc., Aug 12, 1776.

This is the second Thursday in August, which was appointed, by the “Rev. Y. Jour., Aug 1, 1776.

The building of Fort Washington is commenced, having been “ordered by a council of officers at the earnest solicitation of General Putnam. It was a five-sided earthwork, without casemates or bomb-proofs.” — Mag. Am. Hist., VI: 103. Losing states that Washington assisted in the original survey of it on June 7, 1776. — Pictorial Field Book of the Rev., II: 800. After its capture by the British its name was changed to Fort Knayhausen, which it retained during the remainder of the war. — See Pt. 46, Vol. I.

Solomon Drowne, M.D., of the general hospital, states, in a letter from New York, that his pay has been increased, in consequence of a petition to congress, to one dollar per day. “The Pay would be no Inducement to stay a moment in this shocking Place, at the Expense of Health.” The Air of the whole City seems infected. In almost every street there is a horrid smell.” — N. Y. City during the Am. Rev., 104-5.

“A very large boat was carried from Town to be sunk in the North River, the passage of which the Rebels are endeavouring to stop in such a manner as to oblige our Ships to come nearer their Batteries in their Course up. All accounts concur in saying that the Rebels are very Sicily in the Town of New York. Late Accounts say there are 5,000 Men on Long Island Heights.” — Kemble’s Jour., 83.

“The First division of Hessian Troops under Genl de Heister arrived at Sandy hook, and landed the 16th on Staten Island.” — From “Journal of the Operations of the American Army under General Sir William Howe” (transcript in L. Sir William Howe, numbered between 25,000 and 30,000 soldiers, supported by the fleet under Vice Admiral Lord Vincourt Howe, Sir William’s brother. — The Hessians (1884), 58.

Lieut. Hinrich, in a letter of Sept. 18, describes his arrival from Halifax, probably with a later division, thus: “On the 12th of August, we entered the harbor of New York, or Sandy Hook, and cast anchor off Hendrick’s Point. All that could be seen in the harbor was a fleet of 450 sail, and also a number of boats which patrolled the enemy’s coast, both to guard against our fleet being set on fire and to intercept deserters. Just imagine to yourself one of the finest of harbors, in which 1000 ships can ride, and also fancy the actual number of vessels all crowded with human beings, and surrounded at the same time with a vigilant enemy! Think also of our enjoying the finest of weather; and all of these troops, bound on a mission on the coast of New York, and that by no means only of England, but of this powerful and proud country; and, again, remember that we are engaged upon an undertaking on which the eyes of the whole world are now fixated.” — He describes Staten Island, and Long Island, continuing his narrative with the landing on Aug. 23 (9.—10.—).—Letters of Brunswick and Hessian Officers (Munson’s Hist. Ser., No. 18), 193—95.

The provincial convention resolves that Gen. Washington be “empowered to apply the following houses, to wit: Mr. Apthorpe’s, Oliver Delancey’s and Rebt. Bayard’s, at Bloomingdale; Wm. Provii. Cong., I: 566.

England’s attitude on the reception of the news of the Declaration of Independence is shown in a report made on this day by Garnier, the French minister to England. He says (translated):
"General Howe writes that Congress has declared the independence of the united Colonies. It is known also that Congress has formally declared war on Great Britain; and that this declaration is stated in twenty three articles in which the reasons are deduced which have determined them to adopt this course. But the Government has not thought it necessary to take notice of it, and indeed I do not see that this uprising [livre de bonciel] causes any sensation here [London]."—Doniol, Participation de la France à l'Établissement des États-Unis d'Amérique, I: 585.

Doniol continues: "The People of New York, we are told, have in vain endeavoured to lay a Chain across the River, to prevent Vessels coming up to that City; for the Tide runs so strong there, that no Buoy could float the Weight of Iron which a proper Chain would require; they have therefore laid aside that Design, and have planted Batteries at the Entrance of both the Rivers to assuring that Purpose."—Doniol's Jour., 54.

"A London news item reads: ‘The People of New York, we are told, have in vain endeavoured to lay a Chain across the River, to prevent Vessels coming up to that City; for the Tide runs so strong there, that no Buoy could float the Weight of Iron which a proper Chain would require; they have therefore laid aside that Design, and have planted Batteries at the Entrance of both the Rivers to assure that Purpose.’"—St. James's Chron., Aug. 10-13, 1776.

"Tyrion, still on the "Dutchess of Gordon," off Staten Island, writes to Lord Germain: ‘The confederate Colonies have declared themselves independent States: Enclosed is a printed copy of their Declaration of Independence, which was published through the streets of New York the middle of last month, where the King's Statue has been demolished, as well as the King's Arms in the City Hall: I saw also churches shut up, and every Vestige of Royalty, as far as has been in the power of the Rebels, done away. The persons of the Mayors of the Cities of York and Albany, Judges, Counsellors, Magistrates and principal gentlemen of the Country that are not in rebellion seized and secured, and even down to the meanest planters persecuted and tyrannized over.

'The whole armament destined for this part of America, except the division of the Hessians, has been assembled here, I expect, by the courage and strength of this noble Army, tyranny will be crushed and legal government restored.'—N. T. Col. Doc., VIII: 683-84.

Kemble records: "Lord Dunmore arrived. Lord William Campbell also arrived about the same time, or the day or two before."—Kemble's Jour., 84.

"This war was from London to the count of Vernejans (translated); 'I have the honor to send you, My Lord, the translation of the act of the 4th of July by which the Colonies declared themselves independent under the title of the United States of America. Others will appreciate more than I the value of the motives upon which this declaration is based. This is the fact in which I think we will take more interest. It is between two armies and in sight of a formidable fleet that the Colonies unanimously declare war on Great Britain; for this act may be called a declaration of war... If the resistance of the Americans is successful, this ever memorable period will reduce England to the point of no longer being a subject of disquietude for France, whose importance on the continent of Europe should be augmented in proportion to the weakening of the English power... Lord Germain wrote to the Spanish ambassador in speaking of the act of independence of the American States, that now the other powers could make treaties of commerce and alliance with them, but that he was constantly waiting for the news that they had changed their tone. Meanwhile, it seems to me it would be well for him to take a different tone himself, for if we should put into effect this innocent jest, England, I think, would not find it a laughing matter.'"—Doniol, Participation de la France à l'Établissement des États-Unis d'Amérique, I: 585-86.

On this day two fire-ships, "commanded by Capt. Fosdyke and Thomas, (Gentlemen Volunteers of Rank in the Army of the United States) proceeded up the North-River with Intent to give a suitable Warming to those piratical Gentry that have infested it since the 14th of July last [p. 6]. The night was dark and favourable to the Design, and the Enemy did not perceive our Vessels till they were near aboard of them.—Capt. Fosdyke grappled the Phoenix, but the Fire not communicating so soon as was expected, she disentangled herself in about 20 Minutes, after sustaining considerable Damage in her Rigging.—Capt. Thomas fell on board one of the Tenders, which was soon consumed; and we are truly sorry to inform you, that this intrepid Commander met a glorious Death. The Elant Enterprise struck so great a panic upon the Enemy, that they thought it prudent to quit their Station; and Yesterday, taking Advantage of a fresh Wind at S. E. attended with considerable Rain, they run the Gauntlet, through a great Number of well directed Shot from our Batteries in and near this City, which undoubtedly must have damaged them much. Our Gallies played Aug. 16 strongly, and followed the Ships a Considerable Distance into the Bay. The Enemy's Fire seemed to be mostly directed upon the City, as the Tops of the Houses were crowded with Spectators, but very little Damage was done to the Buildings, nor any Lives lost upon the Occasion."—N. Lord Drummond writes to Gen. Washington as follows: 17

"Sir,

"Being deeply interested in the welfare of America, I think it my duty to communicate a matter of intelligence, which I flatter myself may be rendered conducive to the restoration of a desirable peace. And in this view I request your Excellency's permission to land at New-York, to go directly to Philadelphia, in order to lay the same before the General Congress.

"In the course of a conversation I have had with Lord Howe, I perceive that the powers he is vested with, as well as his disposition for establishing an equitable and permanent peace, are altogether misunderstood by the Colonies.

"For in consequence of a sketch of some propositions being offered for his consideration, he very frankly assured me, he was willing to confer upon these grounds with any gentleman of the greatest influence in the Congress of the Colonies."

"As I am at liberty to declare his sentiments, I have the honour to enclose for your Excellency's information, a copy of my correspondence with his Lordship, and of the propositions referred to in his letter, which are the motives of my present request.

"Attending in the boat to be indulged with your answer, I have the honour to be your Excellency's most humble servants, Drummmond."

The papers enclosed in this letter included, first, a letter of Drummond to Howe dated Aug. 12, which reads: "I take the liberty of sending inclosed the sketch of propositions referred to in my late conversation with your Lordship; which propositions, I have understood the Colonies were disposed, not many months ago, to make the basis of a reconciliation with Great-Britain."

The second paper was the "Sketch of Propositions communicated to Lord Howe, 12th August, 1776." These "Propositions" were six in number, namely:

1. That it shall be ascertained, as far as can be determined by calculation, what supply towards the general exigency of the State, each separate colony can furnish, consistent with its ability.

2. When such supply is thus ascertained, that each colony shall, by acts of its own Assembly, impose such taxes as they shall find expedient for raising of the said supply.

3. In consideration of the fluctuating state of all young countries, that such taxes may not, in their operations, become partially or accidentally burdensome on the one hand, nor on the other hand gradually become deficient in producing the aid intended by the colonial Assembly toward the support of the British Army; such articles shall be chosen, as the objects of imposition, as they shall deem the most likely to keep pace with the growth or decline of the said colonies.

4. That these taxes, so imposed, shall, as in the customs, be levied by officers of the appointment of the King; and that a perpetual grant, of the produce of these taxes, shall be made by the respective Assemblies to the Crown of Great Britain.

5. As the direct means of removing the fatal grounds of this contention, by establishing a security against the apprehended invasion of property by Parliament, formal relinquishment shall be made on the part of Great Britain, of all future claim to taxation over these her colonies.

6. To remove all future suspicions, from the minds of the Colonists, that under the appearance of regulating commerce, duties may be imposed for the further purposes of revenue, an application of the produce of all duties, imposed on articles of trade by the British legislature, shall be made towards defraying the expenses of collection; and the surpluses in each colony, to be paid into their separate treasuries, and to be subject to the disposal of the respective Houses of Assembly.

Drummond."—St. James's Chron., Aug. 15, 1776. Cf. Wm. Smith's Diary (MS)., which he said: "I have received the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 12th, inclosing a sketch of the propositions mentioned in your late conversations, which I return herewith.

"As I think they contain matter, that upon a conference and cool discussion, might be wrought into a plan of permanent union, I
In New York, and joined the Army under General Howe," writes from Staten Island to a correspondent in London: "A few days ago I left our devoted City, where every Means of Defence has been concerted to secure it, and the whole Island of New-York, from an Attack of the Royal Army. Should General Howe succeed in that Enterprise, his Antagonist, Mr. Washington, has provided a Magazine of Pitch, Tar, and Combustibles, to burn up the City before he shall retreat from his present Station; the Numbers of his Men are daily diminishing; they desert in large Bodies, are sickly, filthy, divided, and unruly; putrid Disorders, the Small-pox in particular, have carried off great Numbers; when I left the City there were six thousand in their Hospitals, to which Use they have converted King's College; they have not now quite 25,000 Men in Arms.

John Morin Scott is appointed Governor of New-York. . . .

The Persecution of the Loyalists continues unremitted: Donald MCLean, Theophilus Hardenbrook Young, Fuester the Silversmith, and Rem Rappals, have been cruely rode on Rails, a Practice most painful, and till now peculiar to the humane Republicans of New-England. . . . Mr. Washington commands at New-York; his Town Residence is at General Robertson's, on the Broadway, and his Country Seat is at Mr. De Lancey's House in Bowery.

James's Procrustes, Mr. Mr. Smith Ramage, Mears, Hugh and Alexander Wallace, and Mr. Abraham Lott, the Treasurer, are committed to Gaol, having refused to take an Oath of Allegiance to the Congress; in short, every one suspected of an hostile Disposition to that Body, are disarmed, and conducted into a damnable Durance, which was the Case of the venerable Chief Justice Horsmanden, who at 80, was hurried into to the Country by a Party of Ruffians, but he proved so troublesome on the Journey that they chose to leave him on the Road, without performing the Injunction of the Delegates . . .

"Some People lately arrived here from Philadelphia, tell us, that Mr. John Dickinson is employed by the Congress in digesting a Code of Laws for the United States of America. We are informed that Mr. John Allop, one of the New York Delegates, has escaped from the Congress, and is on his Way to join General Howe; Dr. Peter Middleton, Mr. Theophylact Baetie, Mr. Philip John Livingstone, Sheriff of Duchess County; Mr. John Watts, jun. Recorder of New-York, Mr. Augustus Van Cortlandt, and Mears. Robert and Samuel Auchmuty are lately arrived in this Island, having narrowly escaped from their Pursuers . . . A Person just escaped from New-York informs us, that their is again a high Hunt for the Friends of Government, and a general Inquisition among the New-Yorkers. . . . Capt. Archibald Kennedy, of the Royal Navy, is confined in Morris Town, and Governor Franklin, accompanied by that merry heart David Matthews, Mayor of New-York, now under Sentence of Death for eminent Proofs of Loyalty to his King and the old Constitution, are removed into Connecticut Government, for the better Security of their Persons. . . . The Episcopal Chaplains in New-York are shut up, the Protestant Bonds burnt, and the Ministers scattered abroad, in this and the neighbouring Provinces. [See O 31.]

"It is now the Puritans high Holiday Season, and they enjoy it with Rapture over all the Continent: Their Behaviour exactly assimilates the Manners of the King-killing Tribe during the English grand Rebellion; but perhaps they may find an Alteration in their Spirit from the Example of a Plan for a general Attack of the Island of New-York, &c. for which Preparations are now making. The whole Army is on Shipboard. General Clinton. . . . is to land and attack the Enemy's Posts on Long Island. Lord Cornwallis is on the Point of Departure, with a considerable Detachment of Troops, round Long Island, and to land at New Rochelle, near West Chester; and General Howe, with the main Body of the Army, to proceed up the North River, and make a Descent in Westchester County, as nearly opposite as possible to the Place where Lord Cornwallis may secure a landing. Should General Howe succeed in this Arrangement, it will be difficult for Mr. Washington to move from the Island of New-York; so that a general Engagement may be expected.

"We are told that Mr. Washington's Magazines are all in Cortlandt's Manor; to get Possession of them must surely be an Object of Gen. Howe's serious Attention, and an additional Inducement to attempt a Landing in the Rear of the Provincial Forces."—St. James's Chron. (London), O 3-5, 1776.

Regarding the report that Washington intended to burn the city, see Ag 22, 1776.

Washington has been indefatigable in constructing Redoubts, throwing up Entrenchments, and otherwise strengthening Posts already advanced very advantageously, on a part of Hook's Island, at Fort George, near Trinity Church; on the Eminence of Mr. Harrison's Brewhouse, at King's-Bridge; from Crown-Point to Corlase's Hook, through the Estate of Mr. De Lanecy of the Bowery, down to the North River; making the most of Mr. Nicholas Bayard's Hill, at Mr. Gruger's Wharf, and several other Places within the City. On Long Island, where they have 5,000 Men, from the Wallabout down to Redhook; on Governor's Island, and also at Pole's Hook. The Accounts given of the Numbers of the whole Army upon the Island of New-York vary very much; some pronounce them 12, 14, and others from 24 to 30,000 Men."—St. James's Chron. (London), Ag 15-17, 1776.

Robertson refers to the day's events thus: "This morning the Philadelphia & Jersey Troops of War with twenty-two Ships after have pass'd the fire of all their Batteries—in w the Rose had two men wounded—The Night of the 16th. [Sp. 1v.] They were Attack'd by two fire Ships—The Rose's Tender was burnt & the Phoenix narrowly escaped."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

Pastor Sheekirk, describing the affair, says: "Phil. Syphers experienced a kind preservation. A nine pounder came out of the German church, through the house they lived in, and the opposite the Lutheran church, and into the room where they slept; but they were up and out of the room. . . . [The course of the cannon-ball through the house is described.] A thirty-two pounder, supposed coming from the Powlis Hook battery, fell into Sr. Barnard's garden, just before her door. . . ."—Johnston, Cam.-paign, 1776, part 2, 117.

A London news item reads: "In the opinion of the most impartial politicians, the consequence of the American dispute will be a general war throughout Europe. France and Spain will most assuredly conclude a treaty with America. This will occasion a rupture with those powers. England will claim the assistance of Russia, Prussia, and her other allies. Some will explain away the meaning of treaties, and entend to themselves free and independent. Others will feelly lead their side. The rupture will be consequent, the event important. Let Britain, deprived of her colonies, bereft of her commerce, and of course impoverished in her revenue, look to the probability of success!"—Kentish Gaz. (Canterbury), Ag 17-21, 1776.

"Troops from all Quarters have been daily arriving to our Assistance, and Yesterday Afternoon 14 Sail of transports, full of hearty Troops, arrived here from the Eastward, so that we can with great Truth assert, that we have now an Army in and about this City, of at least 70,000 Men."

"Every Tide we expect an Attack will be made on this City from the piratical Fleet at Staten-Island."—N. T. Merc, Ag 19, 1776.

An entire regiment is employed "to load a number of vessels with stores, for to sink between the grand battery and Governor's Island [see Ag 17], which they will effect in a day or two."—New York news in Penn. Jour. (Phila.), Ag 21, 1776.

20 Capt. Nathan Hale writes from New York to his brother: "For about 6 or 8 days the enemy have been expected hourly, whenever the wind and tide in the least favored. We keep a particular look out for them this morning. The place and manner of attack time must determine. The event we leave to Heaven. Thanks to God! we have had time for completing our works and receiving reenforcements. The militia of Connecticut ordered this way are mostly arrived. Col. Ward's Regt has got in. Troops from the Southward are daily coming. We hope, under God, to give a good account of the Enemy whenever they choose to make the last appeal."

"Last Friday night [see Ag 16], two of our fire vessels (a Sloop and a Schooner) made an attempt upon the shipping up the River. The night was too dark, the wind too slack for the attempt. The Schooner which was intended for one of the Ships had got by be-

"The provincial convention at Harlem approves "A draft of a Letter to his Excellency General Washington, relating to a report that the City of New-York was to be burnt if the Troops left it." The letter is as follows:

Sir: The Convention of this State have received information from one of the Deputies of the City and County of New-York of a report prevailing amongst the Army, 'that if the fortune of war should oblige our troops to abandon that city, it should be immediately burnt by the retreating soldiery, and that any man is authorized to set it on fire.'

"The Convention, cheerfully submit to the fatal necessity of destroying that valuable city whenever your Excellency shall deem it essential to the safety of this State or the general interest of America, yet the duty which they owe to their constituents obliges them to take every possible precaution that twenty thousand inhabitants may not be reduced to misery by the wanton act of an individual. They therefore entreat your Excellency to take such measures in preventing the evil tendency of such a report as you shall deem most expedient. . . . "Ams Gates, President."

—5 Am. Arch, I: 1531. A like rumour was prevalent in the British camp (see S 2). On Aug. 23 (q. v.), Washington replied contradicting the report. Subsequently (see S 2), he asked the advice of Congress on this subject, and, on Sept. 13 (q. v.), Gen. Greene wrote to him advising it. Congress, however, did not favour it (see S 3).

Washington writes to the provincial convention: "I am favoured with yours of the 22d [q. v.,] acquainting me with a report now circulating 'that the American Army should be obliged to retreat from this city, any individual may set it on fire.' I can assure you, gentlemen, this report is not founded upon the least authority from me, or from any other. I am so sensible of the value of such a city, and the damage of its destruction to many worthy citizens and their families, that nothing but the last necessity, and that such as should justify me to the whole world, would induce me to give orders for that purpose.

"The unwillingness shown by many families to remove, notwithstanding your and my recommendation, may, perhaps, have led some persons to propagage the report with honest and innocent intentions; but as your letter first informed me of it, I cannot pretend to say by whom or for what purpose it has been done. As my views with regard to the removal of the women and children have happily coincided with your sentiments, and a Committee appointed to carry them into execution, I submit to your judgment whether it would not be proper for the Committee to meet immediately in this city, and give notice of their attendance on this business. There are many who anxiously wish to remove, but have no means."

Jabez Fitch's regiment (see Ag 22) joins "Gen'l Greens Encampment, at Brookline." Fitch says: "There was ye 6th Report of Cannon heard most of ye 8th Day, from Flat Bush (ye place of ye Enimy's Ransibloose) Some wounded there were also Bri't into Camp. We are this Day Inform'd ye 7th Enimy have Extended their Force more Eastward than it was Yesterday, & that their Numbers are sup'd to be about 10000, Several Reg't Cross'd ye Ferry over onto ye Island this Day, there was also several Reg'ts sent into ye Woods, in Order to Relieve such as had been there th'o ye Night . . . At about 4 o'Clock, our Regt was Order'd into ye Meeting house, & a Barn Standing near it, there was also a Comfortable Room provided for ye Officers. We took Possession of ye same, which was noway Disagreeble." — Diary of Jabez Fitch (MS.), 6-7, in N. Y. P. L.

A German, Lieut. Col. Zedwitz (see Jl 15, 1775), of Washington's forces in New York, is detected sending a letter to Gov. Tryon, traitorously disclosing Washington's plans and falsely stating that he had seen "four villains at Gen. Washington's house with fourteen men on horseback as black as ink which they were to poison the Watering place on Staten Island, and were to receive a recompence of £1000 each from the General." He promised to give information to the British for £2000. In his defense at his court martial on Aug. 26, he confessed writing the letter, but pleaded that it was a trick to reimburse him for previously raising a regiment in Germany for the British. By a "casting vote" he was acquitted. Aug. 27. N. T: Merc. S 2; Penn. even. Post, S 3; Conn. Gen (New London), Aug. 30, S 4, and 6, 1776.

James Thacker, M. D., commenting on this instance of disloyalty, stated in his journal, under date of Sept. 12, that, while Zedwitz's life was saved "by the casting vote of a militia officer, who pretended some scruples of conscience," he was nevertheless "cashiered, and declared incapable of holding any military office in the service of the United States." — A Military journal, etc. (1823), 64-65.

The provincial convention resolves that, in case of the invasion of the city and the distressing consequences attending it, "the several committees throughout this State be and they hereby are authorized and required to quarter upon the inhabitants of their respective counties and districts all such unfortunate persons as may, in consequence of the aforesaid invasion, be driven away from their places of abode, paying all possible regard to the conveniences of such inhabitants; and that they do assess moderate prices to be paid to such inhabitants for the persons so quartered on them." — Jour. Prov. Cong. I: 549.

Lord Stirling tells Lieut. Fitch that "he had this morning view'd five Different Encampments of ye Enimy, on ye Island & ye 3d Encampm did en;m'y in most much moderate Men." — Diary of Jabez Fitch (MS.), 10. There is reason to believe that Washington thought the British movement to Long Island a feint to conceal an attack on Manhattan Id. See letter of Washington to Yates, dated Aug. 25, in Jour. Prov. Cong. II: 277.

"General de Helder took Post with two Brigades of Hessians at Flatbush, & Lord Cornwallis moved with the Committee in the Evening to Flatlands." — From transcript, in Library of Congress, of the "Journal of the Operations of the Am. Army under Gen. Sir Wm. Howe" in British Museum (Egerton MSS. 2135 f. 7). On the same day Capt. Robertson writes: "Ordered to attend Genl Clifton, Join'd him at 8 in the Evening at flat lands, & w'ld all the Grend's L. P. 3d 71st Regts & 17th Dragoons in order to turn the left flank of the civilized army who have in poss's of the high Grounds of Brooklyn, that extend all the way most to Jamaica." — Robertson's Jour. (MS.). The movements of the American forces on this day are described by a New Englisher, one of a body of 100 volunteers under Col. Knowlton that crossed from New Jersey to Long Island to reconnoitre between the British and American lines: "We crossed in flat boats, and marched immediately to the quarters of the Washington and Putnam. They were riding about with spy-glasses in their hands, observing the enemy, whose tents were in sight. We spent the night in reconnoitering, without any special incident, excepting that while we were on the point of executing a plan for surrounding a British picket guard, we were fired upon by a party of American Militia-men, who did not understand their duty, and who immediately turned their heels. The firing alarmed the pickets, and we failed in our enterprise." — Onderdonk, Battle of Long Id. (scrap-book & MS.), 79-80. Cf. L. I. Hist. Soc., Memoirs, III: 58-59. See also Losing, Pictorial Field-Book of the Rev. II: chap. 25.

The provincial convention being "informed that the Committee," who were appointed for that purpose, cannot proceed in the removal of the Poor from the City of New-York without a supply of cash, it is ordered that the Treasurer of this State advance to James Beekman, Esq., one of the members of the committee appointed to remove the indigent women and children and infirm persons out of the City of New-York, the sum of £1,000, to enable the said committee to complete the business for which they were appointed. — Jour. Prov. Cong. I: 549.

The British engineer Robertson gives the following account of the Battle of Long Island: "at day break we pass'd these heights [see Ag 26] w't out any opposition, About 5 miles East of Bedford, & continued our march towards Bedford & Brooklyn, when we came near to Bedford the Rebels began to fire from the Woods on our left w't continued for some dist'c as we march'd on to Brooklyn—ordered to stop the L. Comp' of the 254 I joined them & obliged to return my Command to the Gen'l being cut off—About the Rebels gave way very fast & in their retreat, across a marsh & mill dam Received a heavy fire from our Grinad's tho' dist—the L' Horse could not act for a swamp that was in front—At the same time Genl C——n went from Flatlands—Genl Grant march'd from Denney's w't 2 Brigades to turn the Rebels right flank & Count Dunlop [Donop] march'd in the Centre.
The operations of the American and British forces in the neighbourhood of New York, beginning with this battle, are shown on a plan of New York Island, with a part of Long Island, Staten Island, and East New Jersey, with a particular Description of the Engagement on the Woody Heights of Long Island, between Flat-bush and Brooklyn, on the 27th of Aug. 1776, between His Majesty's forces commanded by Gen'l Howe and the Americans under Major Gen'l Putnam. Showing also the landing of the British army on New York Island, and the taking of the City of New York, &c., on the 17th of September following, with the Subsequent Disposition of the British Armies. This plan, "Engraved and published Oct. 19, 1776, by William Faden," is reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pl. 45.

This is the day appointed by the provincial convention on Aug. 2 (9 v.) as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer.—Jour. Prov. Cong., I: 554.
Soon after this, Washington began to withdraw his forces across East River to Manhattan. The British did not discover the movement until the following morning (q.v.).

Prof. Johnston, gathering his information from contemporary accounts, thus:—"Hitchcock's Rhode Islanders carried their baggage and camp equipage to the boats on their shoulders "through, mud and mire and not a ray of light visible."

The embarkation was made from the ferry—the present Fulton Ferry—where General McDougall superintended the movements. Between seven and eight o'clock the boats were manned by Glover's and Hutchinson's men, and they went to work with martial-like cheer and intervals. The military discipline was the first to cross, though there was some vexing delay in getting them off. Unluckily, too, about nine o'clock the adverse wind and tide and pouring rain began to make the navigation of the river difficult . . . However, at eleven o'clock there was another and a favorable change in the weather. The north-east wind died away, and soon after a gentle breeze set in from the south-west, of which they made the most advantage, and the passage was now direct, easy, and expeditious. The troops were pushed across as fast as possible in every variety of craft—row-boats, flat-boats, whale-boats, petitaguers, dopeys, and sail-boats—some of which were loaded to within three inches of the water, which was 'as smooth as glass.'”—L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part I: 221-22. See Ag. 30.

Col. Moses Little, of Massachusetts, in a letter written to his son, dated Sept. 1, said:—"On the morning of the 23d the enemy were encamped on the heights in front of our encampment [Fort Putnam]. Firing was kept up on both sides from the right to the left. We heard the roar of the gun.’’—Letter published in L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part II: 43. Washington's own description of the day, written on the 29th, was similar:—"There was some skirmishing the greatest part of yesterday between parties from the enemy and our people. In the evening it was very smart.'’—Letter of Washington to Hancock, 5 Am. Arch., I: 1211. Capt. Robertson, on the British side, wrote:—"This night w^* a party of 400 men I opened ground opposite their Works & form'd a kind of Parabolic place of Arms 650 Yds Diss'—this day St Wm Erkine w^ the 71st Reg't & L. Dragons went to Jamaica. They took a Gen! Woodall [Woodhull] Prisoner.'’—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Gen. Nathaniel Woodhull, of Long Island, was captured "on the day after the battle" by "a party of British light horse, under Oliver De Lancey," riding a Trojan Road. He was carried away captive after being "without provocation . . . cruelly hacked in the head and arm," and subsequently died of his wounds.—L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part I: 199.

Lightning strikes Gen. McDougall's Camp, "near the Bull's Head in the Bowery," and instantly kills Capt. Van Wyck and his two lieutenants, Versenear and Deyopster. A soldier is also killed in the House of Joseph Halbert, in Hanover Square, while others are hurt.—Conn. Gaz. (New London), Ag. 30, 1776.

Capt. Robertson reports:—"Party 300 employ'd in making a Bayou & Partys employ'd in making fascines to raise Batteries.'’—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). The work of the British engineering staff on this and the preceding day (q.v.) resulted in a "breastwork . . . 62 rods long, & 150 rods distant from Fort Putnam.'’—Letter of Col. Little to his son, L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part II: 43. Prof. Johnston, discussing the "Origin of the Retreat," declares his belief that this "intention of advancing by trenches" on the part of Gen. Howe impelled Washington finally to call a council of war to consider retreat.—Ibid., part II: 155-156. The council was held "at Mr. Phillips Livings house'’ (ibid., part II: 157) and it was decided unanimously "to give up Long Island, and not, by dividing our force, be unable to resist the enemy in any one point of attack.'’—Letter of Washington to Yates, 5 Am. Arch., I: 1230.

Orders were given to commanding officers "to parade their men with their Arms, Accoutrements, & Knapsacks at 7 O'Clock, at the Head of their Encampments & there wait for Orders.'’—Orders book of Col. Wm. Douglas in L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part II: 51. Orders were also given "to impress every kind of water craft from Holligste on the Sound to Speyghen Duyvel Creek, that we might be kept about, and that had either sails or oars, and have them all in the east harbor of the city by dark.'’—Memorial of Col. Hugh Hughes in Leke's Life of John Lamb, 361. "At eight o'clock of the evening, such was the calamity of the movements of those employed, that everything important to the occasion was in readiness, to be placed in the most favorable locations to secure the retreat.'’—Ibid., 361-62.

The committee of safety resolves "That the records and papers belonging to the Convention of this State, as also the chest belonging to the Receiver-General's office, he immediately conveyed to Genl. Clinton's encampment, at or near King's Bridge.'’ It is also ordered:—"That one of the Secretaries do see them safely conveyed to the said encampment, and remain with them till further orders.'’—Jour. Prov. Cong., I: 594.

The British Officer, in a letter to London, dated Sept. 7, says:—"Our Retreat before an Enemy much superior in Numbers, over a wide River, and not very well furnished with Boats certainly does Credit to our Generals. The thing was conducted with so much Secrecy that neither subalterns or privates knew that the whole Array was to cross back again to N. York.'’—L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part II: 85; 5 Am. Arch., II: 214. A British officer, in a letter to London, dated Sept. 9, 1776, says:—"The 29th, upon a movement of the enemy near-land and the troops, the Rebels ran away, and left the Island to the conquerors, flying over to New-York in the greatest confusion and dismay.'’—Ibid., II: 200; Winsor, VI: 281. See, further, Ag. 30.

It is reported that the Americans were not somewhat Coars, for Officers & Men, being almost 400 in Number, were soon Drove under Deck together without Distinction; Here we kept our Residence three Nights Successively, & my own Lodging was no other than a Great Guu or a Quilt of Rigning, yet we here Resd great Indulgence.'’—Diary of Jabez Fitch (MS.), 21-22.

American retreat from Long Island to New York (see Ag. 29) is completed this morning under cover of a fog. This account reads:—". . . by six o'clock in the morning we had everything embarked. There never was a man that behaved better upon the occasion than General Washington; he was on horse back, the whole night, and never left the ferry stairs till he had seen the whole of his troops embarked.'’—Penn. Gaz. S 4, 1776; see also ibid., S 5 and 14. Gen. Greene, writing to Gov. Cooke on Sept. 15, said it was "the best effected retreat I ever read or heard of, considering the difficulty.'’—5 Am. Arch., III: 370. The British themselves expressed high praise for this feat of generalship. The Ann. Register (1777), 577, referred to the 'wonderful silence and order' of the retreat; adding: "those who are best acquainted with the difficulty, embarrassment, noise and tumult, which attend even by day, and no enemy at hand, a movement of this kind, and with several thousand men, will be the first to acknowledge that this retreat should hold a high place among military transactions.'’

Capt. Montresor, of the British forces, states:—'I gave the first Information of the Enemy's abandoning the works near Brooklyn; and was the first man in them with one Corporal, and six men, in the front of the Figue's.'’—Capt. Montresor's Jour. (MS.).

Col. Robertson reports that the British perceived by Daybreak that the Rebels had evacuated all their Works on long Island & retreated to N. Y. Island in the Night—we immediately took Possess of them w^ the Piquets— & in the Even' were relieved by 1000 Hessians—Gen I C—o went On towards Newton w^ 2 Battey L1-In & 1 Bat2 Grenads.'’—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Kemble gives further evidence that the British were surprised when he says:—"In the Morning, to our great Astonishment, found they had Evacuated all their Works on Brookland and Red Hook, without a Shot being fired at them, and to the best of our observation found a Body of threc or four hundred remaining upon Gover-

Solomon Nash records that "the Enemy fired soon at Last

Pastor Shewkirk, viewing the affairs of the day from the Manhattan side, writes: "In the morning, unexpectedly and to the surprize of the city, it was found that all that could come back was come back; and that they had abandoned Long Island; when many had thought to surround the King's troops, and make them prison-ners with little trouble. The language was now otherwise; it was a surprising change, the merry tones on drums and files had ceased, and they were hardly heard for a couple of days. It seemed a general damp had spread; and the sight of the scattered people up and down the streets was indeed moving. Many looked sickly, emaciated, cast down, &c., the wet clothes, tents,—as many as they had brought away,—and other things, were lying about before the houses and in the streets to-day; in general everything seemed to be in confusion. Many, as it is reported for certain, went away to their respective homes. The loss in killed and wounded and taken has been great, and more so than it ever will be known. Several were drowned and lost their lives in passing the bay, and having erred out of the Hands of the Rebels. The inhabitants of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland people lost the most; the New England people, &c., it seems are but poor soldiers, they soon took to their heels."—L. I. Hist. Soc. Memoirs, III, Part II: 115.

The committee of safety resolves, in reply to the inquiry of Ebenzer Hazard, deputy postmaster for the New York city department, regarding "the most proper place of safety and convenience to the public to which he should remove his office, as an invasion of the city of New-York is hourly expected," that he should remove it
"to some convenient place near Dobbs' ferry, till further orders

The college, when finished, will be exceedingly handsome that is to be built on three sides of a quadrangle; fronting Hudson's or North river, and will be the most beautifully situated of any college, I believe, in the world. At present only one wing is finished, which is of stone, and consists of twenty-four sets of rooms; each having a large sitting room, with a study, and bedchamber. They are obliged to make use of some of these apartments for a master's lodge, library, chapel, hall, &c. but as soon as the whole will be completed, there will be proper apartments for each of these offices.

. . . . There is also . . . one of the finest prisons I have never seen—The Court or Stadt-house makes no great figure, but is to be repaired and beautified. There is a quadrangular fort, capable of mounting sixty cannon, though at present there are, I believe, only thirty-two. Within this is the governor's palace, and underneath it a battery capable of mounting ninety-four guns, and barracks for a compny or two of soldiers. Upon one of the islands in the bay is an hospital for sick and wounded seamen; and, upon another a pest-house . . . .—"Letterary Magazine" (London), Sept., 1776 (with

Earl Percy, writing from Newtown, Long Island, to his father, the Duke of Northumberland, describes the engagement of Aug. 27 and the subsequent evacuation of Long Island by the Americans, and then adds: "In consequence of which we marched on Yesterday to this Place, where almost every body has come in to us, such as have been in Arms or Active have surrendered Themselves, & all taken the Orthes. Whole Regt & we are informed have deert from them at New York, & in short they are in the greatest State of Confusion. They feel severely the Blow on the 27th & I think I may venture to assert, that they will never again stand before us in the Field. Every Thing seems to be over with Them, & I flatter myself now that this Campaign will put a total End to the War."—Letters of Hugh, Earl Percy, 67-70.

Capt. Archibald Robertson records that he "reconnoitred the shore opposite Hell gate where The Rebels have a Work round

The house, call'd the "Water in River about 50 Yds across here—Gen 1 Sullivan sent over to N: YK about negotiations."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

Washington writes to the president of congress: " . . . with the deepest concern I am obliged to confess my want of confidence with the generality of the troops . . . . I more than once in my letters took the liberty of mentioning to Congress, that no dependance can be put in the hands of troops or other parts than those highlighted and embodied for a longer period than our regulations heretofore have prescribed. I am persuaded, and as fully convinced as I am of any one fact that has happened, that our liberties must of necessity be greatly hazed, if not entirely lost, if their defence is left to any or permanent standing army. . . . Our number of men at present fit for duty, are under twenty thousand. . . .
Till of late, I had no doubt in my own mind of defending this place, nor should I have it yet if the men would do their duty; but this I dispair of.
It is painful and extremely grating to me to give such unfavorable accounts, but it would be criminal to conceal the truth at so critical a juncture . . . .

He asks the advice of congress regarding the advisability of destroying New York, to prevent the becoming the headquarters of the enemy: "If we should be obliged to abandon the town, ought it to stand as winter-quarters for the enemy? They would derive great conveniences from it on the one hand; and much property would be destroyed on the other. It is an important question, but will admit of but little time for deliberation. At present, I dare say the enemy mean to preserve it, if they can. If Congress, therefore, should resolve upon the destruction of it, the resolution should be a profound secret, as the knowledge of it will make a change in their plans."—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 378-81. Congress replied the next day.—See S 3.

On this day also, an English field-officer writes from the British camp on Long-Island: "I have just heard there has been a most dreadful fray in the town of New-York. The New-Englanders insisted upon setting fire to King George's Armes Ann St., & other public houses and stores. The Jerseys are opposed by the New-Yorkers, who were joined by the Pennsylvanias, and a battle has been the consequence, in which many have lost their lives. By the steps the General is taking, I imagine he will effectually cut off their retreat at Kings Bridge, by which the Island of New-York is joined to the Continent."—5 Am. Archives, II: 123.

Another British officer on Long Island writes at the same time:
"Accounts agree that they are preparing to evacuate the Town
[New York]. Whether they will burn it or not is uncertain, as the Provincials from the Jerseys and the neighborhood strenuously oppose that measure."—Shelton, The Junal Mansion, 43.

Samuel Loudon advertises in Gaine's newspaper that he "Is removing his Printing-Office to Fish-Kills, where the Provincial Congress now reside," and that he "will make the околision of the New-York Packet, for several Weeks, occasioned by the Trouble in moving as well as the great Scarcity of Printing Paper."—N. Y. Merc., S 2, 1776. See Ag 29.

CHRONOLOGY: THE REVOLUTIONARY Period: 1776-1783

The detachment of American patriots having left Governor's Island on Aug. 31, abandoning munitions and provisions, one captain and 100 men of the British forces occupy it, "to keep the rebels within bounds, in the city as well as in their redoubts thrown up on the side of the city." "Blockewell Island" is also occupied by the British.—From Baumesteir's narrative in Mag. Am. Hist., I: 333; cf. Nath's Jour., 31. The British army also held possession of Newtown, Bushwick, Hell Gate, and Flushing. They began the erection of two batteries at Remsen's Mill and one near Hell Gate.—Trans. in Library of Cong., of "Journ. of the Operations," etc., in British Museum (Egeron MSS., 2135 f. 7). See also descrip. of Pl. 47-8, I: 361.

"Capt. Archibald Robertson consults Gen. Clinton about "place mortars to drive the Rebels from their work at Waltons house," but nothing is done. It is reported that Gen. Sullivan has gone to Philadelphia, New York, Gouverneur's Jour. (MS.)."

A British officer in the 42nd Regiment writes from Long Island: "I was upon a Party who took above 100 prisoners, who upon their knees begged their lives, and many of them declared that they had been forced into the Service. We could see the Rebels preparing to evacuate New-York, and hear that they are in great Consternation lest a Junction should be effected with General Burgoyne's Army. It is reported also, that many of the Loyalists in New-York have dared to lay down the Arms which they had been compelled to carry against his Majesty's Army; so that I have no Doubt of our being soon in Possession of that City."—St. James's Chron., O 22-

"In the night of the 3d of September the frigate Rose of 32 guns sailed out of the fleet up the East River, with 30 boats, leaving New York on the left, and without the slightest difficulty anchored in Whall [Wallabout] Bay and Buschwickfeste. All the enemy's [American] cannon were put into a serviceable condition by the British, and conveyed to the batteries, which were found in part and also erected on the rising ground to the left of the village ferry [at Brooklyn] as far as to Gouverneurs Island.

"The rebels on the heights, and on every hill in this island, are in discouragement, and the losses on Long Island, and the indefensible condition of New York. "Had Long Island been rendered Useless, to the Enemy, N. York laid in Ashes, when we were Ordered to L. Island, & the Heights between this & Connecticut Properly Occupied, the Enemy must have attacked at Disadvantage. . . . tis true this kind of Devastation may be condemned as Cruel, but Provinces e'r now have been sacrificed with Applause to the Safety of a Kingdom, & what ought not to be done for the Safety of a Continent. . . . "—From the original letter, sold by Henlcs, in Phila., Je 13, 1779.

"... the English left their post on Blackwells Island, the rebels occupied it in force, and so strong, that the outposts on the main shore were exposed to a continuous fire, which even the great battery could not silence."—From Baumesteir's narrative, in Mag. Am. Hist., I: 34.

Sept. 3

Capt. Robertson's account of this declares that "This Night the Roman of war came up the E. River in 20 flat boats. She Anchored and a Boat came off with a Pique to give the enemy a few shots. He received 1 fire, but by the time the Batt. was A Piquet sent to take Posses of Blackwell's Island for her Protection."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). See also descrip. of Pl. 47-8, I: 361.

"The forepart of y. Day there was a mighty movement of y. [British] Transports in y. Harbour, a great number of them mov'd up toward Town."—Diary of Jeths Finch (MS.), 26.

Washington's letter of Sept. 2, 2 p.m., is read in congress. A resolution is passed immediately that he be acquainted, that the Congress would have especial care taken, in case he should find it necessary to quit New York, that no damage be done to the said city by his troops, on their leaving it: The Congress having no doubt of being able to recover the same, though the enemy should, for a time, obtain possession of it." It was also ordered that "three more battalions be ordered from Virginia, to reinforce the army at New-York;" two, likewise, from North Carolina and one from Rhode Island; and that it "be recommended to the assemblies and conventions of the several states to the northward of Virginia, immediately to send all the aid in their power to the army at New-York."—Jour. Cont. Cong. (Ford. ed.), V: 33-34. Washington re-plian Sept. 6 (f. 2-3).

Col. Rufus Putnam writes from Bloomgildge to Gen. Washington:

"I have reconnoitered every part about the Island of New-York and the main, as far as Frog's Point, and, on a full view, find the enemy have such a variety of places to choose out of, that it is impossible to prevent their landing when they please. They have such guides and intelligence of our movements that they can always avoid or surprise any parties that are posted to oppose their landing. Their army is so numerous that they can attempt the division of our army with a superior force; and yet, while our army is es-tended from New-York to King's Bridge, 'tis necessary to have a body of reserve at this place [Bloomgildge]. But I cannot think it would be best, nor have we time, to make fortifications; since the moment any quarter is attacked, the whole body of reserve, I conclu-se, will be ordered to support it. I should advise the throwing of obstructions in the way of landing. That they have some of their provisions always with them, and teams ready to carry their baggage wherever the service requires." He advises that the army "be collected together in some advantageous place," where supplies may be had, and "a camp fortified in such a manner as the enemy dare not attack, or, if they did, must be repulsed. . . . And to defend the passage of the North River, which I take to be the capital objection, and at the same time keep open a communication with the Eastern and Southern Colonies, is to press the army from Bundet landing, on the Jersey shore—Mount Washington and the Heights, south as far as Colonel Thompson's house, on Harlem River—the Heights we now possess at King's Bridge, and as far south as the Treet Tresses. The batteries on the Jersey side to be filled with guns; the battery on the rocks below Mount Washington completed; a new one built below the hill opposite to the summ. Jersey Hill filled with guns and ammunition, if the galleys also afforded their assistance, would render it very difficult for ships to pass. . . ."—5 Am. Arch., II: 168.

John Halsey, writing to Brig. Gen. Caesar Rodney from the "United States at Kings Bridge," reports that the British army had been reinforced, and that the British General Grant had ordered three battalions of New York Provincials to leave New-York, and that they should be replaced by an equal number of Connecticut troops; but the former, assured that the Connecticutians would burn and destroy all the houses, peremptorily refused to give up their city."—5 Am. Arch., II: 168.

Capt. Robertson writes: "Capt. Moncrief & I were ordered to raise two Batt's at Hell gate against Walton's house one of 3, 24 P's & one 3, 12 P's—a work's party of 300 men we began to work at 3/4 past nine & by 5 next mor'ls they were completed within 2 hours of work men. This even^ A Party was sent to raise a Breast Work on Blackwell's Island—but the Piquets were withdrawn & the Rose went down to Bushwick Point."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). See also Kemble's Jour., 87.

A letter written by Gen. Mercer, "who commands the flying camp," states: "Gen. Washington has not so far as I have seen 5000 men to be depended on for the service of a campaign, and I have not 1000. Both our armies are composed of raw militia, perpetually fluctuating between the camp and their farms, poorly armed, and still worse disciplined. These are not a match for, were their numbers equal to, veteran troops, well fitted and urged on by able officers. Numbers and discipline must prevail at last."—Gordon, Hist. of the Rite, Progress, and Establishment of the Independence of the U. S. A. (London, 1758), II: 316.

Gen. Washington came up and dined at our General's quar-

The provincial convention resolves: "That His Excellency General Washington be requested and authorized to cause all the bells in the different churches and public edifices in the city of New-York, to be taken down and removed to New-Ark, in New-Jersey, with all possible dispatch, that the fortune of war may not throw the same into the hands of our enemy, and deprive this State at this crucial period of that necessary, though unfortunately, resource for supplying our want of cannon."—Jour. Prov. Cong. I, 610. On Sept. 8, Washington wrote to Mr. Yates, the president of the committee of safety, acknowledging receipt of the resolution of the convention, approving of it, and stating that he would "accordingly have it carried into execution."—Ibid. I, 616. Pastor Shower-kirk recorded their removal in his diary, under Sept. 9 (q.v.).

"This morres the Two Batt 2d Completely all but the Platforms—
The Rebels took posa of Blackwell's Island—Orders were again given for our retai the Event. The Boats were ready—but it was de-defeated."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

Fitch writes: "It is now one Week since ye 8th Day when we came on Board ye 8th Pacific, & two Weeks since ye 8th Day we left N. York. What Changing Scenes a few Days open to our View what a mighty Alteration two Week hath made in ye Appearance of American Affairs, but more especially in our own particular Circumstances—

"About Sunset ye Officers . belonging to our Regt., were all Removed to ye Snow Mentor . This Afternoon we heard a very considerable Cannonade up to ye Northward, which continued some part of ye Night following."—Diary of James Finch (M.S.), 30.

Gen. Greene, writing from "New-York Island" to Gen. Washington, advises burning the city (see S 2). He states, among other things, that "It has been agreed that the city of New-York would not be tenable if the enemy got possession of Long-Island and Greenwich Islands. They are now in possession of both these places. Notwithstanding, I think we might hold it for some time, but the annoyance must be so great as to render it an unfruitful price to quarter troops in . . .

"The City and Island of New-York are no objects for us; we are not to bring them into competition with the general interests of America. Part of the army already has met with a defeat; the country is struck with a panic; any capital loss at this time may ruin the cause. 'Tis our business to study to avoid any considerable misfortune, and to take post where the enemy will be obliged to fight us, and not we them. The sacrifice of the vast property of New-York and the suburbs, I hope has no influence upon your Excellency's measures. Remember the King of France . . . Two-thirds of the property of the city of New-York and the suburbs belongs to the Tories. We have no very great reason to run any considerable risk for its defence . . .

"I give it as my opinion, that a general and speedy retreat is abolutely necessary, and that the honour and interest of America require it. I would burn the city and suburbs, and that for the following reasons: If the enemy gets possession of the city, we never can recover the possession without a superior naval force to theirs. In the event of the enemy of barricading their whole army together, which, if they could do, would be a very great security. It will deprive them of a general market . . ."—5 Am. Arch., II: 182. "John Jay before this also proposed its destruction. Scott urged abandonment of the place for sound military reasons, though the move would ruin him."—Campaign of 1776 around N. Y., I, 239.

Samuel H. Parsons writes to Major Gen. Heath: "As the machine designed to attempt blowing up the enemy's ships is to be transported from the East to the North River, where a small vessel will be wanted to receive it, I wish you would order one for that purpose. As all things are now ready to make the experiment, I wish it may not be delayed . . ."—5 Am. Arch., II: 182. The reference here is undoubtedly to Bushnell's submarine torpedo (see Aug.).

An officer, at "Camp near New-Town Long Island," writes: "Deserter tell us they are in great confusion at New York, one party wanting to burn the Town, and the other to save it; but in compassion for their Sick, which it is impossible they can remove, the number being so great, I think they will hardly set Fire to the Town."—Shelton, The Jemul Mansion.

Referring to the conquest of Long Island, and the resistance still encountered beyond "Jamaica," Baumleister states: "The happy-ness of the inhabitants, whose ancestors were all Dutch, must have been great; genuine kindness and real abundance is everywhere, anything worthless or going to ruin is nowhere to be perceived. The inhabited regions resemble the Westphalian peasant districts, upon separate islands. Great houses are built, which are planned and completed in the most elegant fashion. The furniture in them is in the best taste, nothing like which is to be seen with us, and besides so clean and neat, that altogether it surpasses every de-sept.

"The female sex is universally beautiful and delicately reared, and is finely dressed in the latest European fashion, particularly in India laces, white cottons and silk gauzes; not one of these women but would consider driving a double team the easiest of work. They drive and ride out alone, having only a negro riding behind to accompany them. Near every dwelling-house negroes (their slaves) are settled, who cultivate the most fertile land, pasture the cattle, and do all the menial work. They are Christians and are bought on the coasts of Guinea, being sold again here among the inhabitants for 50 to 120 York pounds a head; 20 York shillings are such a pound and 37 York shillings make up the value of a guinea."—From Baumleister's narrative, in Mag. of Am. Hist., I: 34–35.

Washington writes to the president of congress, acknowledging receipt "last night" of congress' resolution of Sept. 3 (q.v.), and adds: "Perceiving it to be their opinion and determination that no damage shall be done to the city in case we are obliged to abandon it, I shall take every measure in my power to prevent it."—5 Am.

Arch., II: 197.

Francis Marschall, for many years one of the city surveyors (see Je 8, 1733), dies "in an advanced Age." Rivington speaks of him as "one justly entitled to the Character of a peaceful Citizen, and a useful and worthy Member of Community."—Royal Gdn., 3, 5, 1776.

The British batteries at Hell Gate are unmasked by "fellow Trees." They were opened on the 8th, but "The Rebels only fired three guns."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.). The date of Sept. 8 is found on one of Robertson's drawings (No. 35—see II 12) entitled "View of the opening [l] of our Battery at Hell Gate upon .

Walton's house . . & the . . . Estuary, 8th Sept. 1776."

"Several Sail came in to ye Bay, under Convoy of a Man of War, some of them we supos'd to be Prizes."—Diary of James Finch (M.S.), 32.

Col. Wm. Douglas of Connecticut writes to his wife from a "Country Seat near Turtle Bay": "Our Army is now in three grand Divisions. One at the City, which is our right wing, commanded by Geo Putnam, one at and above Kings Bridge, commanded by Genl Heath, and one at and above Harlem, commanded by Genl Spencer, which is the Division that I belong to, and is called the Center Division . . ."—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 70.

In a council of war, held at the Richmond Hill house, with Washington presiding, it is voted to "arrange the army under three divisions; five thousand to remain for the defence of the City; nine thousand at Kingbridge and its dependencies . . . the remainder to occupy the intermediate space, and support either." Some officers, "in whose opinion of the enemy and opinion much confidence is to be reposed," argue for "a total and immediate removal from the city," but they are "overruled by a majority," who think that an attempt should be made "to maintain the city a little longer."—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 395–96.

The provincial convention, meeting in the Episcopal church at Fishkill, resolves "That the Committee of Safety and Correspondence at New-York be appointed and authorized to take from the doors of the houses in the city of New-York all the brass knockers, and that they cause the same to be sent to some careful person at New Ark, in New-Jersey, with all possible dispatch; that the said committee keep as accurate an account as possible of the weight and value of them, and of the houses from whence taken, in order that satisfaction may be hereafter made to the respective owners."—Jour. Prov. Cong. I: 616.

"Fairbattle" publishes an open letter to Lord Howe suggesting that "the fate of America" be decided by a pitched battle between equal numbers of British and American troops. He would have "the extensive plains of Long Island" the battlefield, and 10,000 men on each side, the armies to be "provided in all respects equal, with trains of artillery and all other offensive weapons; their, on a given signal, begin the attack and leave the issue to the God of armies."—Moore's Diary, I: 308–9, citing Penn. Econ. Post, 5, 7,

"This Day sev. Ships Sailed out of ye Bay, some to Sea & others up to Town . . . This is ye Annual of Johnsons Battle at Lake George in ye Year 1775 [5.1], a very Memorable Err for Amercians. Fitch (M.S.) says three put them, one Kemble records: "Our batteries opened early in the morning upon the Rebel Redoubt at Irons Hook; had one Sailor and one Soldier killed during the day. This Night and the following day the Rebels increased their fire, having brought down some say four, nine or six mortars. One of our 24 Pounders returned useless by running at the Muzzle."—Kemble's Jour., 57.

Washington writes to the president of Congress from headquarters at New York a full report of his plans and policies of defense. He is advised, and from experience concludes, that "the war should be defensive (it has been even called a war of posts) that we should, on all occasions, avoid a general action, or put anything to the risk, unless compelled by a necessity into which we ought never to be drawn. . . . The honour of making a brave defence does not seem to be a sufficient stimulus when the success is very doubtful, and the falling into the enemy's hands probable."

"We are now in a strong post, but not an impregnable one; nay, acknowledged by every man of judgment to be untenable. I am fully of opinion that the establishing strong posts at Mount Washington, on the upper part of this Island, and on the Jersey side opposite to it, with the assistance of the obstructions already made, and which may be improved, in the water, that not only the navigation of Hudson's River, but an easier and better communication, may be more effectually secured between the northern and southern States. . . ."

"The post at King's Bridge is naturally strong, and is well fortified. I have also removed from the city all the stores and ammunition, what is absolutely necessary for its defence. . . . The council of general officers, who met on Sept. 7 p.m., "agreed the town would not be tenable if the enemy resolved to bombard and cannonade it."—5 Am. Arch., II: 216-18; Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 392-97. For a list of the works of defence in New York, see Johnston's Campaign of 1776 around New York and Brooklyn, 84-92.

Clinton writes from "King's Bridge" to the president of the New York State convention: "By the enclosed return of my brigade, you will observe that there are wanting to complete, 596 men; that this deficiency principally arises from the different militia regiments not having furnished their quotas, and from desertion, which latter have been so frequent, that unless some effectual method can be devised to prevent, in future, not only my brigade, but the whole army will be much injured, if not ruined. . . . I know it is my duty, as well as the duty of every other officer in the service, to cause deserters to be apprehended; but it is also the duty of every friend to his country, and more particularly, so, of members of committees and officers of militia, to do without injuring the public service in any degree. I can't. If I should fail in every one of my services I shall feel it as a great public calamity, I would strive to make the deserters know their business, and I am sorry to add, are too frequently aided in evading my guards. . . ."

"From the disposition of the enemy's army and their delay, I imagine they intend attacking us in two or three different quarters; and I think it more than probable that their grand aim is to hem in our army and cut off our communication with the country; in which case, this division of our army, were it possible, should be augmented. It ought to be considered they hem us in by water on three sides. The distance across, up (as far as Moravick,) between the two rivers, does not much exceed twelve miles, though I hope their shipping won't be able to pass Fort Washington; but this is very uncertain. I mention these matters to show the necessity of the British being divided in their operations for perfect readiness; for should the enemy attempt anything of this kind so high up, it will be of the utmost consequence to fight and vanquish them before they have time to throw up any works whatever. . . . I am just informed that there are many disaffected persons near the Sound and East River, possessed of large stocks of cattle; that they neglect, which they should not, to refrain, and with part of the community, to the necessary price. It is more than probable they will fall into the hands of the enemy, where I believe the owners wish them, unless some proper measures are speedily taken to prevent it."—Pub. Papers of Geo. Clinton, I: 338-42.

9 The British batteries being completed (see S. 2), they fire upon the Americans. Sir Wm. Erskine drives them from Blackwell's Island, which the patriots had entirely captured, and also take possession of Montresor's and Buchanan's Islands. A frigate and 36 flat-boats "got up in the night to Hell Gate."—From transcript in Library of Congress of "Journal of the Operations," etc., in British Museum (Egerton MSS. 2135 f. 7). Gen. Howe reported on these movements to Lord George Germaine on Sept. 21, as follows: "Upon the Rebels abandoning their lines at Brooklyn, the King's army moved from Bed ford, leaving Lieutenant-General Heister encamped upon the Heights of Brooklyn, with two brigades of Hessians and one brigade of British at Bedford, and took five positions in the neighbourhood of Newtown, Bushwick, Hell-Gate, and Flushing. The two Islands of Montresor and Buchanan were occupied, and batteries raised against the enemy's work at Horen's Hook, commanding the passage at Hell-Gate."—5 Am. Arch., II: 378.

Kemble records: "The morning quiet, except very early, when the Cannonade was sharp. This Night began a new Battery completed in 36 hours very quietly. Mr. Sullivan returned from Philadelphia, no prospect of a Reconciliation taking place, nor could it be expected."

"Think the Rebels may derive great Advantage from our delays and have erected Batteries from New York at every Landing to Hell Gate, and a large Body Encamped on the Heights behind it. Our proposed Attack of Hell Gate Redoubt, and landing there, thought very hazardous by many. The strength of the Tides must unavoidably make our landings very difficult, as well as dangerous, from the length of time it will take between them."—Kemble's Jour., 57.

Sept. Archibald Robertson records: "Firing at the Batteries not very brisk. The Rebels disabled two of our Guns—They brought 6 mortars to play this morning & two Guns—This Evening another Battery of two Guns began our Right—Wm. Erskine with the 71st came to Hell Gate from Flushing."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

This date is found on one of Archibald Robertson's drawings (No. 36—see Jl 12), entitled "E. N. E.—View of the West end of the Sound, taken from a height on Long Island near to Hell Gate 9th Sept. 1776.

"Brigadier General Erskine sent word to the rebels, to stop the firing of small arms, and to be content with watchfulness on both sides, or else all their houses on the farther shore of the Island of Montrevor (upon which 4 12-pounders were turned) should be battered to the ground, which proposition was accepted and quiet was restored. The river between these posts is scarcely as broad as the Fulda in Hesse, but deeper and full of eddies."—From Baurmeister's narrative, in Mag. of Am. Hist., I: 35.

"Several Men of War now lie within Gun Shot of our main Battery, and the greatest Part of the Fleet behind Governor's Island, tho' they have lately had very favourable Winds to come up to the City."—N. T. Mer. S. 8, 1776.

They have been at the New York armament transmits from Headquarters at New York to Lord Howe a letter from Dr. Franklin, and expresses his willingness to forward Lord Howe's answer.—5 Am. Arch., II: 257. Lord Howe replied on Sept. 10, from the "Eagle, off Bedlow's Island," stating that he would meet Dr. Franklin "and Messrs. Adams and Rutledge a committee of congress," to-morrow morning [Sept. 11, 2 p.m., at the house on Staten Island opposite to Amboy" (the Billings house), and he made provision for possible delay.—Ibid., II: 274.

Paster Shewkirk records in his diary: "... By the measures and proceedings of the Rebel army, it appeared evident, that they intended to leave the city; for as they had begun last week, so all this week, they removed their sick, their stores, and ammunition, and gradually the soldiers marched away. They likewise took the bells out of all the Churches [see S. 1] and conveyed them away.—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 116.

"We hear that the Deputy Post-Master of this City, hath received Orders to remove his Office immediately from Dobb's Ferry, to Head-Quarters; so that the Obstruction that Correspondence hath lately met with, will now, in a great Measure, be removed."—N. T. Mer., S. 9, 1776.

The last issue of The New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury is brought out in New York by Hugh Gaine, prior to his retirement to Newark, N. J., in anticipation of the occupation of the city by the British. This was No. 1500 in his series.—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 423. See S. 21.

This month the light Inflan 7 took Possess of Bahama's & Montresor's Islands [see S. 8] the loss of one man X & one w. The Rebels by our Preparat 7 think a Land 7 intended near Walton's House, This Day they are Busy throw 7 up Breast works along the shore. The 1st Brigade went over to Bahama's Island."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).
Having now obtained the particulars, James Thacher, M.D., Sept. 1776 records in his journal the incidents of the plot against the American patriots, which was discovered on June 21 (p. 8). "Several of these miscreants," he states, "were tried and convicted, and two or three were executed. We have now ample evidence, that the tories are the most virulent and implacable of our enemies; . . . so numerous and active are the tories in the vicinity of our main army, that it has been found necessary to adopt coercive measures, and to compel them to take the oath of allegiance, as prescribed by our Congress, or to depart from our territory."—A Military Journal during the Am. Rev. War. 64.

According to a letter from Brig.-Gen. James Clinton, who is at Fort Montgomery, to Gen. Washington, four or five sloops have been sent from the upper Hudson to "bring the sick from the Hospital in New-York to Orangetown." Other boats are to be impressed for the same purpose.—Am. Arch. II: 326-77.

Franklin, Adams, and Rutledge, commissioners from congress (see S 9), meet in conference with Lord Howe in the old Christopher Billop house at Tottenville, Staten Island, in an effort to bring about a reconciliation between England and America.—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.); Kemble's Jour., 87; Mather, The Refugees of 1776 (1913), 52; Winter, VII: 12.

Howe opened the conference by remarking that, although he could not treat with the Americans as a committee of congress, his powers enabled him to consult with them as "private gentlemen of influence." He proposed that the colonies return to their allegiance to the king, intimating that in that case the oppressive acts of parliament would be revised and the instructions to governors reconsidered. The commissioners, however, recited the numerous and continued tyrannies which had impelled the colonies to declare their independence and asserted that "a return to the domination of Great Britain was not now to be expected." They said that the nation of independence had been formed by the people of the colonies in general; that every colony had approved of it, and all now considered themselves as independent states, and were settling, or had settled, their governments accordingly; so that it was not in the powers of the Congress to agree for them, that they should return to their former dependent state." In conclusion they declared that, although Howe had at present no power to treat with them as independent states, it would be easier for him to obtain fresh powers, if there were in England a real disposition toward peace, "than powers could be obtained by Congress, from the several colonies to consent to a submission." Howe thereupon put an end to the conference, as he said, "no accommodation was like to take place."—Jour. of Cong. (2nd Ed.), V: 765-66; Penn. Packet, S 24, 1776; cf. letter of Rutledge to Washington, 5 Am. Arch., 1776; also Rutledge's Jour. 1776-77, Am. Rev. War., 67-69. The committee's report of the conference is also printed in a footnote in The Candid Retrospect (see Je 30, 1780), 19-21, and Wm. Smith, commenting on the Americans' remarks concerning the colonies' desire for independence, said: "The intelligent American wants no aid to convict this report of the want of truth and good faith. Some of them were so far from the calling for independence as to suspend all authority to support it, to this hour. And when uttered it shocked, and from that instant divided the Continent, and drove its advocates to violence and distress, that demonstrated the general discontent, and their own fears."—Candid Retrospect, 20 (footnote). See also S 20.

From this day forward it was plainly to be observed, that the heavy cannon of the New York batteries diminished their fire on Gouverneurs Island, and that their sick were transported from the city to Paulus Hook. The inhabitants, who had long before taken away their effects, now carried off in the night their property, even the cattle, out of the city to the main land before New York, and the royalist inhabitants were plundered, maltreated and in part dragged off too. From Fort Bankers Hill the artillery played little upon our works, but they doubt it were along the shore between New York and Cron Point, where General Washington was often to be seen, and provoked the Hessian artillery Captain Krug to fire off 2 cannon at him and his suite, a third shot too would not have been wanting, if the horses of the enemy had been pleased to stay."—From Baumreister's narrative, in Mag. of Am.Hist., I: 36.

Pastor Shewkirk writes in his diary under Sept. 10 and 11: Sept. 11 "Night and day they were busy to bring their tents away; and it appeared plain, that there would be a change soon.

Almost daily there was firing from Long Island to Hora's Hook, and the ship yards here."—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 116. "That portion of the inhabitants who were opposed to the British rule, and friendly to Congress, took refuge mostly on the other side of the Hudson river, and found among the ancient Dutch families of Bergen, Roelckland and Orange, a transient and unquiet home until after the war."—N. Y. Cam. Adv., N 25, 1859, citing the N. Y. Observer.

Peter Elting writes to Capt. Richard Varick that "the town 12 appears . . . to be in a Bad state of defence it seems the greatest dependence Is made on the musketry." He is informed, however, "that our army is in a much better Posture of defence at Hornshook [later called 'Harris's Point']—nearly opposite 'Hurigate,' and Kingsbridge, at the later the grand stand is to be made Many Wagons & Horses about here have been Impres for Carrying the stores, Provisions & out of New York."—N. Y. City during the Am. Rev., 105-6.

Two ships of war make their appearance at Hell Gate, having come through the Sound.—N. Y. Merc. (Newark Ed.), S 21, 1776.

The British fleet, consisting of five armed vessels and 10000 men, under the command of Lord Howe, who was here 27th Sept. stated that another conference of general officers was held on the 12th, when it was determined that a removal of the army was not only prudent but absolutely necessary. He expected the immediate attack of the British.—Am. Arch., II: 336.

Evert Byvanck, a prominent merchant of New York, was among those who fled from the city as soon as the success of the British was apparent. His country-place was on the East River, near the foot of the modern Delancy St. In a letter written at the time, he gives an account of his efforts to get from New York to Horsenecke: "On Thursday, the 12th of September, I took my Chais, Horse and Negro Sam to drive, and went down to Corleers' Hook to my country seat [on the East River near the foot of Delancy St.]. The King's army had been in the city two days, and on Long Island and two of ours on Corleres' Hook, on both sides of the house, was advised not to proceed farther, but being so near my house, about three-quarters of a mile off, I went out of my Chais and ventured to walk through a Lane which led me to the back part of my place, ordering my man to follow me with Horse and Chais. A heavy cannonade still kept us; as we were going there several cannon balls flew past us, and two balls struck a post and a rail of the Lane fence we passed through breast-high just before us; however, we got safe to the back part of my Land . . . . That afternoon the Gentleman I took down with me in my Chais, came to me and importuned me to make all the haste I possibly could to get away out of imminent danger, as it was not in the least doubted but the King's Troops were preparing for landing, and by all likelihood would land that Sunday, but the next day I would or could not then escape being killed, wounded or taken prisoner, on which I took his advice, and after the firing of the Enemies' Cannon ceased, which was about six o'clock on Friday evening, 13 Sept., I ordered my man Sam to put the horse in the Chais, and I proceeded that evening as far as the hill above Harlem to the place where Mr. Law [Lawrence] Kortright had retired to, being a house belonging to Mr. Eliz. Egans of St. Croes, which I was kindly received, who told me he had removed his family to Hackensack that day, and intended in one or two days to follow them; his house and outhouses were filled with officers, attendants and their horses. About ten o'clock we were all preparing to go to bed, when a General who was there received orders to be with his several companies of Soldiers at one o'clock that night opposite, Turtle Bay or Kip's Bay, and to lay on their arms to obstruct the landing of the King's troops then hourly expected."—Whittemore, The Abel and Allied Families, 17-18.

Washington, writing to the president of congress on Sept. 14, 15 states: "Yesterday afternoon [Sept. 13] four ships of war, two of forty and two of twenty-eight guns, went up the East River, passing between Governor's Island and Long-Island, and anchored about a mile above the city, opposite Mr. Stuyvesant's, where the Rose man-of-war was lying before."—Am. Arch., II: 326. The "Journal of Operations," etc., in British Museum (Egerio MSS. 2135 f. 7), gives the names of the ships as the "Phoenix," "Roebeck," "Orpheus," and "Carryfort," and says they were "under Fire of the Rebel Batteries, above Bushwick" (i.e., on the Manhattan shore.
The four ships anchored at Horn’s Hook. The Americans were getting ready to retreat. —Solomon Nath’s Jour., 35.

“On this day,” runs Baumeister’s narrative, “General Howe wished to land upon the island of New York, because 18 years ago on this day General Wolfe had conquered Quebec, but also lost his life. The watchword for this end was ‘Quebec’ and the counter-sign ‘Wulff,’ but the frigates were too late for this attack as they only sailed out of the fleet at 5 o’clock on the evening of the 14th; 4 frigates, all of 32 guns, named Phoenix, Rhobock, Orpheus and Carysfort, moved up the East River and anchored beyond Bushwick. The rebels fired from all sides on this passage, but the vessels under cover of one of them was answered by withering fire. The damage on Governors Island had the best effect upon the Point of New York, and on the other hand the wooden watch-house on the said island suffered all the injury which the rebels intended for the battery, and not a man was lost.” —Mag. Am. Hist., 1: 35.

Gen. Johnson’s “Map of Brooklyn at the time of the Revolu- tionary War” shows the American battery at Brande Maien’s Point, north of Stuyvesant’s Meadows, and directly opposite Bushwick Creek, Brooklyn, where the “Rose” was anchored. The frigate, to escape destruction, that night took a position between Blackwell’s Island and Long Island.—See reproduction in Man. Com. Coun. (1858), 112.

Robertson writes: “I went on board the Rose at Bushwick Point with Col. S. Sherriff to reconnoitre the opposite shore of N. Y. Island. King’s Bay with appeared very strong ground—made a Sketch of it.”—Robertson’s Jour. (M.S.). This sketch may have served as the ground work of the drawing of “Kipp’s Bay 17th Aug. 1778 (q. v.),” where the Troops landed 17th Sept. 1776, preserved among the Robertson drawings in N. Y. P. L.

At 8 o’clock this evening I received orders to Attend Genl. C — who was to command the Division of Troops consisting of all the B. H. Artillery. Col. L. In & Hess & chasen {were} to be landed the next morn at Kipp’s Bay on N. Y. Island, went off immediately.”—Robertson’s Jour. (M.S.).

Lieu. Col. Lewis Morris, Jr., writes to his father an account of local movements among their friends and among the enemy. The Enemy have been in Possession of Montraseur’s Island for these four years; they had brought into the North West Point and fired several Times at your House. I suppose they will shoot it like a sieve and destroy what little is left upon the place; ... Could we have supposed that a Nation so civilized in their Manners, so christianized in their Principles, could so far have debased themselves so to extend their Acts of Oppression over a People, the Fruits of whose honest Industry were appropriated to their Advantage, and were the great source of their Riches? The Enemy, from their different Manœuvres and great Preparations intend soon to strike a decisive Blow—their Plan is to out-flank and hem us in, but I think they will be disappointed, for the Heights above Harlem and King’s Bridge are strongly manned and fortified, and all the Points up to Frog’s are strongly picketed and the avenues blocked and the Roads cut up to prevent the approaches of their artillerу. ... Old Oliver Delancey is a Colonel, and your poor Friend Woodall is killed, and that fawning, treacherous Courtier Governor Tryon lies at the Point of Death. ... This is the last Letter I shall write you in New York, perhaps it will be the last I shall ever write you for depend upon it there will soon be a Blow struck that in a great measure will determine the fate of America and liberate us from the Jaws of Tyranny.” —From Letters to Gen. Lewis Morris, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1873), VIII: 445–46.

In another letter on Sept. 18, Morris stated that, on the evening of Sept. 14, “six ships passed by our Batteries up the East River and anchored just above Mr. Stuyvinsin’s House five having passed by the night before.”—Ibid., VIII: 447. See also Winsor, VI: 283.

Pastor Shewkirk records in his diary: “In the afternoon more ships went up the East River, which being fired on again, brought on the greater smart cannonade. They continued to do damage as it was very unsafe to walk in the streets. The remaining of the Rebel army hasted away, and so did the members of the Committee, and others of the deuded people.”—Campagnie of 1776, part 2, 116–17.

Col. Babcock, in a letter of Sept. 21 to Gov. Cooke previously cited, states that, on Sept. 14, “his Excellency came and break-fasted with us at General Putnam’s, hard by the fort whereat we lodged. He further assured us he would try to assist us at General Putnam’s an hour before dinner. He did so.” Various questions were considered at this meeting of officers.—5 Am. Arch., II: 442.

The Kennedy house, No. 1 Broadway, was the headquarters of Gen. Putnam while he held his short command at New-York.—Watson’s Annual, 341. See also Ap 5, Addenda. Regarding the occupancy of the Kennedy house by Washington as headquarters, see Ap 15, and Jl 20, 1776.

Miss Moncrieffe, daughter of a Royalist, Maj. Moncrieffe, who was with Gen. Gage in Boston, having written to Gen. Putnam, was invited to his house. She relates the incident in her later memoirs thus (without date): “On the next day, he sent Colonel Webb, one of his aid de camps, to conduct me to New York. When I arrived there in the Broad-Way (a street so called), where General Putnam resided, I was received with the greatest tenderness both by Mrs. Putnam and her daughters, and on the following day, I was introduced by them to General, and Mrs. Washington [who departed on Je 26, 1781]. ... but I seldom was allowed to be alone, although sometimes indeed, I found an opportunity to escape to the gallery on the top of the house (Almost every gentle- man’s house in New-York, has a gallery, with a summer house on top), where my chief delight was to view with a telescope, our fleet and army [British] at Staten Island. ...”—Memors of Mrs. Coghlan, (Daughter of the late Major Moncrieffe), (London, 1794), 16–17.

Col. Joseph Reed writes that it is expected the headquarters of the army will be removed this evening to Kingbridge—5 Am. Arch., II: 332. The removal was made to the Morris house.—See S 16, 1776.

Capt. Francis Hutcheson, ass’t-secretary to Sir William Howe, writing on Sept. 24 to a friend in England, says that Washington remained at Richmond Hill (see Jl 10) all summer, leaving it the night before the landing of the British (Sept. 15) —Johnston, Battle of Harlem Heights, 219, citing the Haldimand MSS., British Mu- seum, posing states in The Pictorial Field-book of the Rev., II: 815, that Washington made the residence of Robert Murray on Murray Hill his headquarters on the 14th; but there appears to be no evidence to support this statement, or that he spent the night of the 14th there.—Johnston, Campaign of 1776 around N. Y. and Brooklyn, 236, footnote. See also Winsor, VI: 276.

The Landing on New York Island, was made this Morning in Kipp’s Bay, and the Town of New York, was taken Possession of this Evening by Major General Robertson, who was appointed Commandant.”—From transcript, in Library of Congress, of “Journal of the Operations,” etc., in British Museum (Egerton MSS. 2125 f. 7). The following selected extracts from contemporary sources present the principal facts which constitute our knowledge of the events of the day:

Col. Archibald Robertson writes: “at ½ past four in the morning of the 15th we began our march towards Newton Inlet where we arrived a little past 6—found the Boats ready—at 7 the Embarkat {began} & at 10 the whole were in their Boats—I went in a Boat attended by the Genl who was in Commodore Hotham’s Boat, we went down the Creek past & over the E. River & went on Board the men of War who [sic] station’d to Cover our landing—they were well Placed & very close in shore, there were a Number of the Rebels in their Breast Works where we were to land.—After being on board the Ships we return’d immediately again to the Creek & the Commodore made the Signal for the Boats to advance, by a ½ past 12 o’clock they were all rendezoued under Bushwick Point—The Signal was made by the C— to advance towards the Shore in their proper Divisions upon wth all the Ships began to fire & kept up an incessant Roar & their Guns well directed our Boats were quite covered wth smoke The scene all-together was

Grand & Noble—while we were proceeding we perceived a large Sept. Column of Rebels on our left march with their Colours flying 15 seemingly w^t an intention to throw themselves into the Breast Works where we were to land—at last about one the L^t in landed on the Rocky Hill to the Right of the Battery & Part of the Spanish fort on the Right of the Grand^t landed on the left of the Bay—w^t 40 Y^ds of their Breast Works—Genl C— & I were on the Rock upwards of two minutes before any of t^e Grand^t landed on our side & then went into the B. The horror & frrett the few inhabitants in the first house we came to were in was shocking—we pushed on in 4 Comp^s front towards the N. and in going down the Grand^t many of the Rebels running off in the greatest disorder, Genl C—desired me to run on & hold out my white Hankerchief & call to them to come in, but only one man tur'd about—after the Grand^t were form'd we halted a little & at this time the Hess^n Grand^t that were on our left fell in w^t the Rebel column & soon dispers'd them The Hessians had 5 kill'd & 10 wounded the Rebels 17 K^s & 40 w^t—We then went on to the heights of Inkleenberg about one mile in front towards King's Bridge where we halted, the L^t on our Right & a little advanced—About 2 Genl H—came up & after the 2d Embark^ arrived about 4 we moved on w^t some field pieces in front—The Rebels were drawn up before their Encampment about 2 miles in front on the heights of Harlem but on a drawn up in the position of the great part of their tents Bagage & c—& we then occupied the ground they left on to the Plains of Harlem & halted all night only Genl Vaughan wounded of the British this day. A number of the Rebels that were shut in between us & N. (N.S.), For reference to Robertson's drawing of the landing at Kipp's Bay, see Sept. 13, 1776.

"The [British] army landed . . . at the house of Mr. Foxxpost Postmaster General, in Kip's Bay. The troops immediately took possession of the house of Mr. Robert Murray, the Quacker House on Ickling Barrack [Inclenberg], a very strong point. Mr. Washington's men were driven from the posts they possessed as far as the Hill, with a Hollow way on its rear. The enemy made their opening at the 5 o'clock P.M. From Mount Morris [516th St.] at which place and near the Blue Bell [see O 12, 1753], which is three miles from King's Bridge, they were strongly posted."—Battle of Harlem Hill's, 210, citing St. James's Chron., N 16, 1776.

"Kip's Bay was the large cove which then set in from the East River at the foot of Thirty-fourth Street. It took its name from the family, who owned the adjacent estate. From this point breastworks had been thrown up along the river's bank, wherever a landing could be made, down as far as Corlies Hook or Grand Street."—Campaign of 1776 around N. Y., 232. Regarding the disposition of the American troops before the British attack, see ibid. See also Winsor, VI: 335.

The first firing was of 44 boats, with English infantry and Hess^n grenadiers under command of Lieut.-General Clinton. Commodore Hotham conducted this landing, under cover of 5 frigates, anchored close before Kaaps [Kip's] Bay, above Crown [Crow] Point, and maintained a 3 hours cannonade on the enemy's advanced posts in the great wood. The signal of the red flag denoted the departure of the boats, the blue on the contrary the storpage of the passage, and if a retreat should be necessary, a yellow flag would be shown."—From Baumreiter's narrative in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1877), I: 36.

Sir William Howe's report of Sept. 21 to Lord Germain contains the following account of the events of Sept. 15: "On the 15th instant, in the morning, three ships of war passed up the North River as far as Bloomingdale, to draw the enemy's attention to that side; and the first division of troops, consisting of the Light Infan- try, the British Reserve, the Hess^n Grenadiers, and Chasseurs, under the command of Lieutenant-General Clinton, having with him Lieutenant-General Earl Cornwallis, Major-General Vaughan, Brigadier-General Leslie, and Colonel Donop, embarked at the head of Newtown Creek, and landed about noon upon New-York Island, three miles from the town, at a place called Kipp's Bay, under the command of a forty-gun ship and three frigates, in the person of Commodore Hotham having the direction of the ships and boats.

"The Rebels had troops in their works round Kipp's Bay, but their attention being engaged in expectation of the King's troops landing at Stuyvesant's Cove, Horen's Hook, and at Harlem, which they had reason to conclude, Kepp's Bay became only a secondary object of their care. The fire of the shipping being so well directed and incessant, the enemy could not keep their ground, and the descent was made without the least opposition." He here praises the conduct of the officers and men of the Navy.

"The British immediately took post upon the commanding height of Inclenberg, and the Hessians moving towards New-York, fell in with a body of Rebels that were retiring from Stuyvesant's Cove; some firing ensued, by which a Brigadier-General, other officers, and several men of the Rebels were killed and wounded, with the loss of four men killed and eight wounded on the part of the Hessians.

"As soon as the second embarkation was landed, the troops advanced towards a corps of the enemy upon a rising ground three miles from Inclenberg, towards King's Bridge, having McGowan's Pass in their rear, which they immediately retreated to the main body of their army upon Morris's Height.

"The enemy having evacuated New-York soon after the army landed, a brigade took possession of their works in the evening.

"The prisoners made in the course of this day were about twenty officers and three hundred men. The enclosed return will show the artillery and stores taken [not printed with the report]."

"The enemy took post on a height in the N. part of the evening, was with the right to Horen's Hook, and the left at the North River, opposite to the Blue Bell [see O 12, 1753] where the enemy have their principal work, in which positions both armies still continue."—5 Am. Arch., II: 378-79.

Baumeister thus describes this phase of the capture—"This morning, at 7 o'clock the man-of-war Renome [Renome] of 40 guns sailed out of the fleet with 2 frigates, the Repulse and Bear, each of 32 guns, up the North River, and anchored above Blomenthal, the rebels fired upon this passage from Pauls Hook, but without any effect. These vessels however in sailing fired broadsides on the shore of the city of New York, on account of which the city, together with Fort Bunkers Hill, was deserted by the enemy, and about half past 10 in the morning a white flag was displayed, and the men of Admiral's fleet to the north of New York; this caused Admiral Howe to send some 100 marines into the city, to take possession of it, and to post guards in all the principal streets, by which all plundering was stopped and no one suffered any injury."—Mag. of Am. Hist., I: 37.

Pastor Shewkirk writes in his diary the following graphic description of the day's incidents: "Soon in the morning when the tide served, more ships passed up both the North and East river, and though what was yet in town of the Rebel troops got away as fast as they could, yet they fired again on the ships, as they did likewise from Powles Hook; which caused a cannonading which made the houses shake, and the sound of it was terrible. One large ball, supposed to come from Powles Hook, flew against the North church, and just opposite the G^t Church [Grace], and a part of it went into a neighboring cellar kitchen, where a negro woman was who came running over to the kitchen of the chapel-house; where also Syphers' family was, who had been there all night [see Ag 16], as they lived near the fort, where the houses were most exposed to the firing. After some time the firing ceased, and at the usual time we had the forenoon's preaching, in all stillness; the only service kept in the city. About this time the kings troops had landed on York Island, about three miles from the city; there was some slaughter, and the rebels were made to retreat towards Harlem. In the afternoon at three was the congregation meeting; but the evening preaching we thought proper to drop. There was a good deal of commotion in the town; the continental stores were broke open, and people carried off the provisions; the boats crossed to Powles' Hook back and forward yet till toward evening; some people going away and others coming in; but then the ferry boats withdrew, and the passage was stopped. Some of the king's officers from the ships came on shore, and were joyfully received by some of the inhabitants. The king's flag was put up again in the fort, and the Rebels' taken down. And thus the city was now delivered from those Usurpers who were and oppressed it so long."—Johnston, Campaign of 1776, Part 2, 177.
All accounts agree that it was impossible to remain under the fire of the men-of-war. Major Fish says that 'a Cannonade from the ships began, which far exceeded my Ideas, and which seemed to infuse a Panic thro' the whole of our Troops, &c.' Silliman speaks of the incessant fire on our lines, with grapeshot as being 'so hot' that the militia were compelled to retreat. Douglass's description is as quaint as it is expressive: 'They very suddenly began as heavy a cannonade perhaps as ever was from more ships, as they had nothing to molest them.' Lieutenant John Heinrichs, of the Hessianayers, writes: 'Last Sunday we landed under the thundering rattle of 5 men-of-war.'—Campaign of 1776 around N. T., p. 234. Ibid., p. 226. On Martin's map of Brooklyn, etc., in Man. Cosm. Com. (1855), opp. p. 112.

'All of a sudden, there came such a peal of thunder from the British shipping, that I thought my head would go with the sound.'—Ibid., part 2, 82, citing A Narrative of Some of the Adventures, Dangers and Sufferings of a Revolutionary Soldier, etc. (1850). (The author of this work was Joseph P., not James S., Marista, as erroneously stated in The Campaign of 1776.—See New Eng, Hist. and Genealog. Register, XXX: 530.) See also O. 6.

Kemble records in his journal an account of the British operations: "About 9 in the morning the Reserve, 33d and 42d Regiments excluded, Embarked in Flat Boats in Newtown Creek. The rest of the Army marched to the point of Land opposite to Kipp's Bay and embarked there; the 1st Brigade & 71st, excepted, who were to act on the left. About the 12th of Sept., the Grenadiers of the Shore, consisting of the Reserve & Donop's Corps, covered by two 40 Gun Ships and three Frigates, whose fire was both terrible and pleasing, and so terrible to the Rebels that they dare not come within half a Mile of the Shore instead of defending their Lines on the Shore. As we were going on Shore we saw a party of about 200 ... Rebels, ... marching in great haste to take possession of their Works. The Rear of Steuben's Regiment was with them. People that afterwards fell in with the Hessians. The Light Infantry Landed upon the Right of the Bay, got up a Rock, the Grenadiers &c. in it; the Light Infantry took possession of the Post on their Right; the Grenadiers, 33d and 42d. Marched thro' to Lindencroft Hill, and the Hessians to the left, where they met with a party of the Rebels, of whom they killed 39 or 40 and took about 60 prisoners. The Grenadiers met with a small party and exchanged a few shot, Maj. Gen. Vaughan the only Person Wounded and that Slightly. Our loss the whole day about 3 Killed and 16 or 18 wounded. The advance of our Army Marched to the Black Horse, and across from thence by Thorough House to North River, and had very near cut off Mr. Putnam's Retreat, who brought off the Rebel Rear Guard from New York, most of whom and their Troops in general are got by the North River Road."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1883), 88-89.

On the morning of Sept. 16, Washington prepared the rough-draft of a letter to be sent to the president of congress describing the events of Sept. 14 and 15. It was copied and dispatched immediately by Robert H. Harrison, who explained in a postscript that Washington intended to sign it, "but having rode out, and his return or where to find him uncertain," it is sent unsigned. The letter in full is as follows:

"Sir: On Saturday [Sept. 14], about sunset, six or more of the enemy's ships, one or two of which were men-of-war, passed between Governor's Island and Red-Hook and went up the East River to the station taken by those mentioned in my last. In half an hour I received two expresses, one from Colonel Sargent at Horn's Hook, (Holl-Gate,) giving an account that the enemy, to the amount of three or four thousand, had marched to the river, and were embarking for Barry's on Montrossar's Island, where numbers of them were then encamped; the other from General Mifflin, that unconnected and formidable movements were discovered among the enemy, which being confirmed by the scouts I had sent out, I proceeded to Harristown—where or at Morrisania, which was superior to it—the principal attempt to land would be made. However, nothing remarkable happened that night; but in the morning they began their operations. Their ships came up the North River as high as Bollingfordale, which put a total stop to the removal by water of any more of our provisions, etc.; and about eleven o'clock those in the East River began a most severe and heavy cannonade, to land on the grounds and cover the landing of their troops between Turtle Bay and the city, where breezeworks had been thrown up to oppose them. As soon as I heard the firing, I rode with all possible dispatch towards the place of landing, when, to my great surprise and mortification, I found the troops that had been posted in the lines retreatting with the utmost precipitation, and those ordered to support them, (Parson's and Fellows's brigades,) flying in every direction; and in the great confusion, not only leaving the exer- cisions of their generals to form them. I used every means in my power to rally and get them in some order; but my attempts were fruitless and ineffectual; and on the appearance of a small party of the enemy, not more than sixty or seventy, their disorder increased, and they ran away in the greatest confusion, without firing a single shot. Finding that no confidence was to be placed in those brigades, and not hesitating that advantage might be had in throwing the enemy to Harlem Plains and cut off the retreat to this place, I sent orders to secure the heights in the best manner with the troops that were stationed on and near them; which being done, the retreat was effected without little or no loss of men, though of a considerable part of our baggage, occasioned by this disgraceful and dastardly conduct. Most of our heavy cannon, and a part of our stores and provisions which we were about removing, were unavoidably left in the city, though every means, after it had been determined in Council to evacuate the post, had been used to prevent it. We are now [Sept. 16] encamped with the main body of the army on the Heights of Harlem, where I hope the enemy will meet with a defeat in case of an attack, if the generality of our troops should be behaved with tolerable bravery; but with experience of our Company's conduct, I am not convinced that it is rather to be wished for than expected. However, I trust that there are many who will act like men, and show themselves worthy of the blessings of freedom. I have sent out some reconnoitring parties to gain intelligence, if possible, of the disposition of the enemy, and shall inform Congress of every material event, by the earliest opportunity."—5 Am. Arch., II: 351.

In a letter written to John Augustine Washington, on Sept. 22, Gen. Washington repeats the account of the patriot forces "running away in the most disgraceful manner," and refers to the "loss of many tents, baggage, and camp equipage, which would have been easily secured, had they made the least opposition."—5 Am. Arch., II: 446. See also Washington's report on this event to Abraham Yates, Jun., president of the convention of the state of New York, dated Sept. 23.—Ibid., II: 466.

Jos. Montgomery, an officer of the Delaware regiment, writing to Caesar Rodney from Kingsbridge on Sept. 16, said that when only a few of the British put in an appearance two or three regiments of Americans ran away, "notwithstanding all the Solicitous, Prayers and I might say Tears of Genl. Washington."—From a final letter, sold as "The White's" in Phila., Sept. 23.

"The rebels, under direction of General Putnam, drew back during this landing from the shore, to the wood between Cron [Crown] Point and Bluntenthal [Bloomingdale], with a broken front, sometimes the left, sometimes the right wing in advance; when however the [British] regiments were collected in line on the shore, and the drums gave the signal for the march, not a rebel awaited our coming in order. They fled through the wood, notwithstanding General Putnam made every effort to bring back the fugitives, but it was in vain, and lucky for him, that he was able to escape on a horse. . . ."—Bauermeister's narrative, in Mag. Am. Hist., I: 37.

James Thacher, M. D., records in his journal "When retreat- ing from New York, Major General Putnam, at the head of three thousand five hundred continental troops, was in the rear and the last that left the city. In order to avoid any of the enemy that might be advancing in the direct road to the city, he made choice of a road parallel with and contiguous to the North River, till he could arrive at a certain angle, whence another road would conduct him in such a direction as that he might form a junction with our army. It so happened that a body of about eight thousand British and Hessians were at the same moment advancing on the road, which the rebels had brought them in immediate contact with General Putnam, before he could have reached the turn into the other road. Most fortunately, the British generals, seeing no prospect of engaging our troops, halted their own, and repaired to the house of a Mr. Robert Murray, a quaker and friend of our cause; Mrs. Murray treated them with cake and wine, and they were induced to tarry two hours.
or more, Governor Tryon frequently joking her about her American friends. By this happy incident General Putnam, by continuing his march, escaped a reencerounter with a greatly superior force, which must have proved fatal to his whole party. One half hour, it is said, would have sufficed for the enemy to have secured the road at the turn, and entirely cut off General Putnam's retreat. It has since become almost a common saying among our officers, that Mrs. Murray saved this part of the American army.—Military Journ. during the Am. Rev. War, 70-71. The residence of Robert Murray stood at "about the corner of the present Thirty-sixth Street and Fourth Avenue," on the slope of what was known as "Eldenberg" heights, now Murray Hill (see L. M. K., III: 966).—Campaign of 1776 around N. Y., 255, 259. A bronze tablet was erected on the site of the Murray house on Nov. 25, 1963, by the Knickerbocker Chapter, N. Y. City, Daughters of the Am. Revolution.—Cat. of the Works of Art Belonging to the City, 160. Ann. Report, Am. Scen. & Hist. Pres. Soc. (1964), 72.

"... Gen. Washington at first consented to his troops marching forward to give them battle; but on a second consideration, counter-ordered, as he could not have any dependence on the militia and the flying camp, which composed half the number then present. When the Americans were withdrawn, and no prospect of action remained, the British generals repaired to the house of Mr. Robert Murray, a gentleman of the family disposition. This was the house of the family, the rooms of the family, the manners of the family, as well as the manners of the British army. Here they remained common, as civilized as any they met with; even to the extent of being entertained to a tea for some at No. 2, or a cake or some wine. They were well pleased with the entertainment, and tarried there near upon two hours or more at the house. Tryon seating the repast, at times, by joking Mrs. Murray about her American friends, for she was known to be a steady advocate for the liberties of the country. Meanwhile, the Hessians and the British, excepting the corps which marched down the road to take possession of the city, remained upon their arms inactive; which gave General Putnam the opportunity of escaping with about 3500 men, including the guards, who had been left to shift for themselves, when Col. Glover had been ordered away from New-York... Col. Grayson has repeatedly said, speaking humorously, "Mrs. Murray saved the American army."—William Gordon, Hist. of the City of New-York and Establishment of the U. S. of Am. (1st ed., London, 1788), II: 238-239.

When Washington reached the vicinity of the Robert Murray estate, on the summit of the present Murray Hill, in the vicinity of Fourth Ave. and 36th St., he found the militia retreating in disorder along both the cross and the Post roads, and Fellows' brigade just coming on to the field. The general, with Putnam and others, was then on the rising ground in the vicinity of the present Forty-second Street reservoir. In a very short time Parsons and his regiments arrived by the Bloomingdale Road, and Washington in person directed them to form along the line of the Post Road in front of the enemy, who were rapidly advancing from Kip's Bay. 'Take the walls!' 'Take the cornfield!' he shouted; and Parsons' men quickly ran to the wall, and the soldiers of New York also were in a confused and disorderly manner. Their general did his best to get them into line on the ground, but found it impossible, they were so dispersed, and, moreover, they were now beginning to retreat..."—Campaign of 1776, 234-240. This account accords with the testimony of a court of inquiry respecting the retreat, which Johnston published in ibid, part 2, 92-95.

James Twitcher, M.D., commenting on the panic of the American troops, wrote in his journal, under date of Sept. 20: "His Excellency [Gen. Washington], distressed and enraged, drew his sword and snapped his pistols, to check them; but they continued their flight without firing a gun; and the General, regardless of his own safety, was in so much hazard, that one of his attendants seized the reins, and gave his horse a different direction."—Military Journ. during the Am. Rev. War, 70.

"... the General did all in his power to convince them they were in no danger. He led his Cane over many of the officers who showed their men the example of running. These were militia, the New England Continental Troops are much better..."—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 86.

Dr. Stiles recorded in his diary, under date of Nov. 10, a letter he had received from Gen. Greene, which stated that "The 2 Brigades run away from about 40 or fifty men, and left Gen. Washinston standing alone within an hundred yards of the Enemy. This disagreeable circumstance made the last Retreat very disgraceful..."—From the original MS. in Yale Univ. archives cited in Battle of Harlem H'ts, 163.

James Heath, in his"The American Military Artillery," said that Gen. Washington threw his hat on the ground, and exclaimed, 'Are these the men with which I am to defend America?' But several things may have weighed here—then wounds received on Long Island were yet bleeding; and the officers, if not the men, knew that the city was not to be defended. Maj. Chapman was killed, and Brig. Maj. Wyllis was taken prisoner. A few others were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. The Americans retreated up the island; and some few, who could not get out of the city that way, escaped in boats over to Paulus Hook, across the river. The house, in the fort at Horn's Hook, was set on fire by a shell, and burnt down. The fort was afterwards abandoned..."—From Gen. Heath's Memoirs, cited in Battle of Harlem H'ts, 170. See also Bancroft's observations, regarding Washington's retreat, in a bibliographical notice on the events of this day, in Hist. of the U. S. (first ed., 1866), IX: 122.

A company of artillerymen commanded by Capt. Sebastian Bauman occupied Bayard's Hill fort, and then escaped along the North River as far as the "Glass House," where after occupying a small redoubt they appropriated boats and crossed the river at night with their howitzers.—Battle of Harlem H'ts, 86-88, citing Bauman's manuscript account of the event.

In Private Martin's account of the retreat, he wrote: "... the demons of fear and disorder seemed to take full possession of all and everything on that day. When I came to the spot where the militia were fired upon, the ground was literally covered with arms, knapsacks, stores, coats, hats and old flasks, perhaps some of those from the Madeira town cellars in New York..."—Campbell, 1776, p. 46.

Maj. Nicholas Fish, writing on Sept. 19 to John McKesson, secretary of the New York convention, observed that "the Panic seized as well Officers (& those of distinction) as Men, in so much that it magnified the Number of the Enemy to thee reality & generated substances from their own shadows, which greatly assisted them in their flight to the Heights above Harlem..."—Hist. Mag., 2nd ser., Vol. 1, p. 32. 53d Independence of the U. S.

Col. Smallwood wrote to the Maryland convention on Oct. 12: "I have often read and heard of instances of cowardice, but hitherto have had but a faint idea of it till now. I never could have thought human nature subject to such baseness. I could wish the transactions of this day blotted out of the annals of America. Nothing appeared but fright, disgrace, and confusion. Let it suffice to say, that sixty Light Infantry, upon the first fire, put to flight two brigades of the Connecticut troops—wretches who, however strange it may appear, from the Brigadier-General down to the private sentinel, were caned and whipped by the Generals Washington, Putnam, and Muhlen, but even this indignity had no weight, they could not be brought to stand one shot..."

Lieut. John Heinrichs, writing on Sept. 18 at "Hornhok," [Horn Hook], thus describes the capture of Manhattan Island: "Briefly in the afternoon this part of the island was ours... I had the right wing of the out-post we marched towards King's Bridge, consequently I came close on the East River, which is lined with the finest houses. I had the pleasure of taking possession of all these houses, together with the hostile battery, where I found 5 cannons; the rebels all fled. All the houses were crammed with furniture, rural riches, and jewels; the people however had all fled, and left their slaves behind. By the next day one proprietor after another came back and joyful tears of gratitude rolled down the faces of these formerly happy people, when they found again their houses, fruits, cattle, and all their furniture, and heard from one of them, his "Weir" and that he had merely taken possession for his property back to their hands..."—Battle of Harlem H'ts, 227-228, citing Schlüzer's "Briefwechsel meistem historischen und politischen Inhalten," Vol. II, Part vii, p. 99; Jay Pamphlets. 1776

Gen. Geo. Clinton, writing from Kingsbridge on Sept. 18, to the committee of the New York convention, said, regarding the landing of the British: "Our lines were but thinly manned, as they were then intended only to secure a retreat to the rear of our army, and unfortunately by such troops as were so little disposed to stand in the way of grape-shot that the main body of them almost instantly retreated, nay, fled, without a possibility of rallying them, though General Washington himself, (who rid to the spot on hearing the cannonade) with some other General Officers, exerted themselves to effect a rally."

"The enemy, on landing, immediately formed a line across the Island. Most of our people were luckily north of it, and joined the army. The few that were in the city crossed the river, chiefly to Paulus-Hook, so that our loss in men, artillery, or stores, is very inconceivable; I don't believe it exceeds one hundred men, and I fancy more them, for their conduct would have been the same. In the evening, the enemy landed the main body of their army, took possession of the city, and marched up the Island, and encamped on the heights extending from McGown's and the Black-Horse to the North River."—5 Am. Arch., II: 38.

Gen. Greene, writing on Sept. 17 from "The Camp at Harlem Heights" to Gov. Cooke of Rhode-Island, says in regard to the retreat from Long-Island, and the evacuation of New-York: "The retreats were both judicious and necessary, our numbers being very insufficient to hold such an extent of ground. His Excellency had proposed to evacuate the city and suburbs of New York some time before the enemy made their last landing, and had the Quarter-master-General been able to furnish the necessary wagons to remove the stores and baggage, the retreat would have been effected in good order. But the enemy delayed their landing twenty-four hours longer. Almost all the old standing regiment was drawn out of the city, in order to oppose the enemy at Hell-Gate, where they made an appearance of a very large body of troops, and movements as if they intended a landing.

"We made a miserable, disorderly retreat from New-York, owing to the disorderly conduct of the Militias, who, from the appearance of the enemy's advance guard, this was General Fellows' brigade. They struck a panic into the troops in the rear, and Fellows' and Parsons' whole brigade ran away from about fifty men, and left his Excellency on the ground within eighty yards of the enemy, so vexed at the infamous conduct of the troops, that he sought death rather than life.

"The retreat was on the 14th [error for 15th] of this instant, from New-York; most of the troops got off, but we lost a prodigious deal of baggage and stores..."—5 Am. Arch., II: 369-70.

Vice Admiral Lord Viscount Howe, in a letter to Mr. Stevens, written on board the "Eagle, New York River" (East River) on Sept. 18, describes the movements of the Navy during these operations. He states, among other things, that, on the night of the 16th, the enemy fired four fireships between Forts Mott and Washington, but with no other effect than that of obliging the ships to move their stations, the Repulse excepted. The Renown returned on this side the town, but the two frigates remain still in the North River, with the Tryal armed schooner, to strengthen the left flank of the army, extending to the western shore of York Island..."—5 Am. Arch., II: 378-80.

The chaplain of an American regiment stationed at "Powles Hook" records in his journal that "After Long-Island was evacuated, it was judged impossible to hold the city of New York, and that for several days the artillery and stores of every kind had been removed, and last night the sick were ordered to Newark, in the Jerseys; but most of them could be got no farther than this place..." and Hoebuck, and as there is but one house at each of those places [evidently for the sick], many were obliged to lie in the open air till this morning, whose distress when I walked out at day-break gave me a liveller idea of the horrors of war than any thing I ever met with before...

"About eleven o'clock a furious cannonade was heard a little above New-York; and before night numbers came over from the city and informed that it was evacuated by our troops, and about supposing, thought we saw the tyrant's flag flying on Fort George."—5 Am. Arch., II: 460-61.

"The same Day the Enemy..." encamped on York Island about the Eight Mile Stone & between that & the four Mile Stone."—From letter of Gen. Geo. Clinton, dated Sept. 21, in N. Y. City during the Am. Rev. (1861), 111. A footnote states that "The eighth mile-stone on the old Boston road, measured from the old City Hall in Wall street, must not be confounded with the eighth mile-stone on the present road running north from the city. The former was, probably, near the present suburban village of Yorkville."—ibid., 111.

Gen. Howe immediately chose for his headquarters the country seat of Dr. James Beekman, on East River, near the present 52d St.; he remained there seven and a half months.—Mass. Com. Councils of 1784, 574. For a view of the house, see ibid. (1866), opp. p. 496. Cf. reference to Apthorp house, supra 21; and S 16.

According to Lossing, Washington made Mott's tavern, near the present 145d St. and Eighth Ave., his headquarters.—Pic. Field-Book of the Rev., II: 815.

A view of the city from the south-east, in pen and ink, probably drawn between this date and Sept. 21, and showing the English fleet off the north-west end of Governor's Island, is reproduced and described in Vol. I, PI. 47a. A similar view from the north-east, made during the same period from a point just north of the Rutgers house, which appears in the foreground, is shown on Pl. 47b, Vol. 1.

"The Asia, and two other ships of war proceeded up the North River, but were roughly handled by our battery at Powles Hook; and the next morning by day light, the Asia came down much faster than she went up, the three ships of war being nearly all destroyed by four of our fire ships that run in among them."—N. Y. Misc. (Newark ed.), S 21, 1776. See also 5 Am. Arch., II: 460-61.

British brigades and regiments are landed, and guards are posted "in & about New York." The general orders contain, in part, the following provisions: "Every officer, being an officer of the Royal Navy, is not bound to obey the order of the British General in New York;..." His Excellency Lt. Gen. Hester will be pleased to remove his Camp from Brook-lane to Hell Gate in Long Island & Encamp on the Heights, where the Brigade of Guards Where [were] Encamp'd;..." Capts. Grants New York Comp'y to be Posted in the Battery in Brook-lane Height & to report to Maj. Genl. Robertson Command in New-York;..." The Turtle Bay & Provost Guard is to be taken by the Brigade of Guards, & the last Night all British Troops to Guard to Mount Immediately;..." All Rebel Prisons to be Kept in New York, in the Hosp 1 or wherever M. Genl. Robertson shall Think proper;..." the Camp Equipage of The Army to be Brought Over As Soon As Possible. Magazines & Stores left in New York, are to be secured For his Majesty. The Barrack Master Genl is Ordered to take Possession of all Empty Houses, he shall judge Necessary For the More Effectually carrying on the King's Service..." and the Command 1 Officer of that Quarter will Aford him any Assistance, he may require For the Above Purpose."—From the British Orderly Book of 1776-1777, preserved in the N. Y. H. S.

"This morn a Batt'le of L. I. advanced by Jones's house on our left, but going too far were Attacked by a number of the Rebels & would have been cut off if they had not been well supported by the Generals & some field amun. Their loss is not very great; the firing lasted for some hours—Two men of War went up the N. R. & lay opposite our left Flank;—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Pastor Shewkirk's diary, under this date, states that the English troops this forenoon were "drawn up in two lines in the Broad Way; Governor Tryon and others of the officers were present, and a great concourse of people. Joy and gladness seemed to appear in all countenances, and persons who had been strangers... were now very sociable together, and friendly... The first that was done was, that all the houses of those who had a part and a share in the Rebellion were marked as forfeited..."—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 117-18.

"The Commander in chief was pleased to direct William Butler Esq. to take an account of all the derelict property, & make report every evening of his proceedings to Genl Robertson then Commander of the city."—From the "Case of William Butler, Esq." in N. Y. City during the Am. Rev., 150. This statement is followed by an account of the methods of military administration during the British occupation, with particular reference to the use of private-property for the storage of supplies, for dwelling houses, barracks, etc. See also D 27, 1777.

A resident of New York, of loyalist sympathies, wrote on Sept. 23, as follows: "The Day after the City was taken I repaired to it, and found it a most dirty, desolate and wretched Place. My House had been plundered by the Rebels of almost every thing I had left behind;—Sr. James's Chron. (London), N 7-9, 1776. Regarding the condition of the city, see also Winsor, VI: 331.
Rev. Charles Inglis returns on this same day from Long Island to the city, which, he says, exhibits "a most melancholy appearance, being deserted and pillaged. My house was plundered of everything by the rebels. My losses amount to near 200l. this day, after finding the whole coast from Cape May to New York on the East River, and from New York to Little Bloomdale [near Greenwich] on the North River, fortified with a Line of En- trrenchment, except where the Marshers obstructed it, with a Chain of Redoubts and Works from [Judge] Jones's House, across the Island to Leespenard's and Mortimer's [Mortier's] House [Rich- mond Hill] by Bayard's Mount on which they have a Fort called Bunker's Hill [see Pl. 50, Vol. I], the only Works of any Consequence or strength on the Island, and tolerably well finished. It is made of Sod. All the rest of Works (which are innumerable) appear calculated more to amuse than for use."—Kemble, Papers, 1: 88. "Flour and other Stores of no great Consequence" were also found, "with some cannon in their redoubts."—Ibid., 1: 89.

The general orders, issued from the American headquarters on Harlem Heights, and published in Morris's house, and in the Round House, are as follows: "The Arrangement for this Night," as follows: "General Clinton to form next to the North River, and extend to the left. General Scott's Brigade next to General Clinton's. Lieutenant-Colonel Sayer, of Colonel Grif- fith's Regiment, with the three companies intended for a reinforcement to-day, to form upon the left of Scott's Brigade. General Ninian's, Colonel Sargent's division, Colonel Weedon's, and Major Price's Regiment, to reinforce General Scott, and form in rear. They will also provide proper guards against his brigade upon the height, and every regiment posted upon the heights, from Morris's house to General McDouall's camp, to furnish proper guards to prevent a surprise, not less than twenty men from each regiment. General Patnam commands upon the right flank to-night; General Spencer from McDouall's brigade up to Morris's house. Should the enemy attempt to force the pass to-night, General Patnam is to apply to General Spencer for a rein- forcement."—Am. Archives, II: 381-82.

"The first priest to celebrate Mass in New York City after the British occupation was the Abbe de la Motte, an Augustinian, who was in a French ship taken over by the British, and brought for condonmation to New York." For such Catholic service, the British commander ordered him to be arrested; he was kept a "close prisoner" until he was exchanged in 1779.—Eccle. Rec., III: 1450. See also N 18.

"When the British Army took possession of New York, they found a Frenchman in Goal, under condonmation for Burglary & Robbery, whose sole offense was to set over our Prisoners to the Hospi- tal, as a Surgeon, the he knew not the least principle of the Art . . . . He caused the death of many American prisoners by poisoning.—Boudinot's Jour., op. cit., 35.

This introduces, in general, the subject of the treatment of American prisoners in the hands of the enemy during the British occupation of New York. In this connection, the name of William Cunningham, is seved in several marchal cases upon the mind (see above).—Ibid., 1774). Cunningham's dying confession on Aug. 10, 1791, regarding his atrocities in New York, stated: "I shudder at the murders I have been accessory to, both with and without orders from government, especially while in New-York, during which time there were more than 2,500 prisoners starved in the different churches, by stopping their rations, which I sold. There were also 275 American prisoners and obnoxious persons executed, out of all which number there were only about one dozen public executions, which chiefly consisted of British and Hessian deserters. The mode for private execution was thus conducted: A guard was dispatched from the Provost about half after 12, at night, to Barrack-street, and the neighborhood of Upper Barracks, to order the people to shut their window-shutters, and put out their lights, forbidding them not to presume to look out of their windows or doors, on pain of death; after which the unfortunate prisoners were conducted, gagged, just behind the Upper Barracks, and hung without ceremony, and there buried by the black pioneer of the Sept. Provost.—Genius of Liberty (Morristown, N. J.), 15, 1801. 16

For Cunningham's later history, see N. 25, 1785; A. 19, 1791. For a more particular account of the cruelties and atrocities committed by Cunningham, his report to the Pennsylvania and New York, see the Journal for Historical Recollections of Am. Events During the Revolutionary War, by Elias Boudinot (Phila., 1894), 66-79. Concerning the grievances of prisoners, see, ibid., 9-25, 95-106. See also N. 1776.

John Printard has left a description of the interior of the jail as it was under Cunningham's mis-administration. It is published in Astor's Com. Cats. Hist., 1855, 472-73.

In the battle at Harlem Heights, the British are forced to re- treat. The engagement began near what is now 130th St. and Broadway, and ended at about 107th St. and Broadway, covering the country west to Riverside Drive.—Johnston, The Battle of Harlem Heights, containing an account of the military operations of the day and a topographical description, with plans, of the battle- field. See also Winor, VI: 825, 334, 335. The principal events connected with the battle, taken from contemporary accounts, are outlined below:

The British official record reads as follows: "This day there was a smart Action near Bloomdale, in which the light infantry [British] suffered, but on being supported by the Reserve under the HoH M. Majr Gen'l Vaughan, the Rebels were defeated with great loss.—From transcription in Library of Congress; "The Operations," etc., in British Museum (Egerton MSS. 2155 f. 7).

Kemble records in his journal: "In the morning a Party of the Enemy showed themselves at Jones's House; were inconsiderately pursued by two Companies of Light Infantry who Engaged and drove a very superior Body to a great distance, supported by 42d Regiment and some Light Infantry, were fired at from a Breast work, and retired from the scene of Action, which Party were ordered to Retreat. 1 Serjeant 15 Privates KILLED; 2 Majors, 2 Captains 7 Subalterns, 5 Serjeants, 5 Drummers, & 138 Wounded."—Kemble's Jour., 89.

Lewis Morris, Jr., writes to his father from "the Heights above Harlem": "Monday Morning [Sept. 16] an advanced Party, Colonel Knowlton's Regiment, was attacked by the Enemy upon a Height a little to the South West of Day's Tavern, and after opposing them bravely & being overpowered by their Numbers they were forced to retreat and the Enemy advanced upon the Top of the Hill opposite, to that which lies before Deyes's Dower, with a Confidence of Suc- cess, and after rallying their Men by a Beguille Horn and resting themselves a little while, they descended the Hill with an Intention to carry our Flank by Storm, extended from the North River to the before mentioned Hill, but they were received and driven from the same, and a Party that went up the Hill to Flank and cut off their Retreat, that they were forced to give Way. Their loss is something considerable, ours, about forty wounded & twelve killed. The Impression it made upon the Minds of our People is a most signal Victory to us and the Defeat a considerable Mortifica- tion to them."—Lewis Morris, to General Lewis Morris, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), VIII: 447-48.

In a letter of Sept. 18, written at the Morris house, Washington continues his report to the President of Congress which he began on the morning of the 16th, and gives these particulars: "Nothing has been attempted upon a large and general plan of attack. About the time of the post's departure with my letter, the enemy was several miles from our Flank, and appears, from a good day's march, to be at least twenty five miles from Fredericksburg, the most distant post, and about two miles this then, which I could say. I immediately ordered three companies of Colonel Weedon's regiment from Virginia, under the command of Major Leitch, and Colonel Knowlton with his Rangers, composed of vol- unteers from different New-England regiments, to try to get to their rear, while a disposition was making as if to attack them in front, and thereby draw their whole attention that way. My idea of this to effect, if the men and orders, and in the appearance of our party in front, they immediately ran down the hill, took possession of some fences and bushes, and a smart firing began, but at too great a distance to do much execution on either side. The parties under Colonel Knowlton and Major Leitch un- luckily became known to those from the Eastern regiments, who were nearest the place of action. These troops charged the enemy with great intrepidity, and drove them from the wood into the plain, and were pushing them from thence, having silenced their fire in a great measure, when I judged it prudent to order a retreat, fearing the enemy, as I have since found was really the case, were sending a large body to support their party.

"... We had about forty wounded; the number of slain is not yet ascertained; but it is very inconsiderable. By a Sergeant, who deserted from the enemy and came in this morning, I find that their party was greater than I imagined. It consisted of the Second Battalion of Light Infantry, a battalion of the Royal Highlanders, and three companies of the Hessian Riflemen, under the command of Brigadier-General Leslie. The deserter reports that their loss in wounded and killed was eighteenth of their whole number; in the latter, his account is too small, as our people discovered and buried double that number. This affair I am in hopes will be attended with many salutary consequences, as it seems to have greatly inspired the whole of our troops. The Sergeant further adds, that a consider- able body of men are now encamped from the East to the North River, between the seven and eight mile-stones, under the command of General Howe, he believes, has his quarters at Mr. Apthorp's house."

He adds in a postscript: "The late losses we have sustained in our haggade and camp necessaries, have added much to our distress, which was very great before. I must therefore take the liberty of requesting Congress, to have forwarded, as soon as possible, such a supply of tents, blankets, camp-linsey, and corn, as he can get."

---5 Am. Arch., II: 351.

Writing on Sept. 17 from headquarters, at Col. Morris's house, to Gove. Cooke of Rhode-Island, Washington told the following story of the battle: "I am now encamped on the Heights above mentioned, which are so well calculated for defense, that I should hope that if the enemy make an attack, and our men will behave with tolerable resolution, they must meet with a repulse, if not a total defeat. They advanced in sight yesterday [Sept. 16] in several large bodies, but attempted nothing of a general nature, though in the forenoon there were some smart skirmishes between some of their parties and detachments sent out by me, in which I have the pleasure to inform you our men behaved with bravery and in- terpidity, putting them to flight when in open ground, and forcing them oftentimes to retreat. In the forenoon of our wounded men which fell into our hands, the appearance of blood in every place where they made their stand and on the fences as they passed, we have reason to believe they had a good many killed and wounded, though they did not leave many on the ground. In number our loss was very inconsiderable, but in the fall of Lieutenant-Colonel Knowlton, I consider it as great, being a brave and good officer; and it may be increased by the death of Major Leitch, of the Virginia regiment, who unfortunately received three balls through his side."---5 Am. Arch., II: 369. See also Washington's account, dated Sept. 25, written to Abraham Yates, Jr., president of the convention of the state of New-York.--- Ibid., II: 466-67.

--- Gene. Geo. Clinton, writing from Kingsbridge on Sept. 18, reported to the committee of the New York convention: "On Monday morning [Sept. 16], about ten o'clock, a party of the enemy, consisting of Highlanders, Hessians, the Light Infantry, Grenadiers, and English troops, (number uncertain,) attacked our advanced party, commanded by Colonel Knowlton, at Martje Davi's Fly. They were opposed with spirit, and soon made a retreat to a clear field, southwest of that about two hundred paces, where they loaded, and drove them three or four times behind a fence covered with bushes. Our people attacked them in front, and caused them to retreat a second time, leaving five dead on the spot. We pursued them to a buckwheat field on the top of a high hill, distant about four hundred paces, where they received a considerable reinforcement, with several field-1776 Another account of the death of Knowlton, by an officer who assisted him from the field, is contained in ibid., 154-55, citing the Conn. Gaz. (New London), S 27, 1776. A letter written at headquarters on Sept. 17 (by whom it does not appear), regarding the battle of Harlem Heights, states that "Yesterday morning, the Rt. Hon. the Regulators came within half a mile of our lines, and made a stand. A few of our scouts, who were out, attacked and drove them off. In two hours after, two thousand of them returned. General Beall sent out three companies of Riflemen, under the command of Major Mantz, who attacked them. Immediately General Washington reinforced with the remainder of our brigade, together with General Weedon's regiment from Virginia, Major Price's three independent companies, and one regiment of Rhode-Islanders. Never did troops go to the field with more cheerfulness and alacrity; when there began a heavy fire on both sides. It continued about one hour, when our brave Southern troops dislodged them from their posts. The enemy rallied, and our men beat them the second time. They rallied again; our troops drove them the third time, and were rushing on them, but the enemy had got on an eminence, and our troops were ordered to retreat, the General considering there might be a large number of the enemy behind the hill, concealed." Among the wounded were Captain Low and Major Leitch; and "Colonel Knowlton, from Boston, killed in the field, who distinguished himself at Bunker's Hill, as well as in this engagement. He will be interred to-day, with all the honours of war."—Ibid., p. 79-71.

It was stated in a letter from Baltimore that Maj. Leitch was in command of three companies of Colonel Weedon's regiment of Virginians. Col. Knowlton's "Rangers" were "composed of volunteers from different New-England regiments." By a Sergeant who deserted from the enemy, and came in this morning, we were informed that their party consisted of the Second Battalion of Light Infantry, a battalion of Royal Highlanders, and three companies of the Hessian Riflemen, under the command of Brigadier-General Leslie. The deserter reports that their loss, in killed and wounded, amounts to one hundred and forty, about forty of which we found dead on the field, and buried. [Cf. p. 1317.]

"On the whole, the enemy got completely defeated, which has given great spirits to our army, who are encamped on the heights at Harlem, where they are advantageously posted, and in high spirits, waiting the attack of the enemy. By letters received from New-York, we are informed that the enemy were encamped about two miles from Head-Quarters; that they were landing their artillery from Long-Island at Horn's Hook; and that an attack was shortly expected on our lines, which were very formidable."—Ibid., II: 371-72.

Capt. William King's account in his journal on the day of the battle, that in "the action on Vandalwater's Heights, near Harlem, on New York Island," he procured two brass 3-pounders, and there being no horses near McGown's, where the cannon were, he had them hauled by hand into position to prevent the Americans getting around the British left, "and 60 rounds from each were fired."—Mag. of Nat., 121.

Lient. John Henrichs, writing on Sept. 18 from a point "two yards from Hornshog," states that he was wounded in this battle and adds: "To whom could I more safely go, and who would receive me in a more friendly manner than they who had but yesterday called me their benefactor, their preserver! As I do not like noise, now still less than ever; I selected for myself, although I could have chosen a more pleasant house on the House of a New York preacher, Oglyby [or Ogly] [or Ogly of St. George's Chapel in Beckman St.] had fled with a numerous family of children and step-children. Not far distant was the house or rather the palace of her old father, who had a storehouse full of porcelain, wine, and bread, but had lost nothing from it.

"All these people came back last evening; and the emotion I felt on seeing mother and children, grandfather and grandchildren, so down to the black children of the slaves, hugging and kissing each other, so affected my wound, that I got a fever...

It is stated in the British orders of the day that: "The Com1 in Chief Entertain the Hope of the Bravery of the few troops that Yesterday heart back a Very superior Body of the Rebels, and he desires to return Thanks to the Batt2 and to the Officers and Men of the Artillery, that came to their Support, with that Expedition which so Strongly marks the Prevailing, spirit in The Army, and with Properly temper'd must Always Insure Success to his Majestys Arm's, but at the same time he finds Himself under a Necessity of Disappoiving Want of Attention in the Light Companies persuing The rebels without that proper Discretion To be Observed when their is not troops to Support.—The Gel has also much SatisfACTION in taking notice, of the steady Behaviour of the troops under the Com1 of L Gen1 Clinton, who made good the decent of this Island on the 15th Inst.—Four Days Provision from the 18th to the 24th, the exclusive will be Issued to the troops at Tickle Bay as fast as it can be Landed.—The Com2 Officers of Brigades Will press all the Waggons, and carts, in Possession of the Corps and Employ them For Bringing up Provisions for the troops Without loss of time.—From Orderly Book, British Army (MS.), in N. A letter, written by John Oosthout, Jr. (probably about 1857) to Frederic De Peyster, states that early in the Revolution, when he was a boy, his father converted the Middle Dutch Church into a riding-school for their dragonas by removing the pulpitis, gallery, pews, and flooring, his father obtained from Lord Howe permission to take down the bell, which was the one presented to the church by the will of Abraham De Peyster in 1718 (q.v.). This he stored in a secure and secret place, which it remained some years after the British army evacuated the city, until the church was repaired and reopened.—De Witt's Discourse (1857), 97-98. This bell remained in the Middle Dutch Church until it was dismantled in 1844, when it was removed to the Dutch Church in 9th St. near Broadway. It remained there until 1855, when it was placed in the Dutch Church in Lafayette Pk.—Ibid. It was later hung in the tower of the Dutch Reformed Church at Fifth Ave. and 48th St.—Brief Account of an Old Church (1904), 59.

Gen. Geo. Clinton, writing from Kingsbridge, reports to the Committee New-York Convention the events of the last few days in and around the city. Since the battle of Harlem Heights, a local harangue had happened. The enemy keep close to their lines. Our advance parties continue at their former station. We are daily throwing up works to prevent the enemy's advancing. Great attention is paid to Fort Washington, the posts opposite to it on the Jersey shore, and the obstructions in the river, which, I have reason to believe, are already effectual, so as to prevent their shipping passing; however, it is intended still to add to them, as it is of the utmost consequence to keep the enemy below us. . . ."—*Am. Gen. Glover writes, from "Burnett's Ferry" to Washington: "The Enemy are forming an encampment on the edge of the North River, about one mile below the ground where the battle was fought on Monday last. I have moved the Brigade up the hill about one and a half [miles] from the Ferry.

Colonel Bradley's Regiment is posted between my Brigade & Powhuck House. The Asia Man of war passed by that post, nine o'clock this morning. Colonel Durkee saluted her with five shot—thirty two pounders, which was not returned."—Glover Corresp., (MS.), part 2, p. 3.

Lieut. Heinrichs, a Hessien officer wounded in the battle of the 16th (p. v.), in a letter of this date, written at Harlem, near "Horn-Huck" (Horn's Hook), thus describes the city: "The Island of New York is the most beautiful island I have ever seen. No superuous trunk, no useless twig, no unnecessary stalk, can here be found. For long rows of beautiful houses bounded by orchards, meadows, and gardens full of fruit-trees, and single ones scattered over the hills, with houses attached, line both sides of the river, and present to the eye a beautiful scene. The houses, which are two stories high and painted white, are encircled by a piazza, and have a weather-vane on top. They are also surrounded by beautiful walks, and are built and furnished in the best of taste."—From "Letters of Breun and His Majesties Officers during the Am. Rev." in *Mastell's Hist. Admiral Lord Howe and Gen. Howe, "the King's Commissioners for restoring Peace to His Majesty's Colonies and Plantations in North America," issue at New York the following proclamation or "Declaration."

"Although Congress, whom the misguided Americans suffer to direct their opposition to a reestablishment of the Constitutional Government of these Provinces, have disavowed every purpose of reconciliation not consonant with their extravagant and inadmissible claim of Independence, the King's Commissioners think fit to declare that they are equally desirous to confer with His Majesty's well-affected subjects, upon the means of restoring the public tranquillity, and establishing a permanent union with every Colony as a part of the British Empire. The King being most graciously pleased to direct a revision of such of his royal instructions to his Governors as may be construed to lay an improper restraint on the freedom of legislation in any of his Colonies, and to concur in the real or shadow of which his Majesty's subjects there may think themselves aggrieved, it is recommended to the inhabitants at large to reflect seriously upon their present condition and expectations, and judge for themselves whether it be more inconsistent with their honour and happiness to offer up their lives as a sacrifice to the unjust and precarious cause in which they are engaged, or return to their allegiance, accept the blessings of peace, and to be secured in a free enjoyment of their liberties and properties, upon the true principles of the Constitution."—From one of these original broadsides, in the author's collection; see also 5 Am. Arch., I: 396.

An American "Declaration," answering this, is in the form of a tractsry, signed with the names of the Howes and purporting to be an explanation of their "Declaration."—Ibid. For another proclamation by the commissioners, see No. 70.

The Britishers of the day proclaim that: "No Officers are to take Possession of Houses in New York but by Application to Majr Genl Robertson;" "The Commissary Genl of stores & Commissary Genl of Artillery's or their deputies To attend and take Charge of all stores left by the Rebels in the Island of New York;" "A Guard of an Officer and 20 Men from the Brigade of Guards to do duty at Greenwich to Protect the boats and to Preserue order among the Seamen There—This Guard to Parade at 4 O'Clock This afternoon, A Guide will attend to Conduct them. The Capt's of Guides and all the Guides of duty to attend at head Quarters daily at Orderly time and there to remain Till Dismis'd."—Genl Earl Pearcy Orders care to be taken by the Regts not to Burn any stray Near the store houses."—From Orderly Book, British Army (MS.), in N. Washington writes from the Morris house to the president of congress, that the British "are bringing many of their heavy cannon towards the heights. . . . They have also eight or nine ships of war in the North River, which, it is said, are to cannonade our right flank, when they open their batteries against our front." He plans "to maintain the post so long as it shall appear practicable and conducive to the general good."—5 Am. Arch., I: 398–99.

The general orders, issued from "Head-Quarters, Harlem Heights," contain praise for the British policy to restrain every kind of abuse of private property. They also express complaint that "the abandoned and profligate part of our own army, countenanced by a few officers, who are lost to every sense of honour and virtue, as well as their country's good, are by rapine and plunder spreading ruin and terror wherever they go; thereby making themselves, in the opinion of the common enemy they are come to oppose. . . . The General [Washington]. . . . is determined to show no favour to officer or soldier who shall offend herein, but punish without exception every person who shall be found guilty of this most abominable practice, which, if continued, must prove the destruction of any army on earth."—5 Am. Arch., II: 413–14.

Tench Tilghman, Washington's aide, writes to his father: "An Ensign is to be tried for marauding to-day; the Genl will execute him if he can get a Court Martial to convict him."—Campaign of 1776, part 2, 87.

In a letter to the Massachusetts assembly, Washington writes "in a cursory, rough way, an account of the most material events from the battle on Long-Island to the present moment."—5 Am. Arch., II: 399–401.

Lord Howe, from the "Eagle off New-York," writes to Lord Germain: "Finding in a conversation with Mr. Sullivan, a Major General in the rebel army, taken prisoner in the action of the 27th of August [p. v.], that the leaders of the disaffected Americans, proceeded to understand the powers delegated by the King's commission, were restricted to granting pardons and declaring the Colonies at large—without authority in any matter of consequence, I thought proper to inform that gentleman, that the object of his Majesty's paternal desire was to make his American subjects happy, as well as to relieve them from the calamities of war—that the Commissioners were willing to consult and confer with any persons of influence, upon the means of attaining these ends; and that reconciliation, union and redress of grievances, might be the happy consequence. Mr. Sullivan hereupon proposed, and with General Howe's approbation, I consented, that he should go to Philadelphia, and undeceive those who appeared to entertain that confined opinion of the King's most gracious intentions. . . . On the 9th instant he returned, and acquainted me, that he had made known the sentiments I had expressed to him; and that according to the tenor of a resolution of Congress, three Deputies might be expected in this order to enquire more particularly into the grounds of the information he had communicated. . . . Although the object of this deputation apparently was to interrogate rather than to confer, General Howe concurred in opinion with me, that I should not, on that account, decline any proposition for a meeting—We thought it material to controvert the real or affected ideas before mentioned, which had probably been circulated with a view to persuade the ignorant, that the offer of peace and pardon held forth in our Declaration of the 14th of July [p. v.], was merely an artifice to disarm them, and that their liberties and properties were only to be secured by a perseverance in their resolution, to throw off all dependence upon the King and Parliament of Great-Britain. . . . In the evening of the same day I received information that Doctor Franklin, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Rutledge, would meet me, at any appointed place, on the morning of the 17th. General Howe's presence being that day necessary with the army, he could not accompany me to the meeting, which I appointed should be on Staten-Island, opposite to the town of Amboy. [For account of the conference, see S 111.]

The consequence of the result of the above-mentioned interview, we judged it necessary to publish the declaration [see S 119] inclosed in our joint letter to your Lordship of this day's date. . . . "I have only to add, that as the rebel army remains strongly posted at the north part of the island of New-York, and the inhabitants who had fled, or been compelled to leave the city, before the King's troops took possession of it, are not returned; we have not yet in our power, even were it expedient in the present moment, to effect the complete re-establishment of the Civil Government of this district."—Candid Retrospect, 21-25, citing the Parliamentary Register for 1776.

Writing to Gen. Schuyler from the Morris house, Washington briefly reviews events since the retreat from Long Island. Of the battle of Harlem Heights, he says: "This little advantage has inspired our troops prodigiously; they find that it only requires resolution and good officers to make an enemy (that they stood in too much dread of) give way." He adds: "The British army lies encamped about two miles below us; they are busy in burying over their cannon and stores from Long-Island, and we are putting ourselves in the best posture of defence that time and circumstances will admit of."—5 Am. Arch., II: 416-17.

The British orders of the day provide that "the 3d & 4th Brigades will send one Carefully woman—to attend the Gen'l Hospital at Hell gate the woman will be paid & Replied'd weekly any one that Quits her duty will be immediately sent Home,—All the facines & Pickets made for the 3d & 4th Brigades of British & the Brigade of Stern will be Carried in the Waggon belonging to the Corp's to Joneses House near the north River, those Made by the Brigade of G3a 4th & 6th Brigades to be sent in the same Manner to Major Musgrove's by Post to the Left of A'L'gowns House."—From Orders board, British Army (MS.), in N. Y. H. S., 51: 214-15.

The burning continued in New York City. In Winside, VI: 334, the many references to it in contemporary publications give a composite picture of the catastrophe which no modern summary of the facts could so graphically present. These are contained in the following excerpts from letters, newspapers, official documents, and other authoritative sources:

Kemble records in his journal: "Everything quiet till 12 at Night of the 20th & 21st in the morning, when the Town of New York took fire. The Wind blowing hard a South East. The fire was first discovered between 12 & 1 o'Clock in that block of Houses fronting Mr. Watts's and near the Exchange, in a House facing the Water; from thence it ranged up the Broadway and Broad Street to the City Hall, one way, and near Smillie's, the other, at Flattenberg Hill. The other side of the Broad way was all consumed from Cortlands House to Hill's Tavern and from thence to St. Paul's Church, with all the buildings back of that to the North River.

"Many People taken up and confined on suspicion of setting the Town on fire, and it is not to be doubted; but it was done by design, Combustibles, Matches, & having been found in Houses since, kid under stairways, and ready for another Conflagration."—Kemble's Journal, in E. P. Kemble, Hist. of N. Am. War, (1794), I: 208-9, The German Allied Troops in the No. American War of Independence, translated from the German of Max von Ebeling by J. C. Rosengarten (1893), 42.

Fitch records in his diary: "About one o'Clock in y'evening We Observe'd a Considerable Light up toward y'e Northward, which we sosposal'd to be y'evening of some Buildings; this Light continued while Day, & some Time in y'evening we were Informed y'it was in y'evening of N. York, & y'of a considerable part of y'even City was burnt, but we are yet Scarcely able to believe this Report."—Diary of John Fitch (MS.), 46.

A letter, written by a loyalist in New York on Sept. 23, states: "I flattered myself that the City would soon be peopled again, and that Matters would speedily be restored to their former State; but our Calamities were determined to frustrate this Expectation. The Destruction of the City was resolved on, and a Number of Villains remained in the City concealed to execute this most diabolical Purpose. Accordingly, on the Thursday following, when every Thing was very dry, and a brisk southerly Wind blew, some of them set Fire to the Houses near Whitehall. The Fire instantly spread and raged with inconceivable Violence. There were a few Citizens in Town; the Fire-Engines and Pumps were out of Order, Two Regiments of Soldiers were immediately ordered into Town, and many Boats full of Men were sent from the Fleet; to these, under Providence, it is owing that the whole City was not reduced to Ashes. The Destruction was very great; between a third and fourth of the City is burnt. All that is West of the New Exchange, along Wall street to the North River, as high as the City Hall, and from thence along the Broad Way and North River to King's College, is in Ruins. St. Paul's Church and the College were saved with the utmost Difficulty. Trinity Church, the Lutheran Church, the Parsonage, and Charity School, are destroyed. Many of the Villains were apprehended, with Matches in their Hands [sic] to set Fire to the Houses. A Fellow was seized, just about to set Fire to the College, who acknowledged he was employed for the Purposes of a New England Planter, with Matches in his Pocket, who acknowledged the same. Between 1000 and 1500 Houses are burnt; and we are under the most dismal Apprehension that there are some more of those Villains concealed in Town to burn what is yet left. Our Distresses were great before, but this Calamity has increased them tenfold. Thousands are hereby reduced to Beggary. This Infernal Scheme was confederally executed to prevent the King's Troops from having any Benefit by the City, and to distress the Friends of Government. . . the Continental Congress gave express Orders to burn this City if not tenable against the British Fleet and Army [per contra, see § 3]. The City was set on Fire in four different Places at the same Time. Poor Trinity Church, a principal Object of Republican Independent Malice, was set on Fire in three Places.—St. James's Crew, N, 7-9, 1776. Mr. Shelton, in The Jewel Marriage, 47 and 64, calls attention to the fact that the portion of this account referring to "A New England Captain" was omitted from the transcription in the 5 Am. Arch., III: 461. He presents other significant records which tend to confirm the opinion that the "Captain" referred to was Nathan Hale.

Ezra Stiles states in his diary, under date of Nov. 25, 1776, that of the many different reports of the fire, the following was the way it was related in "Mr Gainer's N. York Mercury of 28. Sept. printed at New-Wark."—Literary Diary of Ezra Stiles, II: 81-84. That account states:

". . . That the fire originated at or near Whitehall, soon extended to the Exchange, took its course up the west side of Broadway as far as Verlafften Hill, consuming all the blocks from the Whitehall up. The flames extended across the Broadway from the house of Mr. David Johnston to Beaver Lane, or Finch's Alley, on the west, and carried all before it, a few buildings excepted, to the house at the corner of Berkeley-street, wherein the late Mr. Adam Vandenbergh lived, sweeping all the cross streets in the way. The buildings left standing on the west-side of the Broadway are supposed to be Captain Thomas Randall's, Capt. Kenney's, Dr. Malless's, Mr. John Cortlandt's sugar house and dwelling house, Dr. Jones's, Hull's tavern, St. Paul's, Mr. Axtell's and Mr. Rutherford's. The cause of the fire is no[ ] known. We imagine about a 6th part of the whole city is destroyed, and many families have lost their All."—N. Y. Merc. (Newark ed.), S 28, 1776.

Stiles also stated that "There is another N York Mercury printed in the City of N. Y, at the printing office Mr. Gaines left where by a baseness, that is, by a removal of preserved. In that of Oct. this Burning is ascribed to the N Eng'g pple, as that of Rome was to the Christians."—Literary Diary of Ezra Stiles, II: 83-84. The mention of the fire, to which Stiles refers was as follows: "The savage burning of this City by the New-England Incendiaries, will be a lasting Monument of their inveterate Malice against the Trade and Prosperity of this Colony, as well as their rooted Disaffection to British Law and Government. They had long threat- ened the Performance of this villainous Deed; and this is the best Return that the People of Property in this City, who have espoused their Cause, are to expect for their heedless Credulity."—N. Y. Merc., O 7, 1776.

The same paper of two days later (Sept. 30) gives the following full account: "On Saturday the 21st Instant, we had a terrible Fire in this City, which began about Oct. 9th, in the South Part of the City, and spread towards the Center, and is nearly a fourth of the whole City. The following is the best Ac- count we can collect of this melancholy Event. The fire broke out first at the most southerly Part of the City, near White-Hall; and was discovered between 12 and 1 o'Clock in the Morning, the Wind blowing very fresh from the South, and the Weather exceedingly dry. The Rebel Army having carried off all the Bells of the City, the Alarm could not be speedily communicated; and very few of the Citizens were in Town, most of them being driven out by the Calamities of War, and several of the first Rank sent Prisoners to New-England, and other distant Parts. A few Minutes after the fire was discovered at White-Hall, it was observed to break out in five or six other Places, at a considerable Distance. Mr. Robert Jones, who had the Chief Com- mand, sent immediately for two Regiments that were encamped near the City, placed Guards in several Streets, and took every other Precaution that was practicable to ward off the impending ruin. Lord Howe ordered the Boats of the Fleet to be manned, and after landing a large Number of Officers and Seamen to assist us, the Mens were so much in the City in the North and East Rivers; and the Lines near the Royal Armies were extended across the Island, as it manifestly appeared the City was designedly set on Fire.

"The Fire . . . swept away all the Buildings between Broad Street and the North-River, almost as high as the City-Hall; and from thence, all the Houses between Broad-Way and the North-River, as far as King's College, a few only excepted. Long before the main Fire reached Trinity Church, that large, ancient and venerable Edifice was in Flames, which baffled every Effort to suppress them. The Steeple, which was 140 Feet high, the upper Part of Wood, and placed on an elevated Situation, resembled a vast Pyramid of Fire, and exhibited a most grand and awful Spectacle. Several Women and Children perished in the Fire, their Shrieks, joined to the roaring of the Flames, the Crash of falling Houses, and the wide spread ruin which every where appeared, formed a scene of Horror grand beyond Description, and which was still heightened by the Darkness of the Night. Besides Trinity Church, the Rector's House, the Charity School, the old Lutheran Church, and many other fine Buildings were consumed. St. Paul's Church and King's College were in the Line of Fire, but saved with very great Difficulty. After raging about 10 Hours, the Fire was extinguished between 10 and 11 o'Clock, A. M.

". . . several Persons were discovered with large Bundles of Matches, dipped in melted Rosin and Brimstone, and attempting to set Fire to the Houses. A New-England Man, who had a Captains Commission under the Continental Congress, and in their Service, was seized with these dreadful Implements of Ruin—on being searched, the Sum of gold was found upon him. General Robertson rescued two of those Incendiaries from the enraged Populace, who had otherwise consigned them to the Flames, and reserved them for the Hand of deliberate Justice. One Wright White, a Carpenter, was observed to cut the Leather Buckets which conveyed Water—he also wounded, with a Cutlass, a Woman who was very young and pretty. This provoked the Spectators to such a Degree, that they instantly hung him up. One of those Villains set Fire to the College, and was seized; many others were detected in the like Crime, and secured."

"The Officers of the Army and Navy, the Seamen and Soldiers greatly exerted themselves, often with the utmost Hazard to themselves, and showed all that Alertness and Activity for which they are justly celebrated on such Occasions. To their vigorous Efforts in pulling down such Wooden Buildings as would conduct the Fire, it is owing, under Providence, that the whole City was not consumed; for the Number of Inhabitants was small, the Pumps and Fire-Engines were very much out of Order. This last Circumstance, together with the Removal of our Bells, the Time and Place of the Fire's breaking out, when the Wind was South, the City's being set on Fire in so many different Places nearly at the same Time, so many Incendiaries being caught in the Fact of setting Fire to Houses: these, to mention no other Particulars, clearly evince beyond the Possibility of Doubt that this diabolical Affair was the Result of a preconcerted, deliberate Scheme. Thus, the Persons who called themselves our Friends and Protectors, were the Perpetrators of this atrocious Deed; which in Guilt and Villainy is not inferior to the Gun-Powder Plot. Whilst those who were held up as our Enemies, were the People who gallantly stpt forth, at the Risque of their Lives, to snatch us from Destruction! Our Distresses were very great indeed before; but this Disaster has increased them tenfold. Many Hundreds of Families have lost their all; and are reduced from a State of Affluence to the lowest Ebb of Want and Wretchedness—"institutio of Shelter, Food or Clothing. . . ."—N. Y. S. Merc., S 39, 1776.

"The London papers attributed the story to 'Major Rook,' formerly aide-de-camp to General Gage, and a noted paragraph writer in the 'Massachusetts Gazette.'"—Wm. H. Shelton in The Jumel Mansion (1916), 45. (Mr. Shelton, in this work, presents evidence tending to show that the New England captain mentioned in this account is the same as Nathaniel Hale.) "For some reason this graphic account of the great fire in New York is omitted from Force's 'American Archives,' where almost every reference to that event has found a place."—Ibid., 47 and 64.

There are several other accounts worthy of special notice. The following was written by David Grim for the N. Y. Hist. Soc.: Sept. 21-22, 1776

"This fire of 1776 commenced in a small wooden house, on the wharf near the White Hall Slip, it was then occupied by a number of men and women of a bad character; . . . There being very few inhabitants in the city, it spread and burned with great rapidity, carrying with it the buildings in the vicinity. . . . Building on both sides of the Broadway with some few houses in New Street to Rector Street, and to John Harrison, Esq., three story brick house, which house stopped the fire on the E side of the Broadway; from thence it continued burning all the houses in Lumbard Street, and those in the rear of the houses on the W side of Broadway to St. Paul's Church there continued burning the houses on both sides of Partition Street, and all the houses in the rear [again] of the W side of the Broadway to the N. River.

"The fire did not stop, until it got into Mortick Street, now Barclay Street. The College yard and the vacant grounds in the rear of the same, put an end to this awful and tremendous fire.

"The next morning, the line of fire reached Trinity Church, being burned was occasioned by the flames of the fire that fell on the Side of the roof. The contrary winds fanned those flakes of fire, in a short time to an amazing blaze, it soon became out of the Human power to extinguish the same; The roof of this noble Edifice was so steep that no person could go on it.

"St. Paul's Church; was in like perilous situation. The roof being flat, with a balustrade on the eves; a number of the citizens went on the same, and extinguished the flakes of fire, as they fell on the roof. Thus happily was this beautiful habitation saved from the destruction of this dreadful fire [which] threatened the ruin thereof, and that of the whole city.

"The Lutheran Church, being contiguous to houses adjoining, it was impossible, to save it from destruction, this fire was so furious and violently hot, that no person could go near it. And there were few engines that were not hot at the corner of Canal and Roosevelt Streets; several of the citizens were sent to the provost guard for examination, some of them remained there two or three days, until they could give satisfactory evidence of their Loyalty."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1870), 275.

"Grim's account is accompanied by a plan of the city ("within the Palisades which were erected in the year 1745"), showing the course of this fire and also that of Aug. 5, 1778 (p. 14). It indicates the sites of the prominent buildings of the period. This plan is owned by the N. Y. Hist. Soc., and was reproduced in Man. Com. Coun. (1866), p. 766. No other map of the burred district appears of record.

"To this account, William Dunlap, writing in 1840, adds: 'Over the ruins of this fire I have wandered, when a boy, in every direction. It will be observed, by Mr. Grim's account, that the houses on the west side of Broadway, and which were south of Beaver street, escaped the conflagration; and it was in these, that the English generals lived—what is now No. 1, being head-quarters. I must observe, that the houses in Broadway, north of Trinity church yard, were not burned. The City Tavern was on part of the present Caledonian Hotel. Between this and St. Paul's church the houses were small and most of them of wood. The last brick houses in the town were next beyond the church. The ruins on the south-east side of the town were converted into dwelling places by using the chimneys and parts of walls which were firm, 21 [see Ag 26, 1783] and was the receptacle and resort of the vilest drags brought by the army and navy of Britain, with the hitherto of those who fled to them for refuge.——Dunlap, Hist. of the New Netherlands, et al., II: 79.

Washington reported very briefly to the president of congress, from Headquarters on the Heights of Harlem, on Sept. 23, that "On Friday night [Sept. 20–21], about eleven or twelve o'clock, a fire broke out... which continued to burn pretty rapidly till after sunrise the next morning." He added that he was not informed "how the accident happened, nor received any certain information of the damage."——5 Am. Arch., II: 454.

Writing on the same day to Gov. Trumell, Washington stated that "the gentleman who brought the letter from General Howe last night [Sept. 22], and who was one of his Aids-de-Camp, informed Colonel Reed that several of our countrymen had been punished with various deaths on account of it, some by hanging, others by burning, &c.; alleging that they were apprehended when committing the fact."——Ibid., II: 466.

Sir Wm. Howe, in his report to Lord Geo. Germain, dated Sept. 23, states that the fire occurred "Between the 20th and 21st instant, at midnight." He attributed it to "a number of writhers," who "succeeded too well," having set the town on fire "in several places with matches and combustibles that had been prepared with great art and ingenuity." He says that "Many were detected in the fact, and several fell upon the spot under arms upon the Garrisons; and had it not been for the exertions of Major-General Robertson, the officers under his command in the town, and the brigade of Guards detached from the camp, the whole must infallibly have been consumed, as the night was extremely windy.

"The destruction is computed to be about one-quarter of the town..."——5 Am. Arch., II: 462–63 (see also 305, 306, 307, 308). Writing on Sept. 25, P. G. F. P., gives the following account of the burning of the city: "Several rebels secluded themselves in the houses, to execute the diabolical purpose of destroying the city. On the Saturday following an opportunity presented itself; for the weather being very dry, and the wind blowing fresh, they set fire to the city in several places at the same time, between twelve and one o'clock in the morning. The fire raged with the utmost fury, and, in its destructive progress, consumed about 1000 houses, or a fourth part of the whole city. To the vigorous efforts of the officers of the army and navy, and of the soldiers and seamen it is owing, under Providence, that the whole city was not destroyed. We had three churches, of which Trinity Church was the oldest and largest. It was a venerable edifice, had an excellent organ which cost $400 sterling, and was otherwise of great value. This church and the charity school—the two latter, large expensive buildings—were burned. St. Paul's Church and King's College had shared the same fate, being directly on the line of fire, had I not been providentially on the spot, and sent a number of people with water on the roof of each. Our houses are all covered with cedar shingles, which makes fire very dangerous. The church corporation had suffered prodigiously, as was evidently intended. Besides the buildings already mentioned, about 200 houses, which stood on the church ground, were consumed; so that the loss cannot be estimated at less than $25,000 sterling. This melancholy accident, and the principal scene of war being here, will occasion the Clergy of this city to be the greatest sufferers of any on the continent by the present rebellion."——Doc. Hist. N. Y. (4th ed.), III: 645. On June 6, 1777 (q.v.), an exact estimate of Trinity's losses was ascertained.

The chaplain of Col. Durkee's regiment at Pouch's Hook writes in his journal: "... had not the wind as it veered to the west died away, the remainder of that nest of vipers would have been destroyed."——5 Am. Arch., II: 461. See also the graphic description of the fire, recorded by a Loyalist eyewitness, in Pastor Sheekirk's diary, pub. in Campaign in 1776, part 2, 118–19.

Gen. Robertson's house was one of those burned. Instead of using one of the engines to save it, he used it to save the king's ships and magazines, and thus saved stores worth £20,000, while he lost his house which cost him £2,000. In 1780, he wrote to the commissioners of the treasury asking for reimbursement.—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 798–99.

A letter, written on Sept. 26 from the camp of the Americans at Harlem, states "Our friends were suspected."——Conn. Gen. (New London), O 11, 1776. The question of the origin of the fire must have been a mooted question from the day of its occurrence until after the war. One early newspaper mention of the subject follows: "Slanderous reports have been made that the late conflagration of N. York was the act of the friends of America. It is a fact that many thousands of innocent persons [who] were found there by the King's troops were confined in various churches on suspicion. The probable cause is that Lord Howe's seamen going ashore for a frolic carelessly set a house on fire at White Hall Slip and that a high wind easily spread it."——Penn. Jour. (Philia.), N 20, 1776.

Col. Robertson records in his journal: "About this morning the Town of N York was set on fire in many places, by Rebels that had lain concealed from the 16th the wind being high near 3 of the Best houses were burnt down Sev of the Rascals were taken in the fact of faggots dipp'd in Brinestone."——Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Reporting to Lord Germain on Sept. 24 regarding the fire, Gov. Tryon says, among other things: "Many of the incendiaries are now in confinement and two or three were killed as they were detected in their hellish design. Many circumstances lead to conjecture that Mr. Washington was privy to this villainous act, as he sent all the bells of the churches out of town, under pretence of casting them into cannon; whereas, it is much more probable to prevent the alarm being given by ringing of the bells before the fire should get ahead beyond the reach of engines and buckets; besides, some letters of Mr. Washington were found burnt and burnt over, and were disposed for this devilish purpose. The town was thought to be saved more by a sudden change in the wind (which blew strong) and pulling down intermediate houses, than by water. It is affecting to view the wretched and miserable inhabitants who have lost their all, and numbers of reputable shop-keepers that are reduced to beggary, and many in want for their families of the necessities of life. The fire being planted out in Broad-street near at the same time, but was first discovered at Whitehall stairs, and has burnt the whole body of the buildings that lies between George street and Broad-street, as high up as the City Hall, and all the buildings on the north of Fort George, lying between the North River and Great George street, as far up as King's College, excepting a few houses and St. Paul's Church; and almost all the houses on the church estate, with Trinity Church, are totally consumed. The ship-docks, warehouses, and the commercial part of the city is as yet safe, and every measure pursued by General Robertson, commanding officer in New-York, assisted by myself, to establish such regulations and police as may ensure its future security. I was at Flatbush, at Mr. Axtell's four miles from the city, for the recovery of my health and strength, when this dreadful event befell this dear City: 49 years of age.

John Sloss Hobart, writing from the camp at Kingbridge regarding the fire, says: "... The city is burnt from the Bowling-Green, on the west side of the Broadway, to the College, except the buildings of Mr. J. Cortland and Mr. Rutherford's houses; and on the east side to within two doors of the house lately occupied by General McDougall, and the west side of Broad-street from the Exchange to Vesey's St. Green. General Howe disclaims any knowledge of the matter till the city was in flames; in order to evince his sincerity, we are told he threw several persons, suspected of being concerned, into the flames; several others were hung up by the heels, and afterwards had their throats cut. This, we suppose, has been done in order to take the odium of such a crime from the actual committing of it. The most rational conjecture is, that the cause of the fire is, that the army, having been promised the plunder of the town in case of conquest, and finding from their late repulse that such an event is rather too far distant for their impatience, have set fire to the town in order to facilitate their views."——5 Am. Arch., II: 503.

Pastor Sheekirk's diary states: "The fire was then in the lower part of Broad street, Stone street, &c.; it spread so violently that all what was done was but of little effect; if one was in one street and looked about, it broke out already again in another street above; and thus it raged all the night, and till about noon. The wind was pretty high from southeast, and drove the flames to the northwest. It broke out about White Hall; destroyed a part of Broad street, Stone street, Beaver street, the Broadway, and then the streets going to the North River, and all along the North river as far as the King's College. Great pain was taken to save Trinity church, the oldest and largest of the English churches, but in vain; it was destroyed, as also the old Lutheran church, and St. Paul's, at the upper end of Broadway, escaped very narrowly. . . .

There is great reason to suspect that some wicked incendiaries had a hand in this dreadful fire, which has consumed the fourth part of the city; several persons have been apprehended; moreover, there were few hands of the inhabitants to assist; the bells being carried off, no timely alarm was given; the engines were out of order; the fire company broke; and also no proper order and directions, &c.; all which contributed to the spreading of the flames.—Johnson, Campaigns of 1776, part 2, 119.

Baumeister records on Sept. 24: "... nearly 500 of the houses were and one church were the sacrifice to this rebellious fury. There are many villains caught and under arrest, others were thrown into the flames, and one a sworn rebel, whose wife and 5 children could not induce him to give up this incendiary, stabbing his wife, who was about to extinguish the fire with water. was seized by the sailors, at once stabbed and hung up by the feet before his own house until daybreak of the 20th [error, evidently, for 21st]. The English guard was of much assistance in suppressing the fire, hastening into the city at once, but the sailors did the best part of it, taking care to pay themselves well by plundering other houses near by that were not on fire. It is a real horror to look at New York in its desolation."—Mag. of Am. Hist., 1: 38.

Regarding the burning of Trinity Church, see the sketch of the ruins, reproduced as Pl. 49, and described on pp. 362-365, Vol. III, Hist. Am. City. 1776 states that the body of the church was 105 ft. long, the chancel 16 ft. long, the steeple 52 ft. square, the whole length 153 ft.; the breadth of the church 73 ft., and the spire 180 ft. high. The organ, consisting of 25 stops, and costing 850 guineas, was estimated by the best judges to be "as good a one as any in London of the Price."—N. Y. Merc., O 7, 1776. The church also contained "several pieces of hand-painted, and some very beautiful marble monuments." The windows were of leaded glass. The edifice was "embosomed" by "joyful trees."—N. Y. Mag., Jan, 1790 (I: 3).

The loss on Trinity Church property amounted to $22,200, and in rentals of ground lots on which the tenants' buildings burned, $536.—Trin. Min. (M.S.), Je 9, 1777. See also Dr. Archibald's letter of Nov. 20.

The Lutheran Church, which stood on the south-west corner of Broadway and Rector St., and was consumed in this fire, was never rebuilt. The site was known for many years as the "Burnt Lutheran Church." For a view and description of this church in 1799, see Pl. 68-a, Vol. I. On Oct. 28, the Rev. Bernard House, minister of the "Lutheran Trinity-Church," which was destroyed "with its good organs," added that it should be a matter of regret that it should have been burnt; the 850 guineas it contained was the result of the previous recovery of any articles that were saved.—N. Y. Merc., O 28, 1776.

It is said that the house, belonging to a devout German, in Wall Street, in which a small Catholic congregation worshiped just prior to the Revolution, was also burned.—Eccles. Recs, III: 1405.

The block on the west side of Broadway, opposite Bowling Green, escaped destruction, and its pre-Revolution, colonial, appearance was preserved for many years.—Man. Com. Coun. (1866), 515 passim.

Letters from New York, dated Sept. 23, state that "the Rebel Incendiaries having placed a large Quantity of Combustibles in the Ceilings of several Houses in that Part of the Town called Whitehall, set Fire to them. . . ." The wing of King's College is much damaged; but the main Building, with the Library, is saved. Nearly 1,600 houses were burnt by this atrocious Act, which was conducted by one William Smith, an Officer in a New England Regiment, who was taken with a Match in his Hand, and sacrificed on the Spot to the Fury of the Soldiers." Another letter states that "the first Incendiary who fell into the Hands of the Troops was a Woman, provided with Matches and Combustibles; but that her Sex saved her little, for without Ceremony, she was tossed into the flames, while burnt by this atrocity. Some others, following a Chain of Buckets, in order to prevent their being made Use of in extinguishing the Conflagration; . . . they were instantly thrown into the Flames after her."—St. James's Chren., N 9-12, 1776. Edmund Burke, in a glowing tribute in the house of commons on Nov. 6, 1776, extolled the noble patriotism of this woman who became a victim in opposition to British tyranny.—The Parl. Rec., VI: 60.

Charges of inhuman barbarity, made by both Americans and British against each other, were frequent. A British soldier, writing from New York on Sept. 22, says: "We are at length in Possession of this City, and I suppose upwards of five thousand Inhabitants have remained in it; . . . I mean the New- Yorkers, not the New-England Saints, some of whom I find still held for the willful Purpose of setting Fire to the City, which is really believed, was concerted by some of the great ones among the Rebels, and that the poor Wretches who did the Business were only their Tools. . . Some of the Incendiaries were found at their hellish Work, and killed by the Soldiery in their Fury on the Spot. The Guards and Hessians in every Engagement in which they have been concerned have fought like Devils. The Report which was circulated in London, that they would desert and go over to the Enemy, 'tis very supposed has spirited them up to behave so very courageously. It is thought that the Army will be at Philadelphia before Christmas, as most of the Provincials are sick of the Business."—St. James's Chron., N 2-5, 1776.

Another British soldier, one James Dewartt, in a letter written on Sept. 25 on board the frigate "Mercury," said: "One of the fellows who set fire to this town cut a poor woman's arm off for attempting to extinguish the fire in her own house, but a party of soldiers coming up ran their bayonets through him, and some of the seamen hoisted him up by the heels to a sign post: there are upward of 600 suspected persons taken up and imprisoned in the town."—Ibid., N 16-19, 1776.

An American officer at Harlem, in a letter of Sept. 25, wrote: "But, from the best accounts, we learn, that about a quarter part of the city of New York is burnt, and that it was purposely fired by some private persons. Since this fire, the enemy have practiced some inhuman cruelties on the unfortunate wretches they have in their power, under pretence of their being concerned in the plot. They have hanged numbers by the feet, and then cut their throats. The Hessians are continually plundering, and are countenanced by their General; and General Howe does not publish any fear of producing a general mutiny."—Am. Arch., II: 534.

The American committee of secret correspondence, in its long review of events prior to Oct. 1, 1776, stated: "The enemy charged some stragglers of our people that happened to be in New-York with having set the city on fire designedly, and that took that occasion, as we are told, to exercise some inhuman cruelties on those poor wretches that were in their power. They will no doubt endeavour to throw the odium of such a measure on us; but in this they will fail, for General Washington, previous to the evacuation of that city, whilst it was in his power to do so as he pleased with it, desired to know the sense of Congress respecting the destruction of the city, as many officers had given it as their opinion it would be an advisable measure; but Congress resolved left the city as it was, and that they had no doubt of being able to take it back at a future day [see S 3, 4, 5, and 6]. This will convince all the world we had no desire to burn towns or destroy cities, but that we left such meritorious works to grace the history of our enemies."—Ibid., II: 486, see also Marshall, Life of Washington, II: 464.

A letter of Oct. 9, 1776, states: "Only one man who was caught setting fire to his own house, was shot up in it, and consumed to ashes with his property;" that "the shipping in the river, during the conflagration, was with much difficulty saved, and (agreeable to former accounts) only about 1000 destroyed."—Man. Com. Coun. (1866), 778. For the result of an official investigation by the British, see O 18, 1785.

Lieut. Trench Tilghman, writing on Sept. 25 to his father, says: "Reports concerning the burning of the City to New York, if it was done designedly, it was without the knowledge or Approval of any commanding officer in the army, and indeed so much time had elapsed between our quitting the City and the fire, that it can never be fairly attributed to the Army. Indeed every man belonging to the Army, who remained in or were found near the City were made prisoners. Many Acts of barbarous cruelty were committed upon poor creatures who were passing by the flames from the fires. Soldiers and Sailors looked upon all who were not in the military line as guilty, and burnt and cut to pieces many. But this I am sure was not by Order. Some were executed next day upon good Grounds."—Memor of Lieut. Col. Trench Tilghman (1785), 140.

Col. Silliman, in a letter to his wife, on Sept. 25, says: "I believe it was not the regulars, but some of our own people in the city that set it on fire, for they executed several of our friends there for it the next day."—Shelton, Jumpl Mansion (1916), 51.
A letter written from Harlem on Sept. 26 states: “Our friends were immediately suspected and according to the report of a negro who came to our lines soon after, those that were found in or near the spot were pitched into the configuration, some hanged by the heels, others by their necks with their throats cut. Inhuman barbarity! One Hale in New York, on suspicion of being a spy, was taken up and dragged without ceremony to the execution post, and hung up.” (See S 22.)—Am. Arch., II: 54.

A printed communique, issued by the British commander and signed by John Hancock, is “found in the pocket of a Provincial Officer, who was detected in setting fire to some of the houses in New York, and put to death by the soldiers.” It showed him to be First Lieutenant Richard Brown of the second company of riflemen in the second regiment of foot, commanded by Col. William Thomason.—London Packet, P. 4, 1776. According to Heatman’s Hist. Reg. of the Cont. Army, a Pennsylvania and Richard Brown was taken prisoner at the battle of Long Island. It is probable that, being a prisoner in New York, he was released by the fire.—Shelton, Jumel Mansion, 45.

John Jos. Henry (later Judge Henry), of Pennsylvania, a prisoner on the frigate “Pearl” in New York harbour, saw the fire from a distance of four miles as “a most beautiful and luminous, but haleful sight.” He first saw it “of the size of the flame of a candle,” which appeared to be “the burning of an old and noted tavern called the ‘Fighting Cock’s,’ . . . to the east of the battery and near the wharf.” The flames increased rapidly because of the wind, and he soon “saw another light at a great distance from the first, up the North River.” This seemed to be “an original, distant and necessary fire, and a celebrated triumph in the Court of ‘White Hall.”’ Boats put off from the British fleet, and rowed speedily toward the city. “This circumstance repelled the idea that our enemies were the incendiaries, for indeed they went in aid of the inhabitants.” The boat from the “Pearl” returned at daylight, and the officer and crew reported that “the burning of New York was the act of some mad-cap Americans.” The sailors said that “they had almost hung an American, who, a hayonet wound through his breast,” and that “he was caught in the act of firing the houses;” also that “they had seen one person who was taken in the act tossed into the fire, and that several who were stealing, and suspected as incendiaries, were hayonetted.” In this account of the fire, Judge Henry adds: “The testimony we received from the sailors, my own view of the distinct beginning of the fire, in several spots, remote from each other, and the manner of its spreading, impressed my mind with the belief that the burning of the city was the doings of the most low and vile of persons, for the purpose not only of thirsting but of devastation. This seemed to be the general view, not only of the British, but that of the prisoners then aboard the transports. . . . It was not until some years afterwards that a doubt was created; but for the honor of our country and the memory of the American subscription to the British and accidental circumstances. It may be well that a nation in the heat and turbulence of war, should endeavor to promote its interests by propagating reports of its own innocence and prowess, and accusing the enemy of flagrant enormity and dastardliness (as was done in this particular case) but when peace comes let us, in God’s name, do justice to them and to ourselves.”—Henry (J. J.), Campaign against Quebec (London, 1812), 184-86.

Samuel Curwen, writing on Dec. 20 to George Russell, in England, says: “The accounts of the burning of the city of New York in the Gazette [vide supra] are full, explicit, and intelligible; . . . and that it was fired by some Northern man is un doubted. A Mr. Smith, son of a clergyman of Weymouth, in Massachusetts-Bay, whom and whose family I knew very well, was concerned, taken, and I believe executed on due proof.”—*J. Am. Archives, III: 1797.

On Nov. 18, 1783 (q. v.), before the British left New York, they made an effort, by special investigation, to clear up the conflicting evidence and opinions concerning the origin and cause of the fire. The testimony of eye-witnesses, both American and British, was taken by commissioners and put on record.

On the 17th of the day state, the “Hessian Chasseurs being by accident omitted in the thanks of the 17th the Genl is happy to take the earliest opportunity of acknowledging their alertness & of thanking them for their great readiness to support the Light Infantry. Y. H. S.

In the “Convention of the Representatives of the State of New York” at Fishkill, it is recorded: “That the Secret Committee, for obstructing the navigation of Hudson’s River, be empowered and directed to purchase or impress any number of Vessels not exceeding six,” for “completing the obstructions in Hudson’s River, opposite to Mount Washington.” The same committee is to be directed “to send all the oak Plank which they have in their possession to Mount Washington.” It is also resolved that “the superintendents for batteries and Continental Frigates at Poughkeepsie, be earnestly requested to send as much of their short oak Plank as they possibly can spare to Fort Washington with the utmost despatch.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 439-40.

Resolutions are also adopted appointing a committee for detecting and confining spies. These were printed as a broadside, one of which is now in the N. Y. P. L. (Emmet Coll., 692.)

The headquarters of the American army are still at the Moriah house. The main army of the British is encamped between the 7th and 8th mile-stones. Gen. Howe’s Headquarters are at the Athorp house.—From letter of Samuel Chase to Gen. Gates, in Gates Papers (MS.), in N. Y. H. S.

A stone house that stood at 135d St. and Kingsbridge Road during the Revolution is described in the Broadway in a lithographic drawing in Man. Com. Coun. (1846), 660.

Gen. (afterwards Governor) George Clinton, writing to Doctor Peter Tappen from Kingsbridge, says: “I have been so hurried & Fatigued out of the ordinary way of my Duty by the Removal of our Army from New York & Great Part of the public stores to this Place that it has almost worn me out thro’ as to Health I am as well as usual; but how the Rebels has been able to stand out several Nights in the Open Air & exposed to Rain is almost a Miracle to me—Whom at Home the least Wet indeed some Times the Change of Weather almost laid me up.”—N. Y. City during the Am. Rev., 109.

Gin, in New, N. J. brings out No. 301 of The New-York Gazette and the Weekly Post-Boy, continuing the series of his numbered issues, his last previous one being that of Sept. 9 (q. v.). He published seven issues in Newark, to No. 1307 (Nov. 2, 1776).—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 423. See S 30.

Fitch writes: “About Noon all ye Ships who had Prisoners on board together with ye Experiment & ye Resolution, Men of War, got under way in order to go up toward the City, y5 Wind being unfair, ye Ships were Obed. to beat up, & at 4 o’Clock came too oLl [sic] between Red hook & Gibbet Island, in midst of a very great Number of Ships, among whose is ye Eagle, ye Admiral, or Lord Howes Ship, which lay just ahead of us, & ye Rainbow (another large Man of War) is near us on ye other hand & beside those, a number of Frigates & other Ships of War.”—Fitch’s Diary, 47.

Nathan Hale, a captain in Knowlton’s Rangers, is executed as a spy by the British. The original record of this event is contained in the British general orders of the day: “Head Qrs. New York Island. Sept. 22d 1776, Parole, London, Countersign, Great Britain. . . . A spy from the Enemy (by his own full confession) apprehended last night, was this day Executed at 11 o’Clock in front of the Artillery Park.”—*From Orderly book in archives of the N. Y. Hist. Soc. We find there three or four other references to the event in nearly contemporaneous sources. A letter received in London from James Drell, written on board the “Mercury” from New York to Philadelphia on Sept. 2, under date of Sept. 26, 1776, states: “On the way, we had a man who was sent as a spy by General Washington.—25 Am. Arch., II: 521. A letter, written at Harlem on Sept. 26, states: “One Hale in New York, on suspicion of being a spy, was taken up and dragged without ceremony to the execution post, and hung up. General Washington has since sent in a flag, supposed to be on that account.”—Ibid., II: 543. Tench Tilghman, of Washington’s staff, writing on Oct. 2 from headquarters on Harlem Heights to Egbert Benson, said: “The General is determined if he can bring some of them in his hands under the denomination of spies, to execute them. General Howe hanged a Captain of ours belonging to Knowlton’s Rangers, who went into New-York to make discoveries. I don’t see why we should not make retaliation.”—Ibid., II: 544.

The fact that Hale was “approached last night,” and that he “went into New York,” gives clear circumstantial evidence that he was captured on Manhattan Island. A careful study of all the evidence in the place of the question of capture has been made by Prof. Henry Phelps Johnston, and published in Nathan Hale (1914). A summary of his discussion shows (p. 157 et seq.) that Hale was not captured at Huntington, L. I., as previously believed, but at a place of execution in New York. John Jay concluded, in the first edition (1901) of his Nathan Hale, that it was near Turtle Bay, and not near the Dove Tavern, as he had previously argued in The Battle of Harlem Heights. This later conclusion was followed or concurred in by Avery in A Hist. of the U. S. (1909), VI: 18. But in the last edition of his book (1944), Prof. John Jay states, among the many important facts of the case, the opinion that the place of execution was near the Dove Tavern, which stood at about the N. W. corner of Third Ave. and 66th St. He states (pp. 162–64) that, since the publication of the first edition in 1901, “the author has found, among the maps in the British Museum, a topographical sketch or survey of the greater part of New York Island and Brooklyn, showing the position of the British army during the month of September, and the locations of strait & very portable, and among the most remarkable of the marks of the work of Captain Montresor, who made so many such maps before and during the first years of the war. . . . No camps are marked below the tavern site—none at Turtle Bay. . . . Furthermore, it is probable that Montresor, although an aid to Howe, still occupied his quarters, or marqué, with his own Engineer Corps, which usually accompanied the artillery. He did this at times in the next campaign. This would explain his presence at the Dove Artillery Park when Hale was executed. . . . During the campaign against Philadelphia in 1777, the execution of British deserters and marauders took place, almost without exception, at the Artillery Park, which was generally near headquarters. Hale thus suffered at the usual site and in the usual way. . . .

For this conclusion, Prof. Johnston gives primary credit to the latest edition of the maps, and secondary weight to his historical account of Hale’s services, written by John Austin Stevens, and published in the N. Y. Herald of Nov. 26, 1893, following the unveiling of the MacMonnies statue of Hale in City Hall Park the day before, a letter from Mr. Kelby was printed, giving the results of his inquiries. Mr. Kelby was the first to bring to light the record in the British orderly-book of Hale’s execution, “in front of the Artillery Park.” He called attention also to the entry of Oct. 23: “Majors of brigade to attend at the Artillery Park, near the Dove.” He cited advertisements in the newspapers which confirmed the location of the camp. One in the Royal Gaz. of Nov. 2, 1779, stated that there was a “home stolen or strayed from the Royal Artillery pasture at the five-mile stone,” and a published order of Jan. 19, 1780, requires that, in case of attack, “alarm guns be fired from the cantonment of the Thirty-seventh regiment, near the five-mile stone, formerly known by the name of the Dove Tavern.” The place of Hale’s execution was described by Mr. Kelby as “west of the post road, on Third avenue, between Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh streets. The cultivated ground attached to it was afterwards known as the Dove Lotts, and contained about four acres.”—See Herald, Oct. 23, 1893, II: 369, 370; L. M. R. N. Y. N. S. Quart. Bulletin, April, 1918; Winson, VI: 353.

Washington made no mention of Nathan Hale in his letters to the president of congress or elsewhere in his correspondence.—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 431, footnote

A British officer, writing from New York on Sept. 26, states: “We hung up a rebel spy the other day, and some soldiers got, out of a rebel gentleman’s garden, a painted soldier on a board, and hung it up along with the Rebel; and wrote upon it—General Washington—and I saw it yesterday beyond headquarters, by the road-side.”—Kentish Gaz. (Canterbury, Eng.), N 6–9, 1776.

Nearly five years after the death of Hale, the statement was published that: “About four years ago, Capt. Hale, an American officer, of a liberal education, younger than André, and equal to him in sense, fortitude, and even in accomplishment, tho’ without opportunity of being so highly polished, voluntarily went into the city of New-York, with a view to serve his invaded country. He performed his part there with great capacity and address, but was accidentally discovered. In this trying circumstance he exhibited all the firmness of André, without the aid of a single countenance around him that spoke either respect or compassion, and tho’ every thing that was said or done to him was adapted to make him feel that he was considered as a traitor and rebel . . . Hale, tho’ not at all disconcerted, made no plea for himself, and firmly rejected the advantageous offers made him by the enemy upon condition of his entering into their service . . . but just before he expired, said, aloud, ‘I am so satisfied with the cause in which I have engaged, that my only regret is, that I have not more lived to do one to its service.’”—Ind. Chron. (Boston), My 17, 1781.

A quite full and very gratifying description of Nathan Hale, as a young captain in the patriot army in New York, has come to light recently. It was discovered in 1914 by Mr. George Dudley Seymour among the files of the pension bureau in Washington. The sketch was written by Lieut. Elisha Bostwick on the margin of his commis- sion of Second Lieutenant. The passage reads: “Nathan Hale, in the nineteenth Regiment of foot Commanded by Colored Charles Webbe.” This commission Lieut. Bostwick deposited, with other papers, when he made his claim for a pension. He says he was in the same regiment with Hale, and “always in the habits of friendship and intimacy with him.” He describes him as “a little above the common stature in height, his shoulders of a moderate breadth, his limbs slender, his countenance countenance & very regular features—very fair was his fair skin with black hair & blue eyes—fair or very light hair which was always kept short—his eyebrows a shade darker than his hair & his voice rather sharp or piercing—his bold and agile was remarkable I have seen him follow a football & kick it over the tops of the trees in the Bowery at New York, (an exercise which he was fond of)—his mental powers seemed to be above the common sort—his mind a sedate and sober cast, & he was undoubtedly Pious; for it was remarked that when any of the Soldiers of his company were sick he always visited them & usually Prayed for & with them in their sickness. He further tells of the captain coming upon some of his men “in a bye place Playing Cards.” They were told: “This won’t do,—give me your Cards,” whereupon he “chop them to pieces, & it was done in such a manner that the men were ashamed & that and their averse.” Hale has a description of on all occasions is described as wonderful; “he would make a pen the quickest & best of any man.” He concludes with the query: “Why is it that the delicious Capt’ Hale should be left and lost in an unknown Grave & forgotten?”—From a photolithograph of Elisha Bostwick’s commission in N. Y. Hist. Soc. The document in its entirety is printed in A Sacrifice of Seventy—Nathan Hale (1815), by Frishie, 26–71.

Gen. Washington, writing to his brother, John Augustine Washington, reviewing the events of the last few days, closes thus: “In short, it is not in the power of words to describe the task I have to perform. Fifty thousand pounds would not induce me again to undergo what I have done. Our numbers, by sickness and desertion, are greatly reduced. I have been trying these four or five days to get a return, but have not yet succeeded. I am sure, however, we have not more than twelve or fourteen thousand men fit for duty, whilst the enemy, who, it is said, are very healthy, cannot have less than twenty-five thousand”—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 425–30.

The general orders from the headquarters at Harlem Heights inform the soldiers who have been wounded “in their country’s cause” that the congress has issued the following: “To all officers and privates losing a limb in any engagement, or who shall be so disabled in the service of the United States of America as to render them incapable of getting a livelihood, shall receive half of their monthly pay during life or the continuance of their disability, from the time their pay ceases as officers or soldiers.”
Also such officers or soldiers as are wounded in any engagement, and rendered incapable of service, though not totally disabled from getting a livelihood, shall receive monthly such sums towards their subsistence as the Assembly or representative body of the State they belong to, or reside in, judge adequate.

A soldier of the American army at Harlem Heights is sentenced by court martial to be shot for "cowardice and misbehaviour before the enemy on Monday last," and for "presenting his firelock at his superior officer when turning him back a second time," the penalty for which is death by article 27 of the Army Rules and Regulations. Another soldier, an ensign, is ordered to be cashiered for "the infamous crime," of "plundering the inhabitants of Harlem." Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IV: 425.

St. Paul's Chapel is reopened for religious services by order of Gen. Howe, the 27th, after being made the object of derision by Rev. Mr. O'Beirne, Lord Howe's chaplain.—N. T. At four o'clock in the morning of this day, "Colonel or Brigadier General Erskine had a visit from 100 rebels in 5 boats, but many were shot in the disarming; 1 Major and 12 men however were captured. This cost the 71st regiment 4 killed and 8 wounded."—Baumeyer's narrative, Mag. of Am. Hist., I: 39.

Col. John Glover, in a letter from Fort Constitution, dated Oct. 7, describes the attack made by a detachment of Americans, commanded by Lieut. Col. Jackson, in six boats of forty men each, who tried to disembark and attack from Monmouth's (Ward's) Island on this day. Many of the bravest of the party, including Major Hendly who was carrying off Col. Jackson, fell in this engagement. The disaster was attributed by Col. Glover to the failure of part of the force to land and assist their leaders, but who retreated instead. "The officers who commanded the other boats," he states, "are all under arrest and will be tried for their lives. In short if some example is not made of such rakish conduct, we shall be bound to engage for men of spirit to exert themselves. As the case now is they will always fall a sacrifice, while such low-lived scoundrels, that have neither Honour nor the Good of their Country at heart, will dunk behind and get off clear."—Campaign of 1776, 99, citing the original in the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.

In 7h afternoon 7h Regulars were very busy in transporting troops over to 17th Jersey Shore, where I don't perceive as yet 7h they meet with any great opposition; We are also informed 7th they have landed a considerable body of troops from Staten Island, so 7h it seems they are going to bend Considerable of their force that way.—Diary of James Fitch (MS.), 48.

Sir Win. Howe, reporting to Lord Germain on Sept. 24, states that on the day before (Sept. 23) a fantasy in the Country enabled the British troops to move "at the batteries upon Paulus Hook." Troops landed and took possession of the American works there "without the least resistance."—5 Am. Arch., II: 492. Bauermier, in his narrative of Sept. 24, written at "the detached Camp, at Helgotta," states that this expedition occurred "on the night of the 24th" (evidently before day break), and that it was led by "Gen. Lord Percy."—Mag. of Am. Hist., I: 39. Col. Robertson writes under date of Sept. 24: "This day Lt. Percy took possession of Paulus Hook without the loss of a man."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). See also Kemble's Jour., 90. Cf. transcript in Lib. of Cong. of the "Jour. of the Operations," etc. in Brit. Museum (Egerton MSS., 2135 f. 7).

Pastor Shewkirk records on Sept. 23: "The fire has thrown great damp on the former joyes of this day, an unusual number of people were carried to fall, on suspicion to have had a hand in the fire, and to have been on the Rebel's side; it is said about 200; however, on examination, the most men were as fast discharged."—Campaign of Sept. 1776, part 2, 119.

In a letter to Gov. Trumbull, Washington states: "The enemy have formed a large encampment in the plains, or rather heights, below us, extending across, as it were, from the East to the North River; but have attended nothing, as yet, of a general nature."—5 Am. Arch., II: 466-66.

"Gen. Howe's Head Quarters are at Lt. Col. James Beekman's House on the East River near Turtle Bay. His troops are throwing up intrenchments from Jacob Walton's country seat at Horn's Hook at Hell Gate across the whole Island to Humphrey Jones House on the North River."—From letter of this date in St. James's Chron. (London), N 16, 1776, reprinted in Battle of Harlem Heights, 210.

Gen. Knox, writing to his brother William, says: "The affair of last Monday [Sept. 16] has had some good consequences toward raising the peoples spirits—they find that if they stick to these mighty men they will run as fast as other people. . . . The general is as worthy a man as breathing, but he cannot do everything nor be everybody. He wants good assistants. There is a radical evil in our army,—the lack of officers. We ought to have men of merit in the most extensive and unlimited sense of the word. Instead of which, the bulk of the officers of the army are a parcel of ignorant, stupid men, who might make tolerable soldiers, but [are] bad officers; . . . We ought to have academies, in which the whole theory of the art of war shall be taught, and every man taught courage and possession given to draw persons into the army. . . . As the army now stands, it is only a receptacle for raggmuffins."—Life and Correspondence of Henry Knox, 31-32. On the following day, Washington wrote to congress from the Morris house a long and circumstantial account of the need of good officers for the army.

Bauermier writes in his narrative of this date: "All the houses, which were inhabited and deserted by the rebels in New York, are marked G. R. [George, Rex], and thereby confiscated, the government takes possession of all the papers and effects of the enemy, and the fleet is erecting a magazine in the city. Many subjects are returning to the legitimate authority, and on Long Island the villages of Greveesan, New Utretch, Flattbusch, Brockland and Percy are filled with the fugitive settlers, most of whom however find their dwellings empty, furniture smashed, not a window left whole and their cattle gone forever.

"The royalists are obliged to distinguish themselves from the rebels by red ribbons in their hats. . . ." The house of Col. Henry Rutgers was one which received "the mark of Confiscation on the south door." As late as 1857, he was still preserving this mark on the door. "Since 1776, there will have been no Hospital, a Store House, or Barracks, as the circumstances of the times required."—From Battle of Harlem Heights, 184, citing Mag. of the Dutch Reformed Church, II: 412. The Methodist Meeting House was one of the buildings used for a hospital.—Oliver Barnet's statement, Battle of Harlem Heights, 198.

"All the Riots, 1776,-ves, which besides a line of near 200 Yd. finished accord to the Plan proposed."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). On the next three days men were employed in cutting down trees, and, on Sept. 26, Jones's house was made "musket proof round the Gallery."—Ibid. See S 28.

The advanced post of the British "is at the Black Horse tavern and the Army was posted from the North to the East Rivers quite across the Country wherever above Mr. Atherope."—From a letter by Capt. Hutcheson, assistant-secretary to Gen. Howe, in camp at Turtle Bay, to a friend in England, now preserved with the Haldimand MSS, British Museum, and pub. in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1885), VIII: 40.

Regarding the results of the fire, Hutcheson states that "all that part of the town where Mr. Watts House stood, with the houses in Broadway & West side of Broad Street and all the North River as far as Vaux Hall is consumed. Kennedys, Halletts, Col. Reeds & two or three Houses joining are all that escaped as far as St. Pauls Church. What adds to the misfortune, they are chiefly the friends to government who have suffered; several of the Villians have been detected, & have suffered the fate they deserve." He is evidently writing to John Morton, then owner or lessee of Richmond Hill, complaining that he added "your furniture left at Richmond Hill was not sold. Mr Washington lived in the house all Summer and made use of it; some of the tables & chairs he had in Genl. Robertson's house & was consumed in it, and on the Night before we landed he quitting Richmond hill, left it open, & the Rebels in their retreat, took many things out of it, and burned the rest, as soon as I could, I got a safe guard to it, which still remains, and everything left will be safe, a return [inventory] of which I will send you & will dispose of the whole for your advantage."—Battle of Harlem H'ts, 22–22, citing the same MSS.

Regarding Colden's death (see S 21), Gov. Tryon writes to Lord Germain: "This makes a vacancy in the Council. The following is the present state of the remaining eleven: Mr. Chif-Justice Hornsmanden, very old and feeble; Mr. Oliver De Lancey, Mr. Charles Ward Athorp, Mr. Axtell, and Mr. Henry Cruger, at liberty to attend the summons of Government. Mr. William Smith, withdrawn to his plantation up the North River, and not been heard of these five months; Mr. Hugh Wallace and Mr. James Jancey, prisoners with the Rebels; Mr. John Watts, Colonel Morris, and Mr. Henry White, in England.

"Mr. Thomas Jones, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and Mr. David Matthews, Mayor of the City of New-York, with many other gentlemen of the country, are in the hands of the Rebels."—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 685–86.

Gov. Tryon writes to Lord George Germaine: "It is the opinion of His Majesty's Commissioners for restoring peace to the Colonies that I should postpone any executive Acts of Government, until the Province is more liberated from the control of the Rebels. I therefore have kept the executive powers of Civil Government dormant, leaving everything to the direction of the Military."—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 686–87. See N 26.

Tryon also informs Lord Germain that Oliver De Lancey "under General Howe's orders is endeavouring to raise a Brigade of Fifteen hundred men for the Defence of Long Island."—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 687. New York remained throughout the war the chief city of refuge for loyalists.—Winsor, VII: 196–97; Van Tyne, The Loyalists (1902), 243 et seq.

The British orders of the day provide that "the working Party McGowens Hill to Consist of 200 Men only till further Orders."—From Orderly book, British Army, in N. Y. H. S.

In the general orders for the day, issued at headquarters on Harlem Heights, is the following: "The Quartermaster-General and the Chief Engineer are to mark the ground, to-morrow, on which the barracks and huts are to be built this side King's Bridge. They are to call upon the General, present, to dictate to them the orders for the day, on which the ground is marked out, the Quartermaster-General is to cause the materials for building to be laid thereon as quick as possible. . . ."—5 Am. Arch., II: 591.

Mr. Reginald Pelham Bolton is of the opinion that this order led to the selection of the recently discovered camp-site at Prescott and Seaman Avenues, and that this camp, begun by the Americans, afterwards became the great centre for the British and Hessian solliery.—20th Am. Rep., Am. Scenic & Hist. Res. Soc., 371. See further, O 24.

A flagship on board the British frigate "Emerald" at New York wrote on Sept. 30: "The 27th inst. about Eleven o'Clock, P. M. came up with her and brought her to Action, and in less than three Glasses she struck to us. We have brought her safe into this Harbour, with the Loss only of three Men, and fourteen wounded. In a letter to his mother, Gen. Glover says that the American army is "composed of flying Camp, four months levy men, and one months Militia, who are always uneasy, and cannot go through the fatigue & hardships which soldiers are necessarily called to, like those Troops that have been reasoned to it. We have a few old Regiments, if detached by themselves, I believe would do honor to their country. But we are obliged to intermix them with the raw troops, which is by far the greatest part of the army, consequently confuse the whole. This we saw verified on the 15th ult., the day we evacuated New York; and happy for us we begun the retreat so timely as we did; otherwise the whole that were in the City must have been captured by the Enemy after the foremost. We had about 1,800 men on that day, on the East side, about four miles from the City, covered by ten sail of Men of War and opposite to them, on the North River, came up three large Ships. The whole kept up a constant cannonading with Grape shot and Longridge quite across the Island."—Glover Corresp. (MS.), Part II, 2. Cf. Washington's description of the army on Sept. 2 (p. 8).

A published notice of this occasion, announcing the hours when the post office is open for the delivery of letters, shows that it is situated in Broad St. "Captains of Ships who have brought from Europe Letters for America, are desired to send them to this Office, that none may be delivered to disaffected Persons."—N. The Right of the City was in Possession of the City of New York with all the Harbour and Sound, of Long and Staten-Islands, and nearly of New-York Island. They are also in Possession of Powles's Hook and command the East River and Connecticut Sound. All this has been obtained with very Little Difficulty and Loss on the Part of the Troops; the Rebels, after the Battle of Long Island, or rather Root on the 29th of August, having never at tempted to face the Soldiers, but every Way with the utmost Precipitation. They quitted Works, which they had been laboring upon during the whole Summer without scarce the Conflict of a Day. ...

The foregoing extract indicates the different tone in which this paper was being conducted by the new printer, Ambrose Serle (see p 30). The item continues at length to describe conditions in the city and harbor.

The Second and Sixth Brigades of British troops cross over to

"So Vast a Fleet was never seen together in this Port, or perhaps in all America before. The Ships are stationed up the East River or Sound, as far as Turtle Bay; and, near the Towns, Some are moored up the North River; others in the Bay between Red and Yellow Hook; some, again, off Staten Island; and several off Powles's Hook, and towards the Hilla. The Men-of-War are moored chiefly up New-York Sound, and make, with the other Ships, a very magnificent and formidable Appearance. Five Men-of-War have been detached from the Squadron into the North River above Greenwhich [see O 3] probably to assist the Operations of the Army against the Rebels, who still remain on the Northern Extremity of this Island, and on the Heights about Kingsbridge."—N. Washington writes to the president of Congress from Head-Quarters, Heights of Harlem: "About eight o'clock this morning two ships of forty-four guns each, supposed to be the Roeckbuck and Phenix, and a frigate of twenty guns, with three or four tenders, got away from Bloominglee, where they had been lying some time [see O 3], and stood with an easy southerly breeze towards our cheaux-de-frise, which we hoped would have interrupted their passage, while our batteries played upon them; but to our surprise and mortification, they ran through without the least difficulty, and without receiving any apparent damage from our forts, though they kept up a heavy fire from both sides of the river. Their destination or views cannot be known with certainty; but most probably they are sent to stop the navigation, and cut off the supplies of boards, which we should have received, and of which we are in great need. . . .—Am. Arch., II: 943. See also Kembie's Jour., 921; Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

The Army had embarked to the environs of New York, but the pursuit has now been resumed, and with a more determined spirit; hence the naval and military co-operation by which water with Albany is thus cut off; while the army remains strongly intrenched.—See letter of Col. Smallwood, to the convention of Maryland, from the "Camp of the Maryland Regulars" at headquarters (Morris house), pub. in Ridgley's Annals of Annapolis, 261.

"... The enemy... sunk a sloop which had on board the machine invented by and under the direction of Mr. Bushnell, intended to blow up the British ships [see Aug. 1776]... Mr. Bushnell had great confidence of its success, and had made several experiments which seemed to give him countenance; but its fate was truly a contrast to its design."—Am. Arch., III: 961, citing Heath.

A letter written from New York states: "The Brune [a British irigate lying magazine] to make a push at Westchester, every day making their Escape from the Rebels, and even several officers and some of their high rank, who have deserted from the Rebels."—St. James's Chron. (London), N 16-19, 1776.

"... Majors of Brigade & ord'ry officers are to Attend at the Artillery Park near the Dodge. As soon as the Troops March against the Enemy I Genl Clinton will Command 1st Division Consisting of Lt.-Genl.ting Reserve Hessian Gren. & Cheesemans. Gen. Howe embarks part of the army on the East River in flat-boats, and passing through Hell Gate, lands on "Froggs neck" (Throgg's Neck). Lieut.-Gen. de Heister moved from Jamaica to Whitestone, and landed at the same point.—From transcript, in Library of Congress, of "Jour. of the Operations," etc., in British Museum (London), 1776. Maj.-Genl. Sullivan continues the official chronology of military operations under Gen. Sir Wm. Howe in this section of the country around New York, including New Rochelle, White Plains, Forham, etc.

There were about 4,000 in the British force which landed on Throgg's Neck.—Phil. Exp. Post., O 15, 1776. Cf. Robertson's Jour. (M.S.), which, after narrating the move to Westchester, says: "... The Force consisting of the 5th and 7th Regiments and 3rd, 5th, and 8th Light Infantry, under Col. Haldimand, marched from the N. of York, to encamp,—N. Y. Merc, O 12, 1776.

Solomon Nash records: "To the Day the Enemy Landed at Frog Point But our men were Told Too much for them They Could not march out from under the Covering of their Shipping."—Nash's Jour., 37.

General orders from American headquarters at Harlem Heights require "that the men have four days' provisions ready dressed at all times. As the enemy seem now to be endeavouring to strike some stroke before the close of the campaign, the General most earnestly conjures both officers and men, if they have any love for their country, and concern for its liberties, regard to the safety of their parents, wives, children and countrymen, that they will act with bravery and spirit."—Am. Arch., II: 1118.

"We are this Day Informed... that Regulars have Landed a large Body of Troops above Hell Gate, in Order to Cut off Commication between our Army & y Country."—Diary of John Finch (M.S.), 71.

The following eulogy is published regarding the late Cadwaller Colden (see S 21): "... a Man of great Proflity, Knowledge and Steadiness, which he had Occasion to shew upon many Occasions, nor least, when above 90 Years of Age, not all the Threats of Rebellion could shake up any Loyalty to his Sovereign, nor all their Wikes seduce him from his Attachment to the constitutional Liberties of his Country, in opposition to the republican System of popular Tyranny. He died full of Days, and had the Satisfaction, before his Departure, to know, that the Arms of his Prince had prevailed, in a signal Instance over the Forces of the Rebels. They, who knew him best, will give his Character that Eulogium, which even a stranger will rejoice to pay to such distinguished Merit."—N. Y. Merc, O 1776.

The provincial convention passes the following resolution: "Whereas, this Convention is informed that the records of the city and county of New-York, as well as the records of the county and the records of the borough of Westchester, are at present lodged in private houses in the county of Westchester, whereby they may be exposed to the enemy, who have landed in that country; Ordered, That Wm. Miller, Tho. Bartow and John Caizine, be and hereby are appointed commissioners for removing, with all possible expedition, all the said records to Kingston, in Ulster county, and there placed in the care of Dirck Wynkoop, Abraham Hasbrook and Christopher Tappen, Esqrs.; that the said commissioners apply either to the troops raised for the protection of that county, or to the militia, for a proper guard to attend the said records in their removal, which said troops or militia are hereby directed to furnish such guard as may be necessary for that purpose."—Jour. The following recently discovered item in a London newspaper throws light on the mystery surrounding the erection of the Washington Monument (see 1761): "We learn from France that Mr. Alexander commonly called Lord Stirling, was the first and principal person who promoted the design of erecting a statue to Lord Howe, as also of a monument to the memory General Wolfe, near New York."—Middlesex Jour. & Exp. Adv., O 15-17, 1776.

Washington, perceiving that Gen. Howe, not daring to attack the intrenched American camp on Harlem Heights, had ordered to his rear the reést of his army, took it in on the upper part of Manhattan Island, by landing a considerable force at Throgg's Neck (see O 12), and sending armed ships the Hudson (see O 9) to cut off the supplies arriving for the Americans by water from the north and west,—calls a council of war at the headquarters of Gen. Lee. There are present, besides Gen. Washington, Maj.-Gen's Lee, Putnam, Heath, Spencer, and Sullivan; Brig.-Gen. Lord Stirling, Maj.-Genl. McDougall, Parsons, Nixon, Walsworth, Scott, Fellows, Clinton, and Lincoln; and Col. Knox, commanding artillery. Washington reads letters from the convention and from particular members, regarding "the turbulence of the defactified in the upper parts of this State; and also sundry accounts of deserters showing the enemy's intention to surround us," and after much consideration and debate, the conclusion is reached "whether (it having appeared that the obstructions in the North River have proved insufficient, and that the enemy's whole force is now in our rear on Frog Point,) it is now deemed possible in our situation to prevent the enemy cutting off the communication with the country and compelling us to fight them at all disadvantages, or surrender prisoners at discretion." It is agreed, with but one dissenting voice (Gen. Clinton), that it is not possible to prevent the communication, and that one of the consequences mentioned in the question must certainly follow." It is also agreed that "Fort Washington be retained as long as possible."—Am. Arch., III: 1117-18; Ibid., II: 1076, 1077.

In consequence of an advertisement in a recent issue of the Mercury "requesting his Majesty's loyal subjects, inhabitants of the City and County of New-York," to meet on this day, a very large "concouse" including "The Members of his Majesty's Council, the Judges, and all the other well-affectted Citizens who were not driven away by the Hand of Violence, or sent Prisoners to other Provinces," meet at the city hall, "when a decent and respectful Address to Lord Howe and General Howe, the King's Commissioner for restoring Peace to America, was read, Representing the Attachment of the Inhabitants to our rightfull and gracious Sovereign, George the Third, and their Sense of the Constitutional Supremacy of Great-Britain over these Colonies... and praying that the City and County might be restored to His Majesty's Peace and Protection. The Address was unanimously approved and adopted; and it was agreed that the Inhabitants should all sign it. But the Number assembled being too great to sit at that time, two respectable Citizens were appointed to attend at a Public House [probably the tavern of John Simmon], adjoining the City-Hall, from 10 o’Clock A. M., to 2 o’Clock P. M. every Day, to take Subscriptions till all had signed. . . . The address, with signatures, is published in N. Y. City, during the Am. Rev., 1775-57. After this, an affectionate Address to His Excellency William Tryon, Esq; our worthy Governor was read—requesting him to present the above Address to the Commissioners, and otherwise to exert himself that the Prayer of it might be granted.” This Address was also unanimously approved, and agreed to; and the Honorable Mr. Chief Justice Horsmanden was desired to sign and deliver it to his Excellency, in Behalf of the Inhabitants. . . .—N. Y. Merc., O 21, 1776; Conn. Gaz. (New London), N 22, 1776. This published account of the meeting was reprinted, on Nov. 4, in the Penn. Exc. Post, with comments by “A Friend to American Freedom,” who referred to “the pains which the enemies to the free States of America are taking, in order to re-establish the old Constitution of New-York.” He believed the account of this meeting should “be made public, in order that the people at large might determine on what conduct they would show to such as dared to break so important a link in the chain of union.” He “cannot but view this breach or attempt of the utmost importance to the peace and well-being of every State.”—Penn. Exc. Post, N 4, 1776.

The Loyalist address to Tryon by the inhabitants of New York was comparatively in the old style of severity and intemperance, and, like that which preceded it during the colonial period, it was a fervent appeal for protection: “. . . We . . . beg leave to congratulate your Excellency on your return to the capital of your Government, and to assure you that we feel the sincerest joy on this happy event, which opens a prospect that we shall once more experience the blessings of peace and security under his Majesty’s auspicious government, and protect us from the servile and despicable attacks which we formerly endured under your Excellency’s mild administration, and which we ardently wish to have renewed.”

Preserving in our loyalty and unshaken attachment to our gracious Sovereign, in this time of distress and trial, and anxious to testify our affection for him, we have embraced the earliest opportunity to petition the Kings Commissioners, that they would restore this City and County to his Majesty’s peace, although many of the most respectable citizens, and a much greater number of the inferior classes, have been drawn off by the calamities of war, or sent prisoners to New-England and other distant parts; yet we hope that the numbers still remaining, and have voluntarily subscribed, may be deemed sufficient to entitle this district to his Majesty’s grace; and that the sufferings which our situation requires for the royal cause, plead in their behalf with the Commissioners, from whose well-known humanity, benevolence, and enlarged sentiments, we have the most flattering expectation.

“To your Excellency we naturally look for assistance; we therefore request that you would be pleased to present our petition to the Commissioners, and otherwise exert yourself that the prayer of it may be granted; as it is our fervent desires, and what we esteem the greatest earthly fidelity, to remain subjects of the British Government, in union with the parent State.”

Signed by desire, and in behalf of the inhabitants, by Daniel Horsmanden,”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1075. This governor answered on Oct. 25 (q.v.).—5 Am. Arch., II: 1075.

Division orders are issued from Washington’s headquarters at Kingsbridge for the disposition of the division of the army under command of Maj.-Gen. Heath. Two regiments of militia, now posted on the Harlem River, are “to pass over the new bridge and join Colonel Swartwout’s regiment, and form a flank guard.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1078-79.

Gen. Alexander McDougall, writing to the committee of arrangements, from “Camp Harlem,” says in part: “. . . The enemy appear very shy. Our advanced centries and theirs are within three hundred yards of each other in Harlem Lane. The works they have thrown up are evidently calculated for defence.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1080.

“I am told, to whom I was referred the claim of Mr. Nichols has been referred to an Officer for securing the Records of this State, for a Guard-Room for the Guard appointed to watch the said Records, and for Fire-Wood and Candles supplied the Guard, have taken the same into consideration, and thereupon agreed to. The following Resolution: Resolved, That there be allowed to Nich-olas Bayard, for providing an Officer for securing the publick Records of this State, a Guard-Room and Fire-Wood and Candles supplied the Guard over the said Records, the sum of fifty pounds.”—5 Am. Arch., III: 254.

Washington wrote to the president of congress: “. . . ten or eighteen ships, which have been prevented passing Hell-Gate for two three days for want of wind, are now under way, and proceeding up the Sound. Among them there appears to be two frigates, the rest probably have in stores, &c. . . .”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1116.

The British forces under Howe take up their position “on the heights of Pelham’s Manor our Left to E. Chester Creek & Right to New Rochelle, our F rank about 3 Miles face North or N N E.”—Robertson’s Jour. (M.S.). See also Kemble’s Jour., 93-94.

Solomon Nash records: “all our Riggerment Employ’d in gitting Cannon and mortars over to the jerys likewise in gitting other things all† the Island.”—Nash’s Jour., 37.

It is reported in the British camp that Gen. Lee is commanding “the Rebel Army” and that it is 20,000 strong.—Robertson’s Jour. (M.S.).

“A severe order against Plundering, to no Effect; about this day received accounts of the arrival of the Hessians, long expected.”—Kemble’s Jour., 94.

The name of Fort Constitution is changed to Fort Lee.—5 Am. Arch., II: 1079.

On this day, the Howe War Plan, engraved by William Faden, was published. It is reproduced and described as Pl. 45 b, Vol. I. See also Aug. 27, 1776; and 1779. Cf. the Chart and Plan of the Harbour of New York & the County Adjacent, pub. in the Political Mag, Nov., 1781, and reproduced in Man. Conn. Conn. (1870), 444.

On these maps, Ellis Island appears as “Bucking F.” It also appears as “Buckling F.” On Southlier’s map, which was engraved and published by Faden, Jan. 1, 1779. For the origin of the name Ellis Island, see Jan. 20, 1785.

A letter from New York expresses the “great satisfaction of the loyal part of its inhabitants, who have for a long time suffered every hardship from a set of tyrants that is possible to be conceived. . . . The Hessians do all that is possible to alleviate the sufferings of a persecuted people, who rather than turn rebels have despaired death and ruin. . . . Almost all the New Yorkers have returned to their allegiance.”—Campaigned of 1776, part 2, 134.

An English officer, writing from his “Camp near New York” to a friend in London, says: “. . . We have run a strong Line strengthened with Redoubts across that End of the Island where they [the Americans] are so strongly posted; and a Body of Men under the Command of Lord Percy (who commands upon this Island and its Dependencies) are left to defend them, and observe the Enemies Movements. General Howe landed some Days since upon the Continent about six Miles from King’s Bridge and the Day before yesterday took Possession of a Work of theirs, by which he has entirely cut off their Retreat to the New-England Governments. In the above Attack we had five Men killed and seven wounded; . . . The Rebels have no Barracks left, but over the North River into the Jerseys, and that will not remain open long, as Yesterday there arrived a Reinforcement of near 9000 Germans, whose Transports going up the North River, leads me to think they are to be landed for that Purpose if this should be the Case, the War must be near an End; they desert very fast to our Army, and by the Account of those that come to us, they go off in great Numbers, under their own Heads.”

“We have a very strong Army here; Gen. Howe has with him 18,000; upon this Island are 50,000, and on board the Transports that arrived Yesterday are near 9000; so that in the Whole we cannot have less here than 32,000 effective Men, as good Troops, and in as good Spirits as any ever were.”—St. James’s Chron., D 19-21, 1776.

We are Inform’d y about this Time a very considerable Reinforcement hath Join’d y British Army, among whom it is Said there are a Regt of Waldecker’s several of Hanovarians & several of Brunswick’s; we were this Day shewn one of y Hessian Genl’s who had also lately Arriv’d.”—Diary of Jabez Fitch (MS.), 77.

The following news items are published: “The Subscription for the Clergy of the Church of England in America, who have suffered by the Rebellion, amounted to above Six Thousand Pounds Sterling, when the last Accounts came away.”
“Many of the Inhabitants are come into Town; and many others who were obliged to fly for their Loyalty, are coming to daily.”

“The Earl of Dunmore has taken a House in the Broadway for his Residence during the Winter.”—N. Y. Mer, O 21, 1776.

“The order of march is issued from Washington’s headquarters to be observed by the Division of the Army under the command of Major-General Heath, in their route from this place [Kingsbridge] to White-Plains.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 116-118. For a detailed account of this movement, see ibid., II: 1204-4, footnote.

British marching orders are also issued.—See Orderly book, British Army (MS), N. Y. H. S. After this orders of this command were issued from New Rochelle, White Plains, Dobbs Ferry, Courtland’s Manor, DeLancey’s Mill, New Bridge, Aquasnack, Newark, Amboy, Trenton, and Brunswick (to Jan. 28, 1777).—Ibid; Kemble, etc., p. 94.

The American army is encamped on Valentine’s Hill, Westchester Co., to which place Washington has moved his headquarters. He goes early this morning “to visit the posts on the left of our line and the White-Plains.” He sends various orders from White Plains, the British having advanced from New Rochelle to “Marnock.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1165-1166, 1156-9. See also Lossing, Field Book of the Am. Rev., II: 625.

The Hessians, Waldeckers, and other British forces disembark from their ships, and pass “up the East-River in a Multitude of Flat-bottomted Boats and other Vessels, in the highest Spirits imaginable.” It being “a very fine Day, the Scene was rendered extremely beautiful by the Crowds upon the Water, clearing their Military Birettles and other Spectators on Shore, and making the Hills resound with Trumpets, Drums, and Fifer’s, accompanied by the Harmony of their Voices. These have added an agreeable Reinforcement to the Army, and are to all appearance as fine Troops as any in the World.”—N. Y. Mer, O 24, 1776.

Washington transfers his headquarters from Harlem Heights to White Plains. Congress is informed that this movement is made “to counteract the operations of the enemy declining an attack upon our front. They have drawn the main body of their army to Frog’s Point (see Oct. 12), with a design of hemming us in, and drawing a line in our rear.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1034, 1204.

Fitch writes: “we are ...”. Inform’d y 2 Prisoners in Gen. 11 grow Remarkably Sick & Die very fast.”—Diary of Jacob Fitch (MS.), 78.

The Governors of King’s College in this City, are requested to meet at Hull’s Tavern, on Thursday next (Oct 24), at 10 o’Clock in the Morning, on Business of Importance. It is hoped as the Messenger is out of Town, that the Gentlemen will attend punctually without farther Notice.”—N. Y. Mer, O 21, 1776.

“We shall get a sufficient quantity of provisions over to-day for the garrison at Fort Washington. General Mifflin thinks it not advisable to pull the barracks down yet. He has hopes of our army returning to that ground for winter quarters. I think this would be running too great a risk, to leave them standing in expectation of such an event, there being several strong fortifications in and about King’s Bridge. If the enemy should throw in a thousand or fifteen hundred men, they could cut off our communication effectively; and, as the state of the barracks are, they would find exceeding good cover for the men. But if we were to take the barracks down—even if the boards were not removed—it would in a great measure deprive them of that advantage.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1221.

See further, O 27.

The anniversary of the King’s accession to the throne is celebrated “with every Demonstration of Joy.” “The Flag Ships hoisted the Royal Standard; and all the Ships in the Harbour gave a Salute of twenty-one Guns each. So noble an Appearance, and so grand a Salute, were never known in this Port before. The two Admira-ls. were painted in the finest Tartans, and many loyal Toasts were drunk upon the Occasion.”—N. Y. Mer, O 28, 1776. See also Fitch’s Diary (MS.), 86.

Kemble records: “Marched in two Columns, the right led by Lieut. Gen. Clinton, left by Lieut. Gen. De Heister; occupied Grounds in East Chester, on the White Plain Road, Wards Head Quarters, a noted Rebel. The Enemy in three separate Camps in our Front, on the opposite of the Brook’s [Bronx], and advantageously posted on rough and Commanding Height’s.”—Kemble’s Jour., 94, Oct. 95.

Gov. Tryon’s answer to the address of the inhabitants of the city (see O 16) is as follows: “Sir: The address you delivered to me, in behalf of the inhabitants of the City and County of New-York, cannot fail of being highly agreeable to me, as it was accompanied with a dutiful petition and representation from them to the King’s Commissioners for restoring peace to his Majesty’s Colonies. I have cheerfully embraced the opportunity of presenting this day the address to Lord Howe, who was pleased to signify to me ‘he would take the earliest opportunity of communicating with General Howe on the occasion.’ The inhabitants may be assured I shall support their wishes with my best endeavours, although the completion of them must be left to the decision of his Majesty’s Commissioners, in whom the highest national confidence is reposed.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 127-7.

A court of inquiry, at White Plains, of which Brig.-Gen. John Morin Scott is president, takes evidence on the charge against Col. Tyler, of cowardice and misbehaviour before the enemy on Sept. 15, when the British took the city.—5 Am. Arch., II: 1251-54.

Gen. Greene writes from Fort Lee to Gen. Mifflin: “The people have been employed on the other side in getting the boards together at Fort Washington [see Oct. 24] and the ferry. Some have been brought from King’s Bridge. To-day I sent up to Colonel Lasher to know what assistance he could give towards taking down the barracks, and bringing off the boards; and had for answer that he had orders to burn the barracks, quit the post, and join the army, by the way of the North River, at the White-Plains.”

...I fear quitting Fort Independence will oblige Magaw to draw his forces into the garrison, as the enemy will have a passage open upon his back. I fear it will damp the spirits of his troops. He did not expect it so soon. If the barracks are not burnt in the morning, and the enemy don’t press too hard upon us, we will try to get away some of the boards.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1263.

Mr. Reginald Pelham of Baltimore, as a result of field-work and historical study, shows, in a report on the subject of “Military Camp Life on Upper Manhattan Island and Adjacent Mainland during the American Revolution, Disclosed by Recent Archeological Excavations,” that, while Gen. Greene was writing the above letter, “these buildings on King’s Bridge Heights were being reduced to ashes.” Three days later, the British appeared on the scene to find “everything of value gotten away,” and the King’s and Farmer’s bridges cut down. Mr. Bolton adds: “There is good reason from the foregoing to suppose that the barracks upon Manhattan Island, were not entirely destroyed or removed, as they were in use up to the time of the assault which was made by the combined forces of Howe and von Kniphoven on November the 16th. The possession of such shelters as these barracks afforded, however crude they may have been, to the British, is of immeasurable value to the captors of Fort Washington at that period of the year, and it is certain that those near by the fort and probably elsewhere were promptly occupied by the British and Hessian irregulars. Thus the structures which had for several months [several days—see S 24] formed the only shelter of the poor patriots who sheltered through the chill autumnal nights during the defence of the heights, and upon which much of their labor and some of their high hopes had been expended, passed into the possession of their opponents.”—20th Ann. Rep., Am. Soc. & Hist. Pres Soc. (1915), 374. See also 21st Ann. Rep. (1916), 138-40.

In the same letter to Gen. Mifflin, Gen. Greene also says: “We have had a considerable skirmish on York-Island to-day. The cannonade began in the morning and lasted until evening, with very short intermissions. A ship moved up opposite Fort No. 1. Colonel Magaw got down an eighteen-pounder and fired sixty shot at her. Twenty-six of which went into her. She slipped her cable and left her anchor, and was towed off by four boats. I think we must have killed a considerable number of their men, as the confusion and distress exceeded all description. Our Artillery behaved incomparably better than Colonel Magaw’s. We opened fire with our cannon on the ship and in the field. We have brought off some of the enemy from the field of battle, and more are still lying on the ground.”—5 Am. Arch., II: 1263.

Another letter from Fort Lee states: “This morning, about seven o’clock, two frigates moved up the North River, and came to an anchor near Bourdett’s Ferry, apparently with an intention to 176 stop the ferry-way, and cut off the communication between this place and Fort Washington. The enemy at the same time appeared 27 on Harlem Plain, and Colonel Magaw, who commands on York-Island, ordered the lines to be moved. The ships endeavored to dislodge them by firing on their flanks, but they fired to very little purpose. The barbette battery on the high hill on the left of the ferry, opened on the frigates, and fired a considerable time without doing them any or but very little damage. Upon our ceasing to fire, a gun from Fort No. 1, on York-Island, began to play on them with great advantage, and hulled the one highest up about twenty times. The action is further described in this letter. Regarding the action on land, the writer continues: "The enemy by this time had begun a smart fire on the island with field-pieces and mortars.

Our men returned the compliment. They were out of their lines great part of the day. There were but few discharges of small-arms. Our men killed about a dozen Hessians, and brought them off."

"This Day we were Inform'd y^3 Gen^1 Howe had advanced with his Army as far as y^3 White Plains, & y^3 no very Considerable Action had as yet happened in those parts; We were also Inform'd y^3 y^2 Army was this Day Engaged between here and Fort Washington."—Diary of Jabez Fitch (MS.), 81.

The battle of White Plains occurs. It is Washington's opposition to the enemy's attempt to reach Manhattan Island from the north. After two unsuccessful attacks, the British finally force the Americans to retreat.—Winso, VI: 286. For contemporary accounts by both sides, see Kemble's Jour., 95, and L. I. Hist. Soc.
Memoirs, III, Part II: 139.

There was published in London, Feb. 25, 1777 (q.v.), a "Plan of the operations of the King's army under the command of General St. Leger, on the 1st of October, in New-York and New Jersey, against the American forces commanded by General Washington, from the 12th of October to the 18th of November, 1776. Wherein is particularly distinguished the engagement on the White Plains, the 28th of October. By Claude Joseph Sauithier." The plan is reproduced in Winsor, VI: 336. For other contemporary maps showing the military movements of the year in the vicinity of New York, see Fitch, I: 346; II: 346-347.

"The Liberty Pole at y^5 Labellary was this Morning Taken

Library. On Nov. 26, Gov. Tryon wrote to Lord George Germain:
"The Liberty Poll erected some years ago in this City, and which remained as a monument of insult to the Government, and of licentiousness to the people, was last month by my recommendation to the Inhabitants, very properly and very quietly taken down and removed by them."—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 691.

To Germain, cited above, appears to effectually remove the erroneous supposition of Dawson that Capt. Wm. Cunningham, who had been appointed provost-marshal of the British forces (see Ag 4, 1774), "revenged himself, for the insult offered to him on the 6th of March, 1775 [q.v.], by cutting down the Liberty Pole, which, for more than ten years had graced the Commun's."—See "The Park and Its Vicinity," by Henry B. Dawson, in Man. Com. Coun. (1855), 468-73.

Dawson was probably right, however, in his statement which follows, that "afterwards in his official capacity," Cunningham
"added new terror to the 'New Goal' or 'Provost'" (see N 14, 1777).—Ibid.

An editorial asserts that "The Nation is most highly incensed at the Declaration of Independence by the Congress, and at their impatient Abuse of the King. The warmest Advocates of America find it necessary to be silent now, as the Cause of the Colonies, maintained against every Offer of Conciliation and with such awed Ennity to the Constitution of Great-Britain, is become absolutely unpopular."

"The Parliament was expected to meet by the End of this Month at farthest; and 'tis supposed that the Declaration of the Congress, will operate the utmost Restlessness and Unanimity.
If so; has not the Congress proved itself the worst Enemy that America ever had?"—N. Y. Merc., O 28, 1776.

New reports of the day relate that "Several Gentlemen and at White Plains, that "The enemy have possession of Fort Independence on the heights above King's Bridge," having made their appearance on the night of Oct. 24. He asks about holding the ground from King's Bridge to the lower lines.—5 Am. Arch., II: 1594.

The Rev. Chas. Inglis, rector of Trinity Church, writes an extended account of the condition of the Anglo-American church in America, and particularly in New York City, addressing it (as appears by the postscript) to "The Rev. Dr. Hind." It is a summary of recent happenings involving the Church of England. Dr. Inglis refers particularly to the difficulties experienced by a loyal clergyman of the Church of England in 1776, prior to the city's capture by the British. The clergy, he says, "were viewed with peculiar envy and malignity by the disaffected." Although "civil liberty was the ostensible object," he believes "that an abolition of the Church of England was one of the principal springs of the disappearances of the clergy and other leaders." The clergy of the Church of England preached "without touching on politics," and endeavored to "cherish a spirit of loyalty among their people." This "gave great offence to our flaming patriots, who laid it down as a maxim, 'That those who were not for them were against them.'" Various incidents are mentioned by Mr. Inglis to show brutal treatment of the clergy.

The year 1776 increased the bitterness of the Independents' and loyalists' embarrlements. "To officiate publicly, and not pray for the King and royal family according to the liturgy, was against their duty and oath, as well as dictates of their conscience; and yet to use the prayers for the King and royal family would have drawn inevitable destrucion on them. The only course which they could pursue, to avoid both evils, was to suspend the public exercise of their function, and shut up their churches. This was accordingly done."

After the clergy "had ceased to officiate publicly," Inglis writes, "several of the rebel officers sent me to the keys of the churches, that their chaplains might preach in them; with these requisitions I peremptorily refused to comply, and let them know that 'if they would use the churches, they must break the gates and doors to get in.' . . . Upon this they desisted, and did not occupy any of the pulpits."

"The whole of the Provision is equal Plenty, and proportionably cheap; the Army have it for taking, and the Fleet are served with it twice a Week."

"The Rebels quit their Works upon White Plains; our Troops took possession of them at Nine in the Morning."

"All things seem to be quiet at Fort Washington."—5 Am. Arch., III: 406.

Lient. Gen. Kniphaven, having repaired King's Bridge, "took post within it."—From transcript, in Library of Congress, of the "Journal of the Operations," etc., in British Museum ( Egerton MSS. 2133 f. 7). Kemble states the situation thus: "Kniphaven in possession of a post on the Island of New York near Kings Bridge. Gen. Earl Cornwallis with Sir William Erskine reconnoitred to the North River, and from thence to Kings Bridge, the Country clear of Rebels." "The Country all this time unmercierilly Pilaged by our Troops, Hessians in particular, no wonder if the Country People refuse to join in," he adds particularly to the "Cabinet's Jour." Dr. Wm. Demonet, adjutant to Col. Robt. Magaw, who commands Fort Washington, deserts to the British. In 1792, he wrote a letter confessing his treason, his statement being in part as follows: "On the 2d of Novr 1776 I Sacrificed all I was Worth in the World to the Service of my King & Country and joined the then Lord Percy, brought in with me the Plans of Fort Washington, by which Plans that Fortress was taken by his Majesty's Troops the 16 instant, Together with 2700 Prisoners and Stores & Ammunition to the amount of 1800 Pounds. At the same time, I may with Justice affirm, from my Knowledge of the Works, I saved the Lives of many of His Majesty's Subjects—these Sirs are facts well-known to every General Officer which was there."—Mag. of Am. Hist. (1877), I: 80. See also The Campaigns of 1776, 281, footnote, Winsor, VI: 287.

"We had a Report this morning, of Fort Washington being Taken by y2 Kings Troops, it was also Alleged at Night y3 they had Taken Kings Bridge."—Diary of John Fitch (MS.). 87. Fort Washington was not taken until Nov. 16 (p.m.). A New Yorker writes to a friend in Bristol: "It is astonishing with what Judgment the Rebels Posts are fortified, and yet they will not remain in them to defend them; they retreat at the Sight of our Army, whether it is from Cowardice or Policy I leave to better Judge to determine. The other Day we took Possession of three of their Forts with 7t Pieces of Cannon, which they had abandoned. Washington is retreated into the Province of Connecticut, and Gen. Howe is in full March after him, to cut off his Retreat to New-England. Putnam is narrowly watched on New-York Island, almost surrounded. You would be surprised to see the Spirit of our Army, who are much exasperated against the Americans, most of whom have no other Clothes than a Blanket or Rag. I am told their whole Army is nearly in the same Situation. . . ."

"We have now 70 Sail of Transports ordered to be ready with three Months Provision, expecting to embark daily upon some new Expedition. A Report prevails here that the Congress is separated, and that sever of the States are gone to France, or some other Place, to secure their Dollars, for they have got much Cash of the Country into their Hands, you may guess for what Purpose. This is the News of the Day at New York. We have an exceeding good Market here; Beef 33d. per lb. and every other Kind of Provision is in equal Plenty, and proportionably cheap; the Army have it for taking, and the Fleet are served with it twice a Week."

"The inhabitants of Connecticut are coming to New-York and, opening Shops. We are in great Want here of every Material belonging to Shipping. Tar sold the other Day for three Guineas a Cask, it is much wanted, so is Pitch, Rosin, Sheathing Nails, Cordage, and Sailsloth, which would yield a good Profit."—St. James's Chron., D 21-24, 1776.

Thos. Clarke, in his will of this date, leaves his estate to his wife and her heirs. Pelletreau says of this bequest: "Captain Thomas Clarke was the owner of the farm which he named 'Chel'-maid and [which] still retains its name of Eastham from east of eighth avenue to Hudson river, between 21st and 59th streets. The greater part of this tract eventually came in possession of the daughter Charity, who married Rev. Benjamin Moore, Bishop of New York, and the mansion built on this estate, was the home of their son, Clement Clarke Moore. . . ."—Abstracts of Wills, in N. Y. H. S. Collections, IX: 36.

Robertson records that on this day he "Attended the Gen1 to King's Bridge to reconnoitre the Rebel's Works."—Robertson's Journal (MS.).

Kemble writes: "8 or 10 of our People taken Marauding; Scandalous behavior for British Troops; and the Hessians Outrageously Licentious, and Cruel to such a degree as to threaten with death all such as dare obstruct them in their depredations. Violence to Officers frequently used, and every Degree of Insolence offered."—Kemble's Journal, 98.

General Matthews, 2. Col-lieutenant Stirling, 3. Lord Percy, 4. General Von Klarpouzen, near whom Col. Rall with his brigade had the advantage on the North-port, where the ship of war lies and is to protect the flank; another ship of war lay at the South-haven and is to protect the English flank, when the thing comes off.” — Battle of Harlem Heights, 229, citing a translation of the original MS. at Caskell, N. About one o’clock, Gen. Howe’s adjutant-general made a demand of the surrender of the garrison at Fort Washington, but is answered by the commanding officer, Col. Robert Magaw, that he would defend it to the last extremity. — Gen. Greene’s letter to Col. Knox, written from Fort Lee on Nov. 17, in The Campaign of 1776, part 2, 100. “THe Batteries being finished for the Attack of Fort Washington, the Advanced Works were stormed this Morning, and the Fort surrendered, in the afternoon.” From transcript, in Library of Congress, of the “Jour. of the Operations,” etc., in Brit. Museum (Egerton MSS. 2155 f. 7). This “Journal” continues the British record of operations under Howe, including the capture of Fort Lee by Lord Cornwallis on Nov. 19, and of Newbridge on the Hackinsac River on Nov. 21.

Journals kept by officers employed with the British forces give detailed particulars of this engagement. Kemble writes, under this date: “In the Orders of the preceding day the 1st and 2d Light Infantry and Guards were ordered to march this morning at four; the Reserve at an hour before day Light; General Knispel’s Corps to receive their Orders from him: the whole to Attack the Rebels on the Heads leading to Fort Washington. . . . the first Landing of British Men about 11 and a half. Lord Cornwallis, King’s Bridge, when the Ensigns went up on board at 12 Noon, the tide not permitting it sooner, . . . at the same time the Hessians advanced upon the right, the Brigade of Guards & Light Infantry landed in the Harlem River were opposed by a small Body of Rebels, who soon fled, but carried off a piece of Cannon they had in a Redoubt, which was meant to prevent our landing; here we received little loss—only 4 or 5 killed and 10 or 12 Wounded the Men at Arms.”

“Lord Percy attacked at the same time and Carried all the Rebel Lines with little loss, taking them in flank as he approached them; by two o’clock were in possession of all their Forts and Redoubts except Washington, and cut them off from Escaping to the Jersey Shore, &c. and its latt’r done by the Hessians. Our Troops had haved with their usual spirit and have added Laurels to the British Nation.”

“The Attack, having commenced at 12, was over about one at 4 in the Afternoon the Rebels Surrendered the Fort, having treated for some time before with our Officers, particularly the Hessians, who Cut off their Retreat to the Water, & desired the honors of War. It is Amazing to say that they had not above 12 Men Killed and as many Wounded. The Officers to keep their side Arms, the Men to lay down their Arms, which was done about five. To our shame, tho’ they Captivat’d for the Safety of their Baggage, they were stripped of their Wearing Apparel as they Marched out by Hessians, till a Stop was put to it by making them take a different Route. They were so thronged in the Fort that they could not have subsisted there above a week. An American woman, Margaret Corbin, was wounded in this fight—See Nov. 16.

The following summons to surrender was sent to the commander of the fort: “The Commander in Chief demands an immediate and categorical Answer to his second Summons of Fort Washington.”

"The Garrison must immediately surrender Prisoners of War, and give up all their Arms, Ammunition and Stores of every Kind, and send two Field Officers to Head-Quarters as Hostages; in so doing, the General is pleased to allow the Garrison to keep Possession of their Baggage, and the Officers to have their Swords."

Robertson writes: "A Number of Flat Boats having pass’d up the N. River to King’s Bridge unperceived the Night before—Four diff Attacks were ordered to be made by day Break on the Lines and Diff strong grounds on York Island In order to reduce Fort Washington." He then gives a vivid description of the attack and the battle that ensued, a bitter contest. He notes: "Tho’ the Genl had sumon’d the Fort the Night before—They [the Americans] were all admitted as Prisoners—and the officers their Baggage & swords about 2900 were taken alive their loss from their situation during the Attacks was but Trifling."

Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

A graphic description of the capture of Fort Washington was written by John Reuber in a journal under date of 1st Nov., (error for Nov. 16): "... in the morning before day-break, all the regiments and corps were assembled, the Hessians on the right wing at the north-haven; the English troops upon the left wing at the south-haven. When it was now day and the Americans perceived us, but nothing more very plainly, at once, these two ships of war, on both sides, made their master-strokes upon the fort, and we began at the same time on the left-hand side, and the Hessians, and the regiments marched forward up the hill and were obliged to creep along up the rocks, one falling down alive, another being shot dead. We were obliged to drag ourselves by the beeche-tree bushes up the height where we could not really stand. At last, however, we got about on the top of the hill where there were trees and great stones. We had a hard time of it there together. Because they had now had no idea of yielding. Col. Ball gave the word of command, thus: ‘All, that are my grenadiers, march forwards!’ All the drummers struck up the march, the haastboy-players blew. At once all were mingled together, Americans and Hessians. There was no more firing, but all ran forward pell-mell upon the fortress. Before we came up, the Americans had a trench about the fortress, as soon as we were within which, no order came to halt. Then the Americans had a minute to get out through us, but then came the command: ‘Hold you are all prisoners of war.’ The port was at once demanded by Gen. V. Kniphausen. The rebels were allowed two hours for capitulating; when they were expired, the fort was surrendered to General V. Kniphausen with all the munitions of war and provisions belonging thereto, within and without the fort; all guns and arms were to be laid down, and when all this was done, Ball’s reg’t and the old Lossberg, being made to form into two lines facing each other, they were required to march out between the two regiments and deposit their guns and other weapons. Then came the English and took them to New York into custody, and when the transport was off, the second marched out of the citadel and was as strong as the first, and they also were conducted to New York into confinement. And when all this was got through with, it was night. Thus the Hessians took possession of the fort, and the rest marched again round to Kingsbridge into our old camp we had before stopped so long. Then came the order that the fort should be called, Fort Kniphausen.—"Battle of Harlem Heights, 229-31, citing "the Original MSS. at Cased," the translation being in the N. Y. H. S.

A more circumstantial military account of the transaction was written by Joseph Wieloch in the Hessische, contingent, pub. in ibid., 231-34, and citing the translation of the original MSS., in the N. Y. H. S.

A British officer thus described the attack on Fort Washington in a letter of Nov. 20: "On Saturday last [Nov. 16] we attacked Fort Washington, on the island of New York, the strongest post that ever was occupied by an army; the difficulties we had to surmount are almost incredible; hills covered with wood, and almost perpendicular; from the top of the hill we could see the fort; short, there was every thing to favour the Rebels in point of ground. We attacked the south and east sides of the ground; the Hessians, in two columns, made their attack on the north. They behaved with distinguished bravery; ... Lord Percy led on the troops under his command with great spirit, and forced the Rebels works with very little loss; his horse was twice wounded, but fortunately his Lordship received no hurt: the Rebels all ran into the fort, where they had 3000 firelocks charged: ... They hung out a flag of truce, and asked leave to surrender with the honours of war; they were sent word, by Lieut. Gen. Kniphausen, that if they did not surrender in thirty minutes, the fort should be stormed, and every man put to death: they instantly complied with the terms, marched out of the fort, and grounded their arms; we made 2,500 prisoners, with 1,124 clothing for two battalions. At twelve at night they were marched prisoners at New York."—London Packet, Ja 6-8, 1777.

"A Gentleman, who saw the Action on the Kingsbridge Side, affirms, that nothing could exceed the Firmness and Intrepidity of the German Troops in making their Attack, nor the Alertness and Vigor of the Highlanders in ascending Rocks and Precipices almost insurmountable."

"An Officer, who was present with Lord Percy's Detachment on the Haerlem Side of the Attack, informs us, that Lord Howe animated the Troops by his Presence, and was near Lord Percy during the principal Part of the Engagement."—N. Y. Merc., N 25, 1776.

On the American side, Gen. Greene, writing from Fort Lee on Nov. 17 to Col. Knox, thus described the surrendered fort: General Washington, General Putnam, General Mercer, and myself, went to the island to determine what was best to be done; but just at the instant we stepped on board the boat the enemy made their appearance on the hill where the Monday action was, and began a severe cannonade with several field-pieces. Our guards soon fled, the enemy advancing up to the second line. This was done while we were crossing the river and getting upon the hill. The enemy made several marches to the right and to the left,—I suppose to reconnoitrate the fortifications and the lines. There we all stood in a very awkward situation. As the disposition was made, and the enemy advancing, we durst not attempt to make any new disposition; indeed, we saw nothing amiss. We all urged his Excellency to come off. I offered to stay. General Putnam did the same, and so did General Mercer but his Excellency thought it best for us all to come off together, which we did, about half an hour before the enemy surrounded the fort. The enemy came up Harlem River, and landed a party at head-quarters, which was upon the back of our people in the lines. A disorderly retreat soon took place; without much firing the people retreated into the fort. On the north side of the fort there was a very heavy fire for a long while; and as the enemy had the advantage of the ground, I apprehend that it must be must be great. After the troops retreated in the fort, very few guns were fired. The enemy approached within small-arm fire of the lines, and sent in a flag, and the garrison capitulated in an hour. I was afraid of the fort; the redoubt you and I advised, too, was not done, or little or nothing done to it. Had that been complete, I think the garrison might have defended themselves a long while, or the enemy good their landing across Harlem River, when we had hard fighting to reach the Fort,—Just as we had reached the gate the flag went out and Surrendered the fort and ourselves prisoners of war."—Johnston, Battle of Harlem Heights, 1776, p. 180.

Pastor Shewkirk states in his diary that the capture of Fort Washington "was a matter of moment, as now one may hope that the communication with the Jerseys will be open, as also with the places up the East River; so that the Inhabitants may come to the city and provisions be brought in; especially wood, which is not to be had, and is extremely dear; a cord of oak wood, bought

With the capture of Fort Washington the whole island fell into the possession of the British. The Hessians, mercenaries, whom Elector of Hesse had hired to King George III, were encamped on the heights of Harlem; and General Knyphausen, their commander, occupied the Morris house as his headquarters, and it continued to be so used by the British and Hessians until the evacuation of the island on the 25th of November, 1776.—Mag. of Am. Hist., VII: 100. See also Winsor, II: 298, 338, 339; Fort Washington with a Hist. of the Defence and Reduction of Mount Washing-town, by Reginald Pelham Bolton (1902); Relics of the Revolution . . . in Forts and Camps on Manhattan Island, by Bolton (1916); and L. M. R. K., III: 945.

A London news item stated that "Upon the attack of Fort Washington, the retreat was formed by the General of that name, in so masterly a manner, that all the Generals publicly declared, that the first soldier in Europe could not have governed himself better; and that General Washington's conduct was of that style to do him great military honour."—London Packet, Ja 3-6, 1777.

Robt. H. Harrison writes to Maj. Gen. Schuyler from Harlem on Nov. 20: . . . The loss Sustained on both Sides is not ascertained. We know the Lines were warmly disputed in some Parts, particularly on the Pass above the Fort, leading to Kingsbridge. In that Quarter the Engagement was of long hours, long and heavy; and by the Information of one of the Train, who escaped on Monday Night, attended with considerable Slaughter among the Hessians. The Firing there lasted, it is said, and was incessant from 2 & ½ to 3 hours. The Artillerist adds that Lieut. Col. Rawlins, who was posted there, maintained his Ground a long Time, within The Lines, four days without ammunition, and at Last was obliged to give Way, on Account of their infinitely Superior Number; and a constant Succession of Troops. His Major, Otho Williams Esq., a young Gentleman who promised much good Service to his Country, is reported to have fallen. Our Loss in killed is supposed to be inconceivable."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., III: 180.

After the capture of Fort Washington, the British gave the name "Fort Tryon" to the Harvey town, considered the original action at this point (where a monument was erected in 1909), see 14th Ann. Rep., Am. Scien. & Hist. Soc. Pres. Soc. (1909) 59; and for the dedication of this monument, Sept. 29, 1909, see 15th Ann. Rep., of this society (1910), 347-62. An original plan of the attacks on Fort Washington (294 x 233 in.), bearing the title "Attacks of Fort Washington by His Majesty's Forces under the Command of Genl. Sir William Howe K. B. 16 Nov. 1776," is owned by the N. Y. H. S. (the gift of Robert L. Stuart, Jan. 1, 1861).

Soon after this date, Sauther made surveys for the beautiful map of the northern part of Manhattan Island which is reproduced and described in Vol. I (Pl. 461). In his Map of the North Part of New York Island, Exhibiting the Plan of Fort Washington, now Fort Knyphausen, with the Rebel Lines to the Southward, which were Forced by the Troops under the Command of the R'd Honble Earl Percy on the 16th Nov. 1776, and Survey'd immediately after by Order of his Lordship, by Claude Joseph Sauther. To which is added the Attack made to the Northb' by the Hessians, Survey'd by Order of Lieut. Genl. Knyphausen. Published by Permission of the R'd Honble the Commissioners of Trade & Plantations by Wm Faden, 1777. See also reproductions in Col. Hist. MSS. (Red Papers), I: 552; Man. Com. Coun. (1859), 120.

In 1906, Reginald Pelham Bolton prepared for the Am. Scien. and Hist. Pres. Soc. an historical map of the west side of the upper part of Manhattan Island, from 166th St. to Spuyten Duyvil. This shows the location of Indian shell heaps, the planting ground of the Weck-ques-keek tribe, military roads during the Revolution, camp of the Seventeenth Foot (Cock Hill Camp), Cock Hill Fort, Fort Tryon 1776, the British Sanitary Camp 1779-1781, the pontoon bridge over Spuyten Duyvil 1779-1782, the North River redoubt 1779-1785, the Dyckman homestead 1785, Bastiaen Kortright's dwelling in the Middle Horse Tavern 1812, and fishermen's huts on Little Sandy Bay. A printed copy of this map is filed in the real estate bureau of the comptroller's office (map No. 215).

The British assaulted the American fortifications on Laurel Hill (see 1776, Autumn), and carried them at the point of the bayonet.—20th Ann. Rep., Am. Scien. and Hist. Soc. Pres. Soc., 144. Later, these works were extended and elaborated by the British and became Fort Clinton (ibid. 423); and in 1783 the British constructed here "commanding fortifications" and called the works Fort George.—Ibid., 431. "Some Time in 3rd Afternoon the Prisoners Taken at Fort Washington were brought into 4th City."—Diary of Otho Fitch (MS.), 97. These numbered about 3,000 men.—N. Y. Merc., N 25, 1776.

Most of the churches and sugar-houses of New York were used as barracks for these prisoners. Pastor Sheekler' reports that the Moravian Church, after some conflict of authority, was spared, and "as the oldest of the long Convent of the Moravians," to the North Dutch Church.—Sheekler's Diary, op. cit., 121-22.

Lieu. Oliver Babcock, of Knowlton's Rangers, writes in his diary (now in the Pension Bureau, Washington), under this date: "Came to York and Lodged in ye [Quaker] Meeting House." See also his entry of Dec. 15.—Johnston, Battle of Harlem Hts. 198, 219. See also L. M. R. K., III: 949. Jabez Sandy was the son of Alexander Graydon, given the following account of his experiences in New York: "Our men," he says, "were confined in churches and sugar-houses and quarters were assigned for us who were officers, in the upper part of the town, in what was called the holy ground. But . . . I ventured to take boarding at four dollars per week. . . . The person with whom I boarded was a Mrs. Carroll, who, under the protection of General Robertson, considered herself a "prison". For an account of her transactions with British "prisoners" see L. M. R. K., III: 149. Jabez Sandy gave his experiences under the auspices of General Robertson, took possession of and furnished with our own mattresses and blankets." Having secured funds from his family in Philadelphia, and clothing from his bag at Fort Washington, Capt. Graydon was able to enjoy considerable freedom in the city. "One day," he says, "I sallied forth alone and walked past the coffee-house, down to the battery. Finding the gate-way open, I entered it and after traversing it to its extremity, I stroked back again; almost every sentinel, to my great surprise, I must confess, vanished like a spirit. "At the bread-board," he adds, "I took a turn into another part of the town, after a considerable round, regained my lodgings, without having met with the smallest molestation."—Memoirs of His Own Time, by Alexander Graydon, ed. by John S. Littell (Phila., 1846), 223-26.

The "Laidleanas" (followers of the Rev. Archibald Laidlie, who was called in 1763 to preach in English in the Middle Dutch Church) had possession until 1776 of the records and revenues of the Dutch Church, as allowed by a judgment of the supreme court in a suit brought against them by the Dutch faction in the church. In 1776, Geno reversed the judgment of the court, "seized upon the edifice, converted it into a prison for rebels," and put the old Dutch faction in possession of the revenues and records; possession they held until the evacuation of New York by the British army in 1783.—Jones, Hist. of N. Y. during the Rev. War, I: 21-23. See also Eeles, Revs., VII: 398-398, 4105.

The Middle Horse Tavern was used as a prison and afterwards as a riding-school for the British officers and soldiers, and became the scene of habitual ribaldry, profanity, and dissipation. The whole of the interior, galleries and all, was destroyed, leaving the bare walls and roof."—De Witt, Discourse (1837), 40.
The most distinguished prisoner confined there was the Abbé de la Motte of the Augustinian order [see S. 16]. He was captured on a French ship and brought to New York. On attempting to say mass, he was kept a close prisoner until his exchange in 1779—Jour. Privy, Hist. Soc. (1917-8), IX: 364. The Abbé de la Motte, the French priest, was originally possessed, Witte, op. cit., 40. See also Looming, Field-Book of the Revolution, II: 629. Regarding its reopening as a church, see Dec. 1784.

The Garden St. (Dutch) Church, which did not suffer during the war, reopened on Dec. 11, 1783 (q.v.), just after the British evacuation.

The 13th Brigade, 3d Battn Grenadiers 2d Battn I & IV & 3rd Hessian Brigades went to New York—The other Troops returned to their Tents—F² Washington Nominated Fort Nippasquaen [Knyphausen] by Genl Orders.—Robertson's Jour. (MS.); Kemble Papers, N. Y. H. S. Collections, XVI: 441. "Fort Washington became Knyphausen, as a special compliment to its captor. The Hessians themselves were not all satisfied with Howe's delays, which cost them a large part of their loss. The wounded were sent over to Capt. Jones, who was in command; the Hessian brigade of Schimmarn garrisoned Fort Washington, and the Waldecker regiment Fort Independece."—The German Allied Troops in the North Am. War of Independence; translated from the German of Max von Edmund, by J. G. Rosengarten (1831), 72.

Kemble records: "At 9 at Night, the Reserves, two Battalions Light Infantry, Chasseurs, and three Battalions Hessians, Embarked under the Command of Lord Cornwallis, and Crossed the North River the next morning early (the 20th) and landed without any opposition nearly opposite Colonel Philip's."—Kemble's Jour., 101. See N. 20.

The "Solebay" arrives in the harbour, "having under Convoj a Number of Merchants and Transports, with the 6th Regiment on board from St. Vincent's."—N. Y. Merc, N. 25, 1776.

At daybreak, the British and Hessians under Cornwallis land on the Jersey shore "almost opposite to Phillips's house." They march on to Fort Lee and find both it and Fort Constitution (cf. O 19) abandoned, "& the Rebel Tents Stores Guns &c Standing."—Robinson's Jour. (MS.);

Kemble's record says: "The Troops under Lord Cornwallis's Command amounted to about 4,000 Men. Fort Constitution taken by his Lordship the same day; a quantity of Provisions, Ammunition, &c. were found in it, with about 30 pieces of Cannon, among which were two Brass Mortars. They likewise left their Tents standing, to the number of 300 or better, and their Kettles boiling; supposed to have quitted these Posts with between 3 and 4 thousand Men."—Kemble's Jour., 101.

The news report describes the capture thus: "So great was the Haste of the Rebels to quit their boasted Fort Lee, or Constitution, that they left behind their Meat dressing at the Fire. There were found in the Works, which a Handful of brave Men might have defended, 1 large Brass and 2 Iron Mortars, about 40 Pieces of Cannon, the astonishing Number of 400,000 Cartridges and a great Quantity of Military Stores. With the Troops came up with their Rear-guard and the Baggage, the Rebels relinquishing the whole at the first Fire, and many of them threw down their Arms and surrendered. The People Counted extremely well, and rebuilt a Bridge or two which the Rebels had destroyed uponHackensack River, even before the Troops could come up to them."—N. Y. Merc, N. 25, 1776.

There is in the Emmet Collection (item No. 7815), in the N. Y. P. L., an original water-color drawing entitled "The Landing of the British Forces in the Jerseys on the 20th of November 1776 under the command of the Rt Honl Lieut Genl Earl Cornwallis." This is supposed to have been made by Lord Rawdon, who served at the time as engineer officer on Cornwallis's staff; it was purchased at the sale of the effects of the Marquis of Hastings, his grandson.

Rev. Dr. Abraham writes to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts that, "Upon his arrival at that once delightful but now unhappy city, he found everything in great confusion. Upon searching the rubbish of his late venerable Church, and his large and elegant house, he could find only a very few tribes of little or no value, except the Church plate and his own. Providence having preserved him two chapels, he begins to have divine service again regularly carried on, after a suspension of near three months, and people begin to flock in, so that they will soon be filled. The several churches in that and the neighboring governments are converted to the worst of purposes, and the Society's missionaries are either in a jail, or sent away back into the country. His wife and daughters are still in the hands of the rebels, and he knows not when he shall be able to obtain their freedom. The house hath itself sustained by fire and cruel devastations amount already to 2500 L. sterling, and to the loss sustained by his church, to the amount of 25000 L. sterling, must be added also that of the quit rents, which the tenants, as they are burnt out, are unable to pay."

The Doctor adds, that as soon as public affairs are settled, such measures will be adopted, as shall be recommended by their superiors, for procuring some assistance from this part of the world, in order to rebuild the church, the schools, and parsonage house; and they flatter themselves their applications will be attended with success."—From an "Abstract of the Proceedings" of this society, 1776-7, p. 68, printed in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1870), 274-75.

Kemble records: "Am told Lord Cornwallis is pursuing his Route thro' Jersey . . . .—Kemble's Jour., 101. On Nov. 22, he says: "Cornwallis still about 3 Miles from the Landing; this Evening came to Town. The General [Howe] went to Jersey; returned about 11 at Night."—See D. 7.

The following general orders are among those issued on this day from Gen. Howe's headquarters at "De Lancey's Mill.

"In ye Morning we are Informed there are a Number more of Prisoners bro't into ye City, it is said they were taken at Fort Lee, before Night I see a Woman y' was taken among those Prisoners. 24 Following items are published in New York: "The Ground and Defences about Fort Washington, are so very strong and advantageous, that a Correspondent supposes, a Handful of British Troops would have maintained the Place for six Months against an Army of Thirty Thousand Men."

The Flower of the Rebel Army are among the Prisoners taken at Fort Washington.

"The whole Number of Prisoners, now in Town, is near 5,000; many of them half naked."—N. Y. Merc., N 25, 1776.

"To all their other Enormities, the Congress have added the Barbarity of entirely deserting the poor Wretches, whom they had brought into their Service, when taken Prisoners by the King's Troops. They have sent them neither Money, Subsistence nor Clothing, and they have paid the least Attention to the accumulating Distresses of either them or their Families. It is therefore needless to express the Filthiness of their Appearance and Situation; and if His Majesty's Officers had not shewed more Humanity to these deluded People, than their Masters the Congress, their Situation must have been doubly deplorable. Considering their great Numbers and their necessary Confinement, every possible Attention has been given to alleviate their Distress, arising from the complicated Evils of Guilt, Sickness, and Poverty.

"All Philadelphia is in the utmost Consternation; and the Inhabitants are moving out of it with their Families and Effects as fast as possible.

Samuel Kemple, "Naval Officer for this Port," arrived this week.—N. Y. Merc., N 25, 1776.

Another comment is as follows: "When Mr. Cadwallar, a young Officer in the Service of the Rebels, was dismissed the other Day by the General's Order, on Account of his Father's civil Treatment of General Prescott, while a Boy in his Possession, upon the last Instance of Generosity showed him, and discovered such Sensibility on the Occasion, as did him Honor as a Man and a Gentleman. 'Tis to be regretted, that such Men could have been seduced into so unexampled a rebellion against his King and the Constitution of his Country."—Ibid.

A letter from New York contains the following news: "Captain Burton and Cledaad in the British Queen and Joseph victualers, ran on the Glausetel about 12 days ago in going up the North River. The enemy being then in possession of Fort Washington and its lines on this side, and Fort Constitution, &c. on the other, and the enemy had also sunk several vessels with cannon and mouths into the river to obstruct the passage, leaving a channel on the side of New York Island; in passing which they were becalmed; the Joseph lay above three hundred yards from the Battery, a superb battery playing on her, which tore her rigging, &c. to pieces, but had only one man wounded, who, from obscurity in not having his wound open, is since dead. The British Queen received several shot, but had no men killed or wounded."—London Packet, Ja 3-6, 1777.

Notice is published that a duplicate of the address presented to the king's commissioners, Admiral Lord Howe and Gen. Howe, on Oct. 16 (p. 16) has been "lodged in the Hands of Mr. James Downes," at "Scott's Tavern, near the City-Hall," where the signatures of returning inhabitants will be received.—N. Y. 26 The last division of Hessians has arrived in the city. Henry White, a member of the council, is with them. He became useful to Gov. Tryon, by his influence among the citizens, in establishing such police regulations as the governor, in his now restricted sphere as the civil executive, can command.—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 691.

Gen. Howe orders that a "General Court Martial" be held the following day in the City Hall.—Finkle, "Journals," in N. Y. H. S. Collections (188), XVI: 415. Others were ordered on later dates to be held at the same place.—Ibid., 423, 434, 439.

Gov. Tryon writes to Lord Germain: "I am getting proper lists of Officers, as also of Magistrates, that the civil Government may have its full operation as soon as it is judged proper to re-establish it with all its powers."—Ibid., VIII: 691. In such portion of the province as was under British rule, military government was continued until Nov. 25, 1783 (q. v.).

"On Tuesday [Nov. 26] the Perseus and the Galatea, two Frigates, were furnished with Commander-in-Chief Washington, to form a Convoy. They have been sent out to the convoy a large body of Troops, as a reinforcement to the fleet, which is to be employed in the proposed undertaking. The Perseus alone has taken or retaken 15 or 16 Prizes, and sent them safe into Harbor."—N. Y. Merc., D 2, 1776.

Tryon writes to Lord Germain: "The enclosed Plan of Fort George with the Works on the Lower Battery, and the intermediate buildings, will exhibit a Plot of ground which I esteem upon a settlement of the present war would be extremely advisable to be secured as Crown Land.

"The Fort with proper buildings might contain the King's Arsenal and Armoury and when all the buildings and Barracks now standing are Demolish'd, a proper Forthright might be marked out for the Soldiery, and a handsome range of barracks constructed for as many men as might be thought proper for a standing Garrison.

"The Inhabitants who claim the property in the houses and lots in Pearl Street and buildings adjoining, might probably be satisfied out of the Rebel Tenements within the City, upon Confirmation."

"By this arrangement . . . the soldier would be kept distinct from the Citizen and the Commercial Interest of the Town not in the least injured, as no docks or wharves have ever been built where the line of works border on the East and North River. All the ground within the dotted black line from Whitehall to the North River is proposed to be reserved to the Crown for the purposes above mentioned."—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 691-92.

On Jan. 14, 1777, Lord Germain, acknowledging receipt of this, wrote to Tryon that he should avail himself "of the present circumstances to secure, for His Maj's use, such part of the destroyed Town, as in the opinion of the Engineers will be most proper for erecting a Citadel, or other works, as well to command the Town as for the defence of the harbour."—Ibid., VIII: 691. Jabez Fitch writes: "About Noon I went down to ye Dutch Church to see Sarg Tracy, & ye other Prisoners, whom I found in a very pitiful condition, both on acc of Sickness & Accumulation, I then came home by way of ye Fly market, & found our people Zealously Engaged at Card playing—

British officers examine the Moravian meeting-house with a view to occupying it, but "Bro. Shenkel" appealed to Gen. Robertson, who said "he intended to have no more disturbances where service was kept." This house was "the only place where public service was held when there was none in the whole city."—Campaign of 1776, p. 1, 122-23.

A loyalist writes to a correspondent in London: "as to our situation at New York, I must inform you that provisions are really cheap, considering the demand; and now the communication is opened, by the taking of Fort Washington, we shall be served much cheaper from the country; at present, most of our provisions are brought by water. As to lodging, you may rest assured, we are in no want of rooms. When the General went from hence, he left us 9000 men, which was on the 14th of October [p. iv.], and on the 18th, the remainder of Hessians arrived, who had hardly time to breathe before they were sent on actual service. They have suffered very severely in the several actions, and particularly in that of Washington Fort [see N 16], where they lost three to one more than the English. . . . I am told they behaved like Lyons when they took the out-works of Fort Washington; and had they then entered the Fort, they would most certainly have put every man to the sword that came in their way. General Howe, in compliment for his service on that day, called the Fort after their commanding officer [see Nov. 18]. . . . This month is the very worst in the whole year, at this place, on account of the strong north-wester, which continually blow during that time, and are so piercing, that there is no standing them. All the troops that could be spared from Boston, have been sent to reinforce General Washington, whose army, we hear, will soon be fewer in number, as the time of many of them is now expired, and they mean to return home."—London Packet, Jan. 1-3, 1777.

Gen. Anthony Wayne writes from Ticonderoga to Richard Peters, secretary of war: "An express just Arrived brings advice of Fort Washington being in the Hands of the Enemy [see N 16] and the Whole Garrison Consisting of 2000 men being killed or Prisoners; and that our people are on the Jersey side Retreating from post to post.

"Is the Genius of America fled our arms—is she Ashamed to associate with her Degenerate sons—or does she Esteem them as Aliens, unworthy her protection: are not the Enemy as vulnerable as us—cuts not our Swords as keen—pierces not our Balls as deep as theirs—they do—why then this terror—why shrink as from a Gorgon head, whenever they appear. Oh my Dear Sir I but too well know the Occasion. If you have any Regard for the Liberty of your Country—or the Honor of America; Imbode the Southern troops by themselves,—give more Attention to Manoeuvring—and less to working—and rest assured of Success."—From original letter in Emmet Coll. Frequent fires in chimneys having occurred, Maj. Gen. Robertson appoints six inspectors of chimneys, who shall see that all chimneys that require it shall be swept and cleaned.—Front recital in proclamation of Feb. 24, 1777 (p. v.).

"The large and elegant corner house opposite to the Coffee House, well known by the name of the Old Coffee House; and also a small house adjoining it in Dock-Street" are offered for lease.—N. Y. Merc., Dec. 2, 1776. The large house, and small dwelling adjoining (well shown on Pl. 65, Vol. 1), were in 1765 conveyed by James Drew to Archibald Kennedy (Liber Deeds, XVIII: 315; Albany); the large house was at that time in the occupancy of the "Widow Brevan," as recited in that instrument. It was sold by John Kennedy (son and heir of Archibald Kennedy) and Robert Kennedy to James A. Stewart in 1801.—Ibid., XCIV: 552 (New York). This was the tavern from which Mrs. Ferrara moved in 1774 (p. 21, Ap. 27).

The following report is published in London: "Letters from New-York mention, that Mr. Dickinson, a Member of Congress, and Author of the celebrated Farmers Letters, published in Favour of America about ten Years since, had arrived in that City, in Consequence of a Dispute with Mess. Hancock, Adams, and Franklin, and was preparing, by the Permission of General Howe, to embark for England upon Affairs of the utmost Importance."—St. James's Chronicle, Dec. 3-5, 1776.

Gov. Tryon writes to Mayor Hicks from the "Duchess of Gordon," in the harbour, enclosing an address to the inhabitants of the colony of New York, notifying them that he has the king's permission to withdraw from his government, and recommending that they return to their allegiance to the British crown.—Col. Hist. MS Eng., 85.

A British officer writes from New York: "No doubt you will be extremely sorry to hear, that Mr. Washington had given us the slip at King's-bridge, and got safe to the mountains; his Aid de Camp, Mufflin, covered his retreat. . . . this is the second time they have escaped out of our clutches: . . .

"Most of the army have all along looked upon the enemy in a very contemptible light; and inferred their behaviour has, on most occasions, justified that opinion." . . .

"Washington has in many respects behaved like a gentleman and an officer; but his inhuman orders to burn New-York [see O 1, regarding this charge] will be a lasting blot in his escutcheon. The conflagration however did not produce all the bad effects the enemy intended; on the contrary, it served to purify the air, and I believe it was the means of preventing a plague; such was the filthy state of that quarter of the town when the rebels left it! . . .

"We have now got near 5000 prisoners in New-York, and many of them are such ragamuffins, as you never saw in your life: I cannot give you a better idea of them than by putting you in mind of Falsstaff's recruits, or poor Tom in King Lear; and yet they had been fed every neree to cover their Nakedness, by dismantling all the beds, and tearing down the tapestry, hangings, and curtains; two deserters came over to us one day, who seemed at a distance to be Heralds; but on a nearer view we found they had got the story of Judith and Holofernes upon their backs, worked in old Dutch tapestry. The baggage which the Yankees left behind at King's-bridge (and which the Waldeckers were so eager to deck themselves with) would rival the choicest exhibitions of Ragfair. . . .

"To do them justice, they are tolerable good hands at fortifications; their arms are (like the gravedigger's) a pick axe and a spade: these they handle with great dexterity: never were works better constructed or worse defended: in short, there is no doubt of our prevailing in the field, whatever we may do in the cabinet—there I fear we shall be out-witted. . . .

"I dare say that you (in London) hear many absurd and groundless reports about us; which is not to be wondered at, considering that we on the spot hear a number of lying stories about ourselves, and the enemy. A few days ago Hearsay drowned Gen. Washington in the North River; and Report shot Gen. Lee with a pistol, raised by his own hand, against his own head: however Mr. Lee, so far from being laid low, is now posted in West Chester, on a ridge of black mountains, to which the Yankees (from a spirit of contradic- tion, I suppose) have given the name of White Plains. Washington is at Trenton with about 4000 men; and Lord Cornwallis has got to Brunswick, on the high road to Philadelphia, and means to beat up the quarters of the General Congress."—London Packet, Jan. 13-15, 1777.

Hutchins writes: "a Battle of ye Hessians came into Town, & March'd by with vulgar Ceremony; At about 11 I observ'd a number of Hessian Troops on ye plain above ye Gen'l Hospital; I Emediately went over to ye Burying ground where I see their

He swears that "...the prisoners were very roughly used at Harlacom, on their way from Fort Washington to New-York; that at New-York eight hundred of them were stowed into a house called New-Bridewell [see Mr 27, 1775] that it was a cold, open house, the windows not glazed; that on Monday they received their provisions; that they did not once mouthful of food from early on the morning until then; that then, and so on afterwards their rations for three days, each individual, were one half pound of biscuit, half a pound of pork, a half pint of peas, half a gill of rice, and half an ounce of butter, the whole not more than enough for one good meal; that they were deraised of this petty allowance two days' rations, each week; that they had no straw or hay to lie on; and no bed but one cart-load, per week, for the eight hundred men; that at nine of the clock at evening, the Hessian guards would come in and put out the fires, and lay on the poor prisoners with heavy clubs for sitting round the fire; that the water was very bad, as well as their bread, beyond all comparison bad, except once, good biscuit, and once good baker's bread; that they began to die like rotten slow and dirty that those who had any good wearing apparel, such as bucklin breeches or good coats, were necessitated to sell them, to purchase bread to keep them alive; that the enemy seemed to take a kind of infernal pleasure in their sufferings."—5 *Am. Arch., III.: 1334; Onderdonk, British Prisons of War Ships at N. T. 1776-1783, 76.

16 Oliver Woodrufl, another American taken prisoner at Fort Washington, after his release made the following record of his confinement: "...We were marched to New-York, and went into different prisons. 816 went into the New-Bridewell, I among the rest... On Thursday morning they brought us a little provision which was the first meal we got to eat or drink after eating our breakfast on Saturday morning. We never drew as much provision for three days' allowance as a man would eat at a common meal. I was there three months during that insulent season, and never saw any fire except what was in the lamps of the city. There was not a pane of glass in the windows, and nothing to keep out the cold except the iron grates."—ibid., 37. See also 4, 1777.

"He left the Nation extremely pleased with General Howe's Successes on Long-Island, of which he was the welcome Messenger, having sailed from this city the evening of the 2nd of August, on his Passage in 30 Days. Ebenezer Hazard writes from Carpenter's Ferry, Fishkill, to the N. Y. committee of safety that he has received "credible information that the records of the city of New-York were buried near King's Bridge." He thinks his informant was Col. Palfrey, the paymaster-general, and as nearly as he can recollect, Palfrey told him "the records were deposited in Colonel Cortlandt's family vault;" also that Palfrey "received the hint of it from Mrs. Van Cortlandt."

Hazard suggests that "proper measures may be taken to secure those authentic documents, which may be of great service in a future day."—5 *Am. Arch., III.: 1248-49. "During the stirring years of the war, the New York city records were safely stored in the dark recesses of the Van Cortlandt family vault, a short distance above the mansion, Augustus Van Cortlandt being then city clerk."—15th Ann. 8 Timothy Parker and other prisoners, on board the "Whitby Prison-Ship, New York," write to Gen. Trumbull; Parker says: "I make no doubt but your Honour long before this hath been apprised of our being prisoners in New-York. That our present situation is most wretched, your Honour need not doubt, which I likewise hope you will soon be assured of from men of undisputed veracity. There are more than two hundred and fifty prisoners of us on board this ship, (some of which are sick, and without the least physician, doctor, or surgeon) in two-thirds allowance of salt provisions, and all crowded promiscuously together, without distinction or respect to person, office, or colour; in the small room of a ship's between-decks; allowed only to walk the main deck from about sunrising till sunset, at which time we are ordered below deck..."

These, sir, with many other miserable circumstances too lengthy and tedious to enumerate, are the just portrait of our present situation. In short, sir, we have no prospect before our eyes but a kind of lingering inevitable death, unless we obtain a timely and seasonable release.

"From your Honour's well-known character of humanity and justice, we humbly hope that your authority will be exercised in procuring us an exchange."—5 *Am. Arch., III.: 1138-39.

Treasure is issued at Flincoll, and printed there this year by Simon Loring and John Thomas, of the Corporation of the State of New-York to their Constituents. The news of the day in New York includes the following reports: "The Rebels are everywhere moulderng away like a Rope of Sand. At the close of this year, Lieut. Col. Stephen Kemble makes the following critical entry in his journal, on the "Conduct of Commanders in Chief of Armies, &c."—The delay of our Army under General Howe at New York Island, for some days, unnecessary. The Landing at Frogs Neck [see O 12], from whence no Issue but by a Narrow Causeway, not to be passed but with difficulty, without an Enemy to oppose—why not move to the White Plains immediately, and Attack the Rebels before their Works were completed?

"After Fort Washington was taken [see N 16], why not send a Detachment of the Army to Brunswick to cut off Mr. Washington from Lord Cornwallis?"—The General Clinton's Troops would have answered that purpose Effectually. Provisions might have been sent to Brunswick for all these Services by Water, and no delay in the proceedings of the Troops.

"Why Post so small Detachments as to be in danger of Intolt, as happened in Rall's Affair, upon the Frontiers of your Line of Communication, or why put Hessians at the advanced Posts, particularly the Man at Trenton, who was Nosy, but not sullen, unacquainted with the Language, and a Drunkard?"—Kemble's Jour., 104-5.

In this year, the first edition of The Atlantic Neptune appeared; this is the best and most complete hydrographic work regarding the Western Atlantic coast published up to modern times; it began in 1776 (q. v.), and was published in two large atlas folios by Joseph F. W. Des Barres. For description, see PHS, 44, 45-8, I: 346-53; Winsor, VII: 183. The collection of plates, both views and charts, from this magnificent work in the author's possession, is the most complete known.

There was published this year in London an 8vo volume of 80 pages, now very scarce, entitled A Letter from an Officer at New-York to a Friend in London, which, while lacking definite particulars as to dates, localities, etc., gives a view of the conditions of life in New York at this period of the British occupation. The letter was in part, as follows:

"Sir,

1 can with great pleasure inform you, that our situation is very different to what it was last winter, as we abounded in every necessary that soldiers can desire; and as to the prisoners, the sick, and the wounded, our officers are as vigilant in seeing them carefully supplied, as they are in seeing order and discipline punctually executed: from the good example of our land and sea commanders, there is such harmony between every rank of each, that we all live like brothers; and if there be the least shadow of care among the troops, it is against those gallant officers and soldiers whose happy stations in battle gave them the opportunity of acquiring so great a share of that honour which we all so eagerly pursue. Many of our soldiers earnestly wish for a personal knowledge of General Lee, to avoid either killing or wounding him, that a native of Britian, who, from disappointed ambition, has planted the point and the tree that first put a hand into his hand, and paid for his military education, may be prepared for his grave without the least impression of any martial instrument.

"We begin now severely to want that part of the city which these unhappy destroyers of their country have consumed; as several good families, whom their army have ruined, come daily shivering in for our protection, and meet with such a reception, according to their stations, as can only be obtained from clemency, guided by order and economy. Many of the poor ladies have scarce a petticoat to cover them, being striped of furniture, apparel, and every thing that could make a Yankee soldier either a shirt or a pair of breeches. Indeed, the poor fellows are in such a deplorable state that a good-natured lady, who has two petticoats, would rather give one for a covering, than look at a fellow-citizen in so deplorable a condition.

"Your worthy friend, the Rev. Mr. , frequently expatiates on the happy state that this country so lately enjoyed, and the present scenes of misery to which these people have been urged to bring so immediately on themselves and families. He gives us several instances from history of the dreadul examples that deluded nations have made of such patriots as General Lee, and points out the present state of their own Country, which before were almost implicitly obeyed; but, after breathing the spirit of rebellion on the people, attending their camps to keep alive the flame which they kindled, and spending their lungs and their fortunes to support the spirit of their cause, they now find the sad effects of instructing the people to be disobedient, and want the power they opposed to protect them; for, in such scenes of disorder and rapine, but little regard is paid to either morality or religion; and now, except they can plunder their share, swing rum, and hear a fife, they are deemed a useless order amongst them. . . . The soldiers, he tells us, calls the Americans worse than deserters; for they have not only revolted, but turned our own arms against us; and such zeal and spirit runs through the whole regiment, in so short a time, that he publicly tells the continent could not tempt a man to desert. Just after dinner we had three Yankee deserters brought to us; and, lucky for the poor fellows, we had fragments of left sufficient to fill their hungry bellies; and, being almost naked, we bought cloaths for them of some old women, who make a trade of stripping the dead soldiers.—They confirmed the accounts we frequently receive of the distress of the rebel army, and that several of their regiments have petitioned the Honourable Congress for a quantity of tar and feathers sufficient to chasten them; the poor men beg only for stuff, being well skilled themselves at putting the materials together, and have at present amongst them several of the artificers who made the first pattern of this new-fashioned garment, which was undoubtedly designed by the High and Mighty Congress as a robe for instituting a new American Order of Knighthood; and, to show their regard to their Mother Country, conferred the first honour on his—by proxy, in tarring and pluming his officer at Boston; and, to dignify the installation, bound the substituted Knight on horseback, with his face to the tail, dragging him through multitudes of applauding spectators, whilst, at intervals, Imperial Tea was copiously poured down to the health of the King and the Family Royal.

"In the newspapers which are transmitted to us, we frequently read of the distressed state to which we have reduced the men; but no more mention is made of the women and children, than if they were inexcusable of misery, and no part of the human species, who, in this case, are the only real objects of compassion, being reduced to a wretched state by the imprudence of their husbands, who are bound by the laws of God and Nature to protect them. The country now being well gleaned, such swarms of distressed women and children flock to their camp as are shocking; and wherever we see a soldier's wife with two or three children, we are sure to behold one half naked skeleton; for from that maternal tenderness which is natural to the sex, what nutriment and rage they can collect must go to preserve their infants, whilst these patriotic heroes, who are fighting for posterity, (being now pinched themselves) appear to have as much regard to the future generation of their children, as they had the moment they begot them; and the same tenderness for their wives as the fellow had who always declared he loved her better than himself, till a strong appetite convinced her to the contrary, by his eating up all the morsel she had provided for their dinner."—Transcribed from a copy of the book in the John Carter Brown Library, Providence. There is another history of the same story.

As early as 1777, Gouverneur Morris promulgated his belief in the practicability of connecting, by inland navigation, the Great Lakes with the Hudson River. He has been given credit for originating the idea, and projecting the plan, of the Erie Canal. For an account of his belief in its possibility, as expressed in later years and his services in effecting it, see Sparks's Life of Gouverneur Morris, II. 495 et seq.

Although the New York convention enacted a naturalization law which virtually excluded Catholics from citizenship, religious toleration gained rapidly in public opinion, and Catholics began to feel free in the public practice of their religion.—Eccles. Rec., III: 1450.

In this year, or perhaps a little later, Chelsea House was built on the site of the earlier residence of Capt. Thomas Clarke.—See description by C. C. Moore, L.L.D., in Man. Com. Coun. (1854), 536; cf. Liber Wills, XXII: 191. This house was demolished in 1854.—See Man. Com. Coun, op. cit. See 1750; L. M. R. K., III: 949.

Livingston's sugar-house, the Brick Meeting-house, the North Dutch Church, and the Protestant Church (in Pine Street) were used by the British as prisons for Americans. The Scotch Presbyterian Church (in Cedar St.) was occupied as a hospital for Hispanic soldiers, and the Middle Dutch Church as a riding-school for their cavalry.—Thurborn, Reminiscences (1845), 166-70, 170. This sugar-house, located on the south side of Liberty St., adjoining the Dutch Church graveyard on the east, was apparently the only sugar-house so used.—Mag. of Am. Hist. (1881), VI: 63.

At this time, the street on which the Fly Market stood (the present Maiden Lane) was referred to in advertisements as "Fly Market" or "Fly Market Street." For examples, see De Voe, Market Book, 170-71.

As early as this year, John Ramage, a miniature painter, was established in William St., where he painted "all the military heroes of the battle of the north place." On Oct. 2, 1789 (p. v), Washington sat for his portrait by Ramage.—Dunlap, Hist. of Arts of Design, I: 267-68 and footnotes.

As early as 1777, "the markets were raised eight hundred per cent for the necessities of life; and the landlords, "from the demand for houses, raised their rents on an average at four times the sum such houses had rented for previous to the rebellion."—Tomlison Papers (M.S.), in Merc. Lib. Assa., cited by H. B. Dawson in his report on the N. Y. financial records of the Revolution, printed in Proc. Bd. of Ald, LXXXVI: 213.

"TheMatricula of King's College closes with a note of the admission, in 1777, of William Walton and James De Lanecy Walton. It appears, therefore, that some instruction continued to be given. When the College building became a military hospital [see Apr. 6, 1776, Mr. Leonard Lindsay provided a house for the President, tutors, and students of the College [see Je 2, 1777], and it was doubtless here that the College exercises, so long as they continued, were given. Mr. Moore lived in this house, as President ad interim, during a part of the war."—Hist. of Columbia Univ. (1904), 51, citing "Minutes of the Trustees of Columbia College, March 25, 1788." "The Corporation was kept alive by occasional meetings of the Governors. The evidences of this are not numerous, but they would seem to be sufficient."—Ibid., 51. See O 24, 1776.

The item from the British Admiralty Records, cited in the description of Pl. 59, I: 364, as of this date, has been entered in the Chronology under its exact date, April 17, 1776 (p. v).

Lord Cornwallis goes in the armed schooner "Alert" from New York to Amboy.—Monticello's Jour., 420. Monticello says that the "Alert," on its return, on Jan. 14 (ibid.), brought Gen. Lee a prisoner to New York; but a letter written from New York on Jan. 2, 1 states: "Yesterday [Jan. 1] Gen. Lee and Col. Robert Livinston were brought to town from the Jerseys, and confined in the Old City Hall."—London Parch, F 92-91, 1777. For further account of the singular diversity of information, given by contemporary authorities, regarding the time when Lee was brought to New York, see J 8. "Rooms were fitted up for his reception in the City Hall where he was treated with consideration and humanity. He was allowed to converse freely with the officers in whose custody he was placed. . . . The two officers on guard always dined with him and he had leave to invite any other person he pleased."—Moore, Treason of Maj.-Gen. Charles Lee (N. Y., 1860), 72.

Lieut. Oliver Babcock records in his diary: "Was admitted in to both houses of Assembly [evidently of Connecticut], and Related the sufferings of my poor fellow prisoners at New York."—Battle of Harlem H't, 201. There were at this time about 400 "Rebel" officers and 9000 soldiers imprisoned within the British lines at New York.—Jones, Hist. of N. T. during the Rev. War, I: 176, 197, 218, 320.

Having drawn off from Cornwallis's powerful army during the night, Washington early this morning intercepts the British reinforcements at Princeton and decisively defeats them.—Winsor, VI: 377-79. Cf. British account of this important battle, in N. T. Mer., Jan. 6, 1777.

"Prisoners went into the Sugar House. N. Murray says 800 men were in Bridewell. The doctor gave poison powders to prisoners, who soon died."—Onderdonk, Rev. Incidents of Suffolk and Kings Co., 218, citing Tremblay Papers, IX: 203.

Washington writes to Heath: "The enemy are in great consternation; and as the panic affords us a favorable opportunity to do them out of the Jerseys, it has been decided in council, that you should move down towards New York with a considerable force, as if you had a design upon the city. That being an object of great importance, the enemy will be reduced to the necessity of withdrawing a considerable part of their force from the Jerseys, if not the whole, to secure the city."—Writings of Washingon (Ford ed.), V: 153. For Gen. Howe’s distribution of the army on Manhattan Island, see J 8; and for this assignment of regiments to alarm posts, see J 36.

The news is published in New York that "several of the New England Rebels, quartered in Philadelphia, have expressed their Intentions of setting that City on Fire." The article continues: "The inhabitants of this City in general are so esparated against all the domiciliary Rebels that it would be easy, by an Order of the most reasonable current, to prevent any attempts made from persons lurking in the Streets at Night."—N. T. Mer., Jan. 6, 1777.

"Great Numbers have flocked in this Week to receive the Benefit of the Proclamation [see N. 13, 1776], and among them, many Officers of the Rebel Service."—N. T. Mer., Ja 6, 1777.

"The Theatre in this City having been Some Time in Preparation, is intended to be opened in a few Days, for the charitable Purpose of relieving the Widows and Orphans of Sailors and Soldiers who have fallen in Support of the Constitutional Rights of Great Britain in America. It is requested that such Gentlemen of the Navy and Army, whose Talents and Inclinations induce them to assist in so laudable an Undertaking, be pleased to send their Names, (directed to T. C.) to the Printer of this Paper before Tuesday Night next."—N. T. Mer., Ja 6, 1777. The theatre was opened on Jan. 25 (q.v.).

Francis Lewis writes to the New York committee of safety: "I lately wrote you by an Express, wherein I informed you that the State of New York was not represented in Congress, nor indeed has it here, for several months past, except at some small intervals. . . . I am at present the only Delegate for New York at this place, and the Members are continually urging me to request you would compleat your representation in Congress, as business is now multiplying upon their hands, and so many members detached upon Committees & that the business in Congress is retarded, add to the that our state sometimes suffers for the want of a Vote in Congress which I beg you would speedily remedy."—From original letter in Emmet Coll. (No. 1577) in N. Y. P. L.

Do. Wemy's Batt. Rangers, with the Commander-in-Chief not included, 280 R. & File, makes the Army full 14,000 Effective Men."—Kemble's Jour., 107.

A New Yorker, writing to a correspondent in London, says: "You have heard no doubt before now of the capture of General Lee [see D 13, 1776] . . . . which I think is likely to turn out one of the luckiest circumstances of the war . . . . He was brought here a few days ago [see Jan. 1]. I have seen him twice; . . . the current report is, that he has pledged himself, on condition of a pardon, to give General Howe such intelligence, as most effectually put an end to the rebellion in the spring; as well as cut up the views of the French, who had it in very serious contemplation to give the Americans every assistance. "I do not give this last part as authentic, it is the report, and it is generally believed; he is well guarded, and nobody permitted to see him but officially."—London Parch, Mr 3, 1777.

Although it is clearly shown that Gen. Lee was brought to New York from Brunswick as early as Jan. 1 (q.v.), a news item, published in this city on Jan. 20, stated that he was brought here "On Monday last" (Jan. 13), "and put into the Custody of a strong Guard."—N. T. Mer., Ja 20, 1777. Montresor recorded that he was brought in the "Alert" from Amboy on the 14th.—Montresor's Jour., 257. Another report stated that he was brought to New York on Jan. 16, and placed under guard in a small house "at the bottom of King Street."—Conn. Gen. (New London), Mr 7, 1777. A letter from New York, published in London early in April (London Packet, Ap 7-9, 1777), indicates that, about the first of March, Lee was confined in "the New Gaol." See further, Mr 29.

Gen. Howe orders that "No Soldier is on any account, except on duty, to be out of his Barracks after 8 o'Clock at Night," and that "The owners of the Public Houses having Sailors or Soldiers in their Houses after 8 o'Clock will be committed to the Provost, and the furniture of their houses forfeited. The Lights and Fires are to be put out in all the Barracks and Public Houses at 9 o'Clock at Night."—From Kemble Papers, in N. Y. H. S. Collectedes (1853) XVI: 435. The order is published by the town meeting, W. Banyard.—N. T. Mer., Ja 10, 1777.

Maj.-Gen. James Robertson, in command at New York, issues an order which states that, as "many Complaints are made by the Inhabitants that Bread is becoming extravagantly high, either from the Exaction of Bakers or Forestallers, it is become necessary to renew a Mode that was formerly followed in this Place, of fixing an Assize. The Price of the best Flour being now Thirty Shillings the Hundred, and that of fuel and Labour considerably increased, I find that it is the Opinion of the most respectable Inhabitants that a Loaf of Bread of the finest Flour, weighing Three Pounds Four Ounces, should be sold for Fourteen Coppers, and in the same Proportion for Loaves of a lesser Weight." He therefore orders that Jan. "Any Person who exacts more will be taken into Custody, and the "York under Generals Heath and McDougall, who I suppose if they York. undertook will be given to the Poor."—N. Y. Merce., Jan. 13, 1777. It is reported in Philadelphia that the people in New York are "greatly distressed. Every article of provision is scarce and dear ... the loaf which formerly sold for 8 coppers sells for 4. No fresh butter to be had, only some Irish butter, very strong, at 3 s. per lb. oak wood at 1 s. per cord."—Penn Gaz. (Pililia), F 19, 1777.

Col. Stewart, an American officer, informs Wm. Smith "That 5 Days ago 6000 Militia marched from North Castle to attack New York .... Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), V. See Ja 17.

Peter Dobyn, master of a transport at New York, says in a letter to a friend in Hull: "The Rebels lurk about on the Roads like so many Highwaymen, and have taken the Lives of several innocent People or what they could rob them of. We had 4 or 5000 of them Prisoners on board our Ships, but they had such bad Dis- tempers among them, that each Ship buried ten or twelve of them a Day. Gen. Howe about a Week ago gave all that were able to walk their Liberty, after taking the Oath not to take up Arms against his Majesty."—St. James's Cleroon, Mr 15, 1777.

General Howe, in a New York letter states: "General Howe, out of Humanity, had ordered all the Rebel Prisoners to be lodged in the most roomy Buildings in the Town, and allowed them to want for no Necessaries; yet we were alarmed, some Time ago, with a mortal Fever, which broke out among them. It first seized the Prisoners taken on Long-Island; Compassion for these misled People prevailed on the General to dismiss the remaining of the common Men."—St. James's Chron., Mr 11-13, 1777.

The first Fishkill issue of Samuel Loudon's Packet is undoubt- edly of this date (Vol. I, No. 16); although the earliest issue found is that of Feb. 6, 1777 (No. 39), which bears the title The New-York Packet, and the American Advertiser. The last issue in New York City was that of Aug. 29, 1776 (q.v.). "During the six years the paper was printed at Fishkill, the title was occasionally shortened to 'The New-York Packet,' as scarcity of paper stock reduced the size of the sheet."—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 235. See, further, Ap 28, 1783.

Gen. Robertson issues a proclamation stating that "by a former Proclamation, the Inhabitants then in New-York, and all Such as might afterwards come into the Place, were required to enter their own and Families Names at my Office, and it was directed, that every Householder should give Notice there, of the Arrival of any Stranger he admitted into his House." As "it is suspected there are many Persons in this Province who have not complied with this Regulation, that they who from Ignorance and Want of Attention may not be confounded with those who lurk about the Town with Views of destroying it, the Notice is repeated; and all Persons who do not comply with the Regulation before Tuesday Morning, will be considered as bad Subjects and bad Citizens."—N. Y. Merc., Ja 20, 1777; Man. Coun. (1863), 436.

Smith records in his diary under this date: "Col. L[ington] showed me a Letter from his Son informing him that the Militia destined to N Y [see Ja 15] were at the lower Yenkers and that they learnt that there were 3000 Soldiers in Town—He considers that Expedition therefore as at an End .... He says the Project was divulged all thro' N England weeks ago and that the Congress is forever destitute of Intelligence."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), V.

The queen's birthday is celebrated. "Guns, as usual, were fired at Fort George. His Majesty's Commissioners gave a grand Entertain- ment to the Governors and Officers of Distinction, both British and Hessian; and in the Evening a very splendid Exhibition of Fire Works, under the Direction of Col. Montresor, was played off at Whitehall, and all the people assembled to see the fine Lights."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), V.

"In Honor of the Day, the General [Sir Wm. Howe] was invested with the most honorable Order of the Bath, by [his brother] Lord Howe, assisted by General de Heister, in the Presence of a numerous Assembly."

"Sir William Howe gave an elegant Ball and Supper in the Evening. The Ball was opened by Miss Clark, and His Excellency Governor Tryon."—N. Y. Merc., Ja 20, 1776; Hist. of the Orders of

Knighthood, by Nicholas Harris Nicolas (London, 1842), III: 95.

Jabez Fitch gives an account of Gen. Howe’s entertainment, and adds: “Query, whether it would not have been more honourable to y^s British Army, to have had (at least) part of this Extravagant Entertainment, than it would on y^s poor Winners who have perished for wares, in such vast numbers.”—Diary of Jabez Fitch (M.S.). This was not the actual anniversary of the queen’s birth. Baroness Kiediesiel explains that the queen’s birthday “really comes in summer, but as the kings birthday also comes in that season [June 4, 9, 14], is celebrated in winter, to give more custom to the trades people, as every one upon those days appear at court in jell-dressed, Letters & Jour. relating to the War of the Am. Rev., 1776.

Robertson writes: “about 3,000 Militia under Gen! Worster summoned 20° Independence—and being denied they Cannoned it briskly for some time but were obliged to retire.”—Robertson’s Jour. (M.S.). A newspaper account states that a “large Body of Rebels” have made an “Attack upon Fort Independence,—beyond Kingsbridge,” and were bravely repulsed. “The Fort was defended by a small Party of Hessians and of Col. Rogers’s Rangers.”—N. T. Merc., Ja. 20, 1777. Kemble’s record adds: “...the Rebels retired as far as Cortland’s house, which they have plundered, and where they remained on the 22d.”—Kemble’s Jour., 105.

“...We ... Observed a very considerable Cannonade this Evening at Washington. When I came home, I was Informed’d y^s y^s Americans had taken Fort Independence, and soon after this, Mr. Gerol. ... came in, & Informed’d us y^s y^s Kings Troops had taken six Hundred Prisoners & y^s they were going to take six thousand more between then & Night; But whether there be not some Mistake in Counting those Prisoners, is a Question.”—Fitch Diary (M.S.), 167.

Hewes writes to Germain from New York: “I do not now see a prospect of terminating the war, but by a general action, and I am aware of the difficulties in our way to obtain it, as the enemy moves with so much more celerity, than we possibly can. Nor can we hazard a march at this unfavourable season, with any hopes of making a stroke upon the enemy, in his present situation, that might turn the scale in our favour.”

“Concluding upon the certainty of another campaign, am confident I need not press your Lordship, to send us every reinforcement of troops for immediate service, that can be procured, 20,000 men would by no means exceed our wants, yet 15,000 will give us a superiority, that I should hope, may be materially experienced in the course of the campaign. Philadelphia being now the principal object, by the greater number, we should be enabled to detain a corps of fully equal to beholding that to penetrate into Pennsylvania, by way of Jersey; there would also in that case be a sufficient corps to act from Rhode Island. On the other hand, if the reinforcements are small, the operations will be much curtailed; or if none should arrive, we shall be confined to act in one body in Jersey, leaving only a small corps at Rhode Island, and another of sufficient force for the defence of this island and its dependencies.”—Part. Reg. (1779), XII 277-78.

Mrs. Hannah White, wife of a sergeant in the regiment commanded by Gen. McDougall, reported to Governor Trumbull, of Connecticut, on Jan. 24, that, when she left New York on the 20th, “the college, Bridewell New goal, Baptist meeting, and the tavern lately occupied by Mr. Della Montaigne, and several other houses’ were full of Value, and wounded of the enemy;” that the Hessians were “very sickly and discontented;” that the enemy obliged the citizens to watch at night, but would not trust many of them with arms,” clubs being given to those suspected.—Conn. Gaz. (New London), Mr 7, 1777. See also Jour. Prov. Cong., I. 788.

“Major French, who lately escaped out of Prison in Connecticut, where he has been treated with great Severity, is safely arrived in Town.”—N. T. Merc., Ja. 20, 1777. The escape was from Hartford. He left baggage of value behind; and a companion, who was as much desired, was then chained “to the Floor of Hartford goal, both by his Hand and Leg.” The published account in New York regarding this was: “Such is the Equity and Humanity of these Pretenders to Moderation and Liberty!”—Ibid., Ja. 27, 1777.

Gen. Howe orders: “As the Fire Wards have the entire management of extinguishing the fires, it is particularly desired that no Officer Interfere with them in the Execution of that duty, unless called upon by Express Orders for that Purpose.” The “Fire Buckets belonging to the Guns that have been lent to extinguish the late Fire, are to be immediately returned to Capt. Bowman, at his Lodgings in Dock Street.”—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1885), 439. See Ja. 26.

On the evening of this day, “the little Theatre in John-street” is opened with “the celebrated Burlesque Entertainment of Tom Thumb, written by the late Mr. Fielding, to ridicule the Bathos of several dramatic Pieces that at his Time to the disgrace of the British Stage, had enervated both the London Theatres. The Characters were performed by Gentlemen of the Navy and Army; the Spirit with which this favourite Piece was supported by the Performers, prove their Taste and strong Conception of the Humour. Saturday’s Performance convince us that a good Education and Knowledge of polite Life, are essentially necessary to form a good Actor. The Play was introduced by a Prologue written and spoken by Captain Stanley; we have great Pleasure in applauding this first Effort of his infant Muse, as replete with true poetic Genius. The Scenes painted by Captain De Lancy has great Merit, and would not disgrace a Theatre, the under the Management of a Garrick. The House was crowded with Company, and the Ladies made a brilliant appearance.”—N. T. Merc., Ja. 27, 1777.

The “Theatre Royal” begins to be applied (Ibid., F. 1, 1777), although performances during the season are invariably advertised as “At the Theatre in John’s Street.”—Ibid., F 10, 1777. This first season of theatrical performances by British officers lasted until May 29, 1777.—Selhamer, Hist. of Am. Theatre, II: 25; N. T. Merc., My 26, 1777. In 1778, under the patronage of Sir Henry Clinton, the performances were continued (see Ja. 3, 1778).

Gen. Howe assigns the various regiments to “Alarm Posts,” as follows: “4th. Regiment, Queen’s Street, their Left near the Tea Water Pump. 5th. Regiment, Lower end of Broadway to face Head Quarters, their Left upon the General’s Guard. 6th. Regiment, The Upper part of Broad Way, to face St. Paul’s. 7th. Regiment, To face the North River, with their Right near the College. 17th. Light Dragonos, Mounted on the Common, facing the Jail.”

Donop’s, Their right to the New Barrack. Rall’s, To form in the rear of the Barracks on the left of the Hereditary Prince’s Regiment.

“Upon an alarm from the Enemy, the Troops will first form upon their Respective Parades, and from thence immediately march to their Alarm Posts, where they will wait for further Orders, sending an Officer to Head Quarters.”—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1885), 440-41. The substitution of a military, in place of an authorized civilian, fire-fighting force, proved disastrous in the fire of Aug. 3, 1778 (q.v.).

Gen. Howe orders “that Recruits belonging to different Regiments will Practice firing Ball on the Level near the Foundery.”—Kemble Papers, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1885), XVI 440; see also My 6, 1778.

Gen. Robertson, having been informed “that the Library of King’s College, and of the Society Library in the City of New-York, have been pillaged, as well of the Books as of part of the Philosophical Apparatus,” issues a proclamation “that in the books belonging to the College, is placed, either the arms of the College, or of the Society for propagating the gospel, and in some of them the Arms of Joseph Murray, Esq; and that in the Books of the City Society Library, is placed the Arms of the said Society, or that the several Books so pillaged are otherwise so marked, that no one can be ignorant to whom they respectively belong. And all Persons in Whose Hands any of the said Books or Apparatus now are, by whatever means they came into their Possession, are hereby strictly warned, that they shall not sell or vend the same to the Printer hereof, for the Use of the respective Proprietors, or they will be committed to the Provost, and punished as Perfiders of stolen Goods.

Evert Byrant writes: "It is reported that our Army of 12,000 New England Forces will endeavor to retake New York, and plunder it very much, as they judge no man that is true to this country has any business more than those that are Tories, against whom they are much exasperated. Just this moment we received news that Gen. Washington was beating all the King's Troops back to New York, and hope in a short time to hear of their packing off and giving us the possession of our estates."—From letter in Whittemor's The Abel and Allied Families, 18.

The committee of safety, meeting at Fishkill, resolves that a committee be appointed "to treat with Mr. John Holt about setting up a printing office in this State; and that they be authorized to offer him two hundred pounds for one year as a State Printer of this State, provided he will print a public newspaper, and on like terms for farmhouses, farmhouses, scattered through the wild waste of continent, and shall soon hear of our General being obliged to garrison woods, to scale mountains, to wait for boats and pontoons at rivers, and to have his convoys and escorts as large as armies. These, and a thousand such difficulties, will rise on us at the next stage of the war. I say the next stage, because we have hitherto spent one campaign, and some millions, in losing one landing-place at Boston; and, at the charge of seven millions and a second campaign, we have replaced it with two other landing-places at Rhode Island and New York. I am entirely of opinion with Voltaire that every great conqueror must be a great politician. Something more is required, than the mere mechanical business of fighting, in composing revolts and bringing back things to their former order.—The Am. Revolution, Part II, II: 150.

Counterfeit dollars, made of pewter, very light, and of bluish color, are in circulation.—N. Y. Merc., F. 3, 1777.

Pastor Shewkirk's diary states: "Our burying ground [Mora- vian] at Fresh Water, (corner of Mott and Pell streets) lies entirely open; not the least of a board or post is left."—The Campaign of 1776, part 4, 125.

The advertisement of the performance at the John St. Theatre, "On Thursday Next" (F. 15), of "The Comedy of the Beaux Stratagem; With the Farce of the Upholsterer" concludes with the note: "The Gentlemen concerned in the above Charity give Notice, that they have lodged One Hundred Pounds with Doctor Morris, Treasurer to the Charity; for the purpose of giving such immediate Relief to Widows and Orphans of Soldiers who by Certificates from the commanding Officers of Corps appear to be proper Objects."—N. Y. Merc., F 10, 1777.

Having gone "through several wards," Tryon personally secures the oath of allegiance of 1,970 inhabitants; and later goes more made their attestation before the mayor.—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 607. On Feb. 15, a paper was circulated throughout the city, murmurings stating that the inhabitants of New York are leaving the authority of congress over them.—Ibid., VIII: 608-609. On March 28, Tryon sent the names of all of these inhabitants to Germain.—Ibid., VIII: 705.

Hower writes Germantown that the rebels have hopes of "bringing into the field an army of more than 50,000 men. They are most sanguine in their expectations, and conscious that their whole stake depends upon the success of the next campaign, use every compulsory means to those, who do not enter voluntarily into their service."—Paol. Reg. (1776), 11, 179.

Kemble records his New York Island, Long Island, Brunswick, Amboy, Paulson's Hook, [are] our principal Territory; loss of Men on several late occasions not less than fourteen or fifteen hundred."—Kemble's Jour., 110.

Gov. Tryon offers his services to Gen. Howe "to command the Provinces in the ensuing campaign."—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 697. On Jan. 13, 1777, he was so appointed, with the rank of "Major-General of Provinces" (raised in this colony).—Ibid., VIII: 715. Having objected to the rank thus bestowed, he was given the king's commission in May, with the rank of "Major General in America," and appointment to the command of the 70th Regiment.—Ibid., VIII: 746.

That the tidings of Gen. Lee's capture (see D 13, 1776) created great elation in England is evident from the following: "This is to give notice that Thursday night will be held as a day of rejoicing in commemoration of the taking of Gen. Lee, when there will be a serenade preached, and other public demonstrations of joy; after which there will be a nox [an ox] roasted whole, and every mark of festivity and bell-ringing imaginable, with a ball and cock-fighting at night in the Assembly-room at the Black Lync.—"Tryerian, The Am. Revolution, Part II, II: 60 (footnote), citing "Notice by James Clish, Parish Clerk and Crier of Tring in Buckinghamshire."

"We learn ye Times have Altered something for ye Worse in N. York, since we left ye City, Beef is sold at 1/3 lb & other things proportionably Dear... little News Respecting ye Army, only ye 4th and 1750 Hessians have lately been taken Prisoners in ye Jersey, & ye greatest part of Members of Wounded Soldiers had been Brought into ye City."—Fitch's Diary (MS.), 198-99.

Maj.-Gen. Robertson sails for England, and is succeeded, in the command of the city, by Maj.-Gen. Pigot.—N. Y. Merc., F 24, 1777. He returned on Sept. 26 (9 v.).

While in England, he stated that "although when the King's Troops took Possession of the City of New York it was found almost without inhabitants, the Eagerness of the People to return under his Majesty's Government was such, that the Number of Inhabitants on the 17th of February amounted to upwards of 11,000."—St. James's Chron., Mr 22-25, 1777.

Recruits are sought for a body of rangers commanded by Lieut.-Col. John Bayard, whose recruiting-station is at "Mr. Mason's near the exchange, in Little Dock-Street."—N. Y. Merc., F. 17, 1777.

Gen. Howe goes to Jersey.—Kemble's Jour., 110.

A letter written from New York to someone in London states: "Since General Howe's Departure from this City we have seemed rather dull, as he took almost all the Regulars with him. Our Diversions not-withstanding continue, and are upon an excellent Plan; Theatre opened in John-Street, where the Officers of the Army and Navy perform Plays and Farces, and the Receipts of the House are applied to a Charity instituted for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of Soldiers. Price, Pit and Boxes One Dollar, Gallery Four Shillings Currency. The Managers have already paid 100 l. to the Charity. With what Satisfaction must they see Plays here when they consider that they are promoting the Happiness of a Number of Distressed Objects."—St. James's Chron., Ap 1-3, 1777.

Another letter from New York declares: "Two new Corps have been raised in this City and Long Island within the Space of ten Weeks, one called the Prince of Wales's Royal American Volunteers, commanded by Governor Browne, who was taken Prisoner by the Provincials at their Attack on Providence; the other called the King's Loyal Orange Rangers, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Bayard. Considering the small Extent they had to recruit in, I think it prov'd the Loyalty of the People in enlisting so fast, as they only gave Forty Shillings Bounty."—St. James's Chron., Ap 3-5, 1777.

The proclamation which was issued by Maj.-Gen. Robertson (see above, 13), for establishing a city watch, not being observed, Maj.-Gen. Pigot issues a new proclamation requiring the superintendents of the watch to report to him all persons who refuse or neglect to watch.—N. Y. Merc., Mr 3, 1777.

The provincial convention passes resolutions directing "the commissioners appointed within this State to inquire into, detect and defeat all plots and conspiracies against the rights and liberties of America, within this State, to send for all such persons, members of this State, as are confined by parol or otherwise . . . excepting those who are charged with taking up arms against the United States, with enlisting men for the service of the enemy, accepting a warrant or commission for that purpose, supplying them with provocations or conveying intelligence to them; and that they do tender to each of them an oath, or if of the people called Quakers, an affirmation, that he will bear true faith and allegiance to the State of New-York; that he will discover all plots and conspiracies which may come to his knowledge, against the said State, or the United States of America; that he will do his duty as a good subject of the said State; and that he takes the said oath or affirmation without any mental reservation or equivocation whatsoever, and means faithfully and honestly to perform the same. That such of the said persons as shall take and subscribe the said oath or affirmation, be discharged; and that such of them as shall for six days after the same shall be tendered to them respectively, refuse to take the said oath or affirmation, receive a pass and be directed to repair, with their families, apparel and household furniture, to the city of New-York or some other place in the possession of the enemy, and be there imprisoned without the time for that purpose by the said commissioners to be limited, that they be confined in close jail, and otherwise treated as the open enemies of this State." The convention also resolves that "such of the said persons as shall not, after being so as aforesaid sent for, appear before the said commissioners within a time for that purpose by the said commissioners to be limited, shall be considered as having gone over to the enemy. And the personal property of such persons shall be seized and sold at public vendue, and the money arising therefrom shall be paid into the Treasury of this State and be subject to the disposition of the future Legislature thereof; unless, upon the appearance of such delinquents before the said commissioners previous to such sale of their personal property, a sufficient reason be assigned for their non-attendance."—Four. Prov. Conv. 1778.

The minutes kept from 1778 to 1781, inclusive, by the commissioners for detecting and defeating conspiracies in New York were published by the state in three volumes in 1909, with editorial notes by Victor Hugo Palfitis, state historian.

A Gentleman, late from Head-Quarters in the Jerseys... remarks that he could not have believed it was in the power of any events to have made so great an alteration in the sentiments and spirits of a people in so short a time, as the enemy's rout and ravages made among the Jerseymen. The specimens of British General Mountgomerie exhibited on those moments triumphant, has fully gratified any banking the inhabitants might have to see it established. The repeated failure of their military operations has cast such reproach on their arms, that those who were frightened with Gen. Howe's success and begg'd his pardon and protection, have almost to return man to the cause, and are now fighting for the defence of their country; being resolved at all hazards to prevent any future ravages.—Penn. Mer., Apr. 9, 1777.

Gen. Lee, now prisoner in New York (see Ja 1), submits to Lord and Sir William Howe a plan for the easy subjugation of the colony. It is written unmistakably in Lee's own hand, and is endorsed in the known handwriting of Henry Strachey, secretary to the royal commissioners, as "Mr. Lee's Plan 29th March, 1777." The document, having been bought from America by England, was purhased by the late George H. Moore, librarian of the New York Hist. Soc., and this and other proofs of Lee's treason were first presented to the world in a paper read by Mr. Moore before this society on June 22, 1858. For facsimile reproduction of the plan and a full account of the treason, see "Mr. Lee's Plan—March 29, Benson J. Lossing, in a footnote to Geo. Washington Parke Custis's Recollections and Private Memoirs of Washington (1860), 292-93, states that this treasonable act makes it easy to interpret Lee's peculiar conduct after the fall of Fort Washington, his occupancy of a suite of rooms in the city hall while a prisoner in New York, and his great intimacy with British officers here. See also essay on "Charles Lee, Soldier of Fortune," in Folk-lore of Old

In a letter to Lord George Germain, marked "secret," Geo.
Apr. Hay expresses disappointment at "the small reinforcement intended for this army for the ensuing campaign," and adds: "My expectations of a move in the winter against the enemy in Jersey... have been frustrated by a deep fall of snow, which rendered the country impassable, and since the breaking up of winter, the depth of roads forced me to relinquish the idea. Restricted as I am from entering upon more extensive operations by the want of force, my hopes of terminating the winter this year are vanished; still I think it probable, that by the latter end of the campaign, we shall be in possession of the provinces of New-York, the Jerseys, and Pennsylvania, though as this, in some measure, must depend upon the successes of the northern army; for, notwithstanding it is my opinion the rebels will not be able to raise their army voted last Autumn, yet they will have a numerous militia in the field, in addition to their standing force, with a tolerable train of artillery."

15 Germain writes from Whitehall to Gen. Horm: “I have had a great deal of conversation with Major-General Robertson; and as he is an officer of great experience and merit, and one whose continuance in America was particularly desired by you, his Majesty has been pleased to order him to return thither, and continue to act under you as Major-General. . . .

17 "It is this Day two Years since ye 6th Commencement of ye present War, when Hostilities first took place at Lexington Concord &c, in Massachusetts Province, in consequence of which, ye whole Country hath long since been in Arms, not only for the Defence of their Country against the present War—but also against any prospect of a Sensation of Hostilities."—Fitch’s Diary (MS.).

19 The provincial convention, sitting at Kingston, adopts a constitution for the “State of New York” (see Mr 12). The preamble of the constitution recites the proceedings of the provincial congress leading to this enactment; and also recites in full the “Declaration of Independence,” passed by “the Delegates to the United American States in Congress convened.” By virtue of these acts, the preamble avers, all power in this state “hath reverted to the people thereof, and this Convention hath by their suffrances and free choice been appointed, and among other things, authorized to establish such a government as they shall deem best calculated to secure the rights and liberties of the good people of this State, most conducive of the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and of America in general.”

20 The supreme legislative power of the state is vested in the assembly and senate. No “member of this State” shall be “disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to the subjects of this State, by this Constitution, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers.” The supreme executive power and authority is vested in a governor, who shall be elected by the qualified freeholders of the state every three years. The style of all laws shall be: “Be it enacted by the People of the State of New-York, represented in Senate and Assembly.” Likewise, writs and other proceedings shall run in the name of “the People of the State of New-York.”

21 The law of this state shall consist of “such parts of the common law of England, and of the statute law of England and Great Britain, and of the acts of the Legislature of the Colony of New-York, as together did form the law of the said Colony” on April 19, 1775; “subject to such alterations and provisions as the Legislature of this State shall, from time to time, make and provide for the same.” The parts of the common law or of the provincial statutes, which “may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers;” or such parts of the laws as concern the sovereignty of the king of Great Britain over the colony of New-York and its inhabitants, or are repugnant to this constitution, are abrogated and rejected.

22 The “free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship” shall “forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind; provided that the liberty of conscience hereby granted shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State.”

23 The constitution declares that “it is the duty of every man who enjoys the protection of society, to be prepared and willing to defend it.” The militia shall at all times “be armed and disciplined in readiness for service.”

24 Trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

25 Naturalized citizens, on taking the oath of allegiance to this state, shall “abjure and renounce all allegiance and subjection to all and every foreign king, prince, potentate and State, in all matters ecclesiastical as well as civil.”

26 The convention resolves “That Mr. Robert R. Livingston, General Scott, Mr. Morris, Mr. Abraham Yates, Mr. Jay and Mr. Hecton, be a committee to prepare and report a plan for organizing and establishing the government agreed to by this Convention.”—Jour. Prov. Cong., I: 892-98. Such a plan was reported and adopted on May 8 (p. v.). Howe appoints Andrew Elliot by proclamation "to be Superintendent of all Imports and Exports to and from the Islands of New York, Long Island, and Staten Island (Transport, Victuallers, and Prizes excepted)." He orders that all masters of merchant ships, immediately upon arrival, shall "make Entry of the Vessels, and deliver in proper Manifests of their Cargoes, on Oath, at the Superintendent's Office found at New York," and that all manifestes, "shall be seized and forfeited;' nor shall ship masters "break bulk" without written permission from the superintendent or his deputy, and any part of the cargo "so landed:" shall be seized and forfeited, and the master held liable to imprisonment. All "Rum, Spirits, Sugar, Molasses, and Salt, imported, are to be stored at the Expense of the Owners or Importers, in Warehouses by them to be provided, under the Inspection of the said Superintendent or his Officers, with whom the Keys are to be lodged, who will grant Permissions when the same or any Part thereof is to be sold for the use of the Army, Navy, or Inhabitants, such Permission always specifying the Quantity, and to whom the same disposed.

The superintendent is then to attach to a certified copy of the manifest a certificate stating that no fraud has been committed and that the requirements of the proclamation have been complied with, with permission to leave the port. This applies also to vessels in ballast. Forfeiture of vessel and cargo, and imprisonment of the master, are the penalties inflicted for failure to comply with this regulation.

"Upon the Signal being made for dressing of Provision in order to land, two days' full allowance of Pork, four days' bread, and one day's Rum, is to be prepared to be taken on shore. "As there is great Reason to hope that the Inhabitants of the Country to be taken possession of [Philadelphia] are Much inclined to come to their allegiance, The Commander in Chief thinks it incumbent upon him One night to declare to the Troops, that he is determined upon no account whatsoever to pardon any man found guilty of Plundering, or being absent without leave from his Post. "The Provost Martial has received Warrants to execute upon the Spot any Soldier or follower of the Army detected in Depredation of this sort. . . . Congress adjourns from Philadelphia to Lancaster, Pa., on 18 account of the approach of the British.—Jour. of Cong., II: 270. See S 30.

Dr. Elias Cornelius, continuing his narrative of his imprisonment in the provost jail (see Ag 21), states in his journal that, on this day, "Seeright Kent (the Provost Martial) came to the dungeon and took Capt. Chatham, and Travis, and myself, and led us to the upper part of the prison, where I found my friends that were also prisoners, Vis., Ethan Allen, Major Williams, Paine & Wells and others. Allen was made prisoner near Montreal, in the beginning of the war. He was put on board a man of war, and kept chained flat on his back in the hole six months. He also told me he had twice been carried on shore in England to be hung, but was reprieved. He was likewise taken on shore in Ireland and at Halifax for the same purpose. After this he was brought to New York, where for a short time he had his parole, it was taken from him, and he put in the provost jail, as there was an antipathy against him. I left him on this goal on Jan 7, 1778. [See also S 1, 1777.]

While I was in this state, we were not allowed to speak to any friend, not even out of the window, I have frequently seen women beaten with cans and ramrods who have come to the Prison windows to speak to their Husbands, Sons or Brothers; and officers taken and put in the dungeon just for asking for cold water. Our provision was the same as in the dungeon with the exception of dried Peas, we however had no fire to cook them. . . . He describes the manner of receiving the news of Burgoyne's surrender to Gates (see O 16), and the joy it caused in the prison.—Jour. of Dr. Elias Cornelius (1905), 8-9. See also O 12, 1777; Ja 9, 1778.

The anniversary of the king's coronation is celebrated. At twelve o'clock the guns on Fort George were fired; at one o'clock "the Colours of the Men of War and Vessels in the Harbour were displayed," and the guns of the fort fired a feu de joie. An "elegant Dinner was prepared at Loosely and Elm's Tavern, where a Number of Gentlemen dined . . . , and a Number of loyal Toasts were given. . . ." In the evening, "the Illuminations, consisting of upwards of 100 Spermaceti Candles, with the Statue of his Majesty on Horseback, crowned with Laurels, standing on a Pedestal, and Several other Figures, much surpassed any Thing of the Kind before exhibited."—N. A published notice states that apprentices are wanted for "a ship of force." Applications are to be made to "Messrs Collins, at their store Kings Arms, upper Dock Street."—N. Y. Merc., S 22, 1777.

A fleet arrives from England with about 3,000 soldiers and the following passengers: Maj.-Gen. Robertson, Maj.-Gen. Wilson, Maj.-Gen. Patterson, the Marquis of Lindsay, Lord Cathcart, Count Gahrousticke, Capt. Williamson of the Royal Artillery, James Rington (see Me 10 and N 23, 1775), etc. The fleet brings "167,000 l. Sterling in solid Coin." On this day also, the sloop "Dispatch" from "Chesapeake" comes into the harbour with dispatches from Gen. Howe.

In the evening, the "House of Loosely and Elms, Kings Head Tavern, was elegantly illuminated, to testify the Joy the true Sons of Freedom had on the Arrival of Mr. Rivington from England [see Ja 10, 1776]. This Gentleman, with unparalleled Fortitude, having nobly disdain'd to Usher to the World any inflammatory Pieces, which might be productive of introducing Anarchy, instead of Constitutional Authority, into this once happy Country, felt, in the severest Degree, the Rage of popular Delusion.—Liberty he always firmly adher'd to, Licentiousness from his Soul he ever detested.—A Person in Honour to free Press, extemporary pronounced this:

The council of safety appoints a committee of five to "cause all the public records which were transported to this place [Kingston] from the city of New-York, . . . to be put into proper packages or chests, and conveyed to Rochester," and orders that Samuel Bayard remain with them "till the further order of this Council, or future Legislature of this State."—Jour. Proc. Cong., 1: 1066. According to a resolution of the provincial convention on April 25, the public records and treasury of the state, at Esopus Landing, were to be guarded by 200 men, to be raised for the purpose.—Ibid., 904. See Ja 3, 1783.

This date is found on one of Archibald Robertson's drawings (No. 40—see Ji 12, 1776), entitled "View of Morrisia, Haerlem, Montresor's & Buchanan's Islands, with Part of the sound, taken from our lines near M'Cowan's house—Oct 1777." The American soldiers, with their commander, Col. William Livingston, who were captured by the British forces at the fall of Fort Montgomery (see O 8), arrive in New York, having been brought down the Hudson River by ship. Maj. Abraham Leggett, who was in the company, kept a journal of his experiences while a prisoner. He recorded that the privates were sent to the Sugar House and the officers to the main guard house in the old city hall at the head of Broad Street. He further says: "all this Time we had nothing to eat, but that night ColI Wilm Livington sent a note to Mr Simons who Kept a Public House at the Corner of massa St. By that means we were supply'd for that time."—Narrative of Maj. Abraham Leggett, ed. by Charles I. Bushnell (N. Y., 1865), 17-20.

The American prisoners of war, who arrived in New York on Oct. 11, are removed from the sugar-house prison and sent to the new jail of the provost guard. See also Ag 23 and S 20. As they are marched through the streets they are hooted at as vile rebels by many of the people. Maj. Abraham Leggett writes in his journal: "When we got to Gard House we were Divided—2 of us was shut in the north corner room on the first floor and 13 was Put up on the second floor East Corner Room—after we was Shut in the Keeper Came In at Search'd and Took Everything we had about us not leaving a pen knife and on Wednesday they Throw in through the Hole in the Door Some raw salt Beef and a little Damaged sea bread—as soon as the bread fell on the floor it Took legs and Ran in the Room—Very Filthy—more like Hog sty than anything else."—Narrative of Maj. Abraham Leggett, ed. by Charles I. Bushnell (N. Y., 1865), 20-21.

The original document is with the Gates Papers, in convention, further N. Y. O 15. Gates comments upon it thus: "This Day has been entirely engrossed by the Publication of Mr. Rivington's Paper, which came out about 12 o'Clock, and Surprised almost every Body. The Fleet sailed out the N. R. To Day."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 50.

Col. James De Lancey with 60 of his West-Chester Light Horse, went from King's-Bridge to the White Plains, where they took from the Rebels 44 barrels of flour and two Ox teams, near 100 head of black cattle and 300 fat sheep and hogs."—N. T. Merc., O 11, 1777.

In a letter from Frederick, to Gen. Howe, he refutes the remark in his command: "From the little attention, my Lord, given to my recommendations since the commencement of my command, I am led to hope that I may be relieved from this very painful service, wherein I have not the good fortune to enjoy the necessary confidence and support of my superiors, but which I conclude will be extended to Sir Henry Clinton, my presumptive successor, or to such other servant as the King may be pleased to appoint. By the return therefore of the packet I humbly request I may receive his Majesty's permission to resign the command." He repeated his request in a letter of Nov. 30.—Parl. Reg. (1779), XI: 417-36, 443.

Gen. Vaughan, with the troops under his command, returns from Livingston Manor. Kemble notes confirmation of the accounts of Burgoyne's being "Prisoner with his Army," and some of the particulars. British forces are now drawn together at Philadelphia, where Washington designs to destroy them. To keep as large a body of British as possible at New York, he directs Gen. Dickinson to make a feint in that direction by having boats collected, troops assembled, etc.—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), VI: 173.

Wm. Smith writes from Livingston Manor to the council of safety asking permission to go to New York City to look after some personal affairs and "to contribute towards abating the armony of the present war, and exciting to overtures of peace." His request was refused.—Jour. Provin. Cong. I: 1079.

A British officer on board the fleet off New York writes to a correspondent in London: "Our Spirits, which were much elevated by the Success of General Howe in Pennsylvania, and the Detachments up the North River, are now depressed with the News of the devoted Burgoyne and his brave Hands of Men, being lost to their Country in this Quarter. The provincials are grown so fond of their Business that they have forced among the Villages, within a few Miles of King's Bridge, where General Clinton commands with about 8000, no Way appeasing their Superiority."—St. James's Chron., D 30, 1777—Ja 1, 1778.

Kemble records: "Our Troops for the defence of this Quarter, Kings Bridge, McGowan's pass, New York, Paulus Hook, Long and Staten Islands, consist of 6,200 Rank and File, 720 upon Staten Island, 180 Paulus Hook, 330 Long Island, New York, Grogon's, and Kings Bridge, 4970, exclusive of Artillery and a Detachment of Light Horse."—Kemble's Jour., 143.

"No less than 8000 Men have been raised in New York and its Dependencies for Governors of the Army, since the King's Bridge have been in Possession of that City."—St. James's Chron., N 8-11, 1777.

A New Yorker writes to a friend in Liverpool: "Washington is collecting a large Force to drive General Howe out of Philadelphia; and Putnam to attack this City; it is said he has assured the people of success in three or four Weeks. The only practicable Way of getting possession of this City is, they must first reduce the Fords of King's Bridge, which is now put in proper Repair, and the Fort on Long and Staten Islands. The Militia in this City is embodied, wherein twenty Volunteer Companies are already forming. News just come in Town of Putnam decamping on a sudden from before King's Bridge, owing, it is said, to an Order he received from Washington to give him all the Assistance in his Power."—St. James's Chron., Ja 1-3, 1778.

Washington writes to Sir Wm. Howe regarding an exchange of prisoners, saying, in part: "You call upon me to redress the grievances of several of your officers and men, who, you are pleased to say, 'you are well informed are most injuriously and unjustifiably loaded with iron.' If there is a single instance of a prisoner of war being in iron, I am ignorant of it; nor can I find on the most minute inquiry, that there is the least foundation for the charge. . . ."

"Now we are upon the subject of grievances, I am constrained to observe, that I have a variety of accounts, not only from prisoners who have made their escape, but from persons who have left Philadelphia, that our private soldiers in your hands are treated in a manner shocking to humanity, and that many of them must have perished through hunger, had it not been for the charitable contributions of the inhabitants. . . . I would propose, that I may be allowed to send a suitable person into the city under the usual restrictions, to examine into the truth of them. I must also remonstrate against the cruel treatment and confinement of our officers. . . . I appeal to you to redress these several wrongs; and you will remember, whatever hardships the prisoners with us may be subjected to will be chargeable to you. At the same time it is but justice to observe, that many of the cruelties exercised towards prisoners are said to proceed from the inhumanity of Mr. Cunningham, provost-martial, without your knowledge or approbation."—Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), VI: 193. For fuller references to Cunningham's atrocities, see O 28, 1776.

The continental congress adopts the "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union." These provide for the sovereignty and independence of each state, the number and election of delegates to congress, restraints upon the separate states, the manner of defraying public expenses, the powers of congress, and the method of voting. Fourth Cong. (Ford ed.), T. 907-48. The "Articles" were not ratified by all 13 states until Mar. 1, 1781.(p. xiv). "It is this day twelve months since ye memorable Surrender of Fort Washington, when ye number of Prisoners were so greatly augmented."—Fitch's Diary (M.S.).

Maj.-Gen. Jones issues a proclamation stating that it has been represented to him "that the boatmen and others who bring firewood to this city exact the most exorbitant prices for the same, and that unless some regulation be made, there will be no bounds to their extortion." To remedy this, he orders that "no more than Five Pounds currency shall be demanded for a cord of wall wood and 5 Pounds a cord for any other wood." In case any of these wood carriers, "to distress the inhabitants," cease bringing wood at these prices, "their boats shall be seized and given to proper persons to be employed in bringing wood to this City." To prevent "impositions on the part of the proprietors of wood, and their detaining the same from the boatmen," he orders that they shall sell "at a reasonable price." If they refuse, "their wood will be seized and confiscated," and they will be punished.—N. Y. Merc., N 24, 1777.

Maj.-Gen. Jones publishes this notice: "The price of Fine Flour is regulated at Forty-five Shillings, New York Currency, per Hundred Weight. The Assized Bread will be regulated by the Mayor, agreeable to the above Price."—N. Y. Merc., N 24, 1777.

A New Yorker writes: "General Putnam, in the 73d Year of his Age, is encamped within twelve Miles of this City with 10,000 Men. We are all Hurry and Confusion, and hardly know what to do. We have 17,000 Military and Inhabitants in the City, but a great Number of them are not to be depended upon. The Ships are stationed to cover as much of the City as they can, but when the ships are gone they will be of little Service as they will be easily burnt by the Provincial.—St. James's Chronicle, S 8-19, 1778.

"The Sheds in the Redoubts at Kings Bridge nearly finished for the Guards—much wanted for the Comfort of the Soldiers."—Kemble's Jour., 144.

The commander-in-chief having "prompted the principal gentlemen, inhabitants of this city and refugees from other provinces to form themselves into independent companies, twenty of which are nearly completed," several of them parade "on the fields at the upper end of Broadway, headed by the Worshipful David Mathews, Esq." These companies "will greatly add to the strength of the city and relieve the King's troops, who may be employed elsewhere."—Rivington's N. Y. Loyal Gazette, N 24, 1777.

"This Night, between the hours of 12 and 1, a party of Rebels landed from Jersey at Bloomingdale, ransacked and burnt Brig. Gen. Delancey's House, using his Wife and Daughter extremely ill. The cause of this to be Acribed to General Tryon, who had given Capt. Emmerick Instructions, on a late Excursion, to burn some Houses at Tarrytown. General (Rebel) Parsons expostulated in a Letter to Mr. Tryon on the subject, and wished him to deny his knowledge of what was done by Emmerick, but he would not do it."—Kemble's Jour., 144-45.

The newspaper reports of this occurrence are as follows: "On Wednesday Morning, the 26th of November, a Party of Rebel Troops landed at Bloomingdale, about Six Miles from this City, near Brigadier General De Lanncy's, robbed and plundered his House of the valuable Furniture and Money, set the House on Fire before Mrs. De Lanncy, her two Daughters, and two other young Ladies could remove out of it, which was effected through the Flames, in only their Bed Dresses, when they were most cruelly insulted, beat, and abused, and what Money they had, taken from them; an Infant Grandchild in a most barbarous Manner thrown Nov. 26 on the Ground; at last, in their Fright and Distress, they ran different Ways in the Woods, where they remained till Day-Light, exposed to every Inclemency. Five White Men were made Prisoners, and two Infant Children consumed in the Flames. The whole exhibited such a Scene of Stage Barbarity as is scarcely to be met with in History or Romance."

"The Rebels who committed the above Outrage, we hear, were a Party of about twenty Continental Troops, sent from Connecticut for no other Purpose than to destroy General De Lanncy's House, with Promise of Great Rewards should they compleat the Work. They executed their Design, called at a poor Man's House there, and robbed him of all the Family clothing, Blankets, etc."—N. Y. Merc., D 1, 1777.

Another account, published at Fishkill, states: "Last week a small party of men made an excursion to Greenwich, about three miles from New York; they arrived there in the evening: advanced to Oliver De Lanncy's; a centry was at the door, whom they secured; found a few ladies and gentlemen in the house; the ladies were suffered to depart in peace, though in some haste; we hear five men were made prisoners; they set the house on fire, and, hearing the alarm guns in New York, thought it time to decamp, crossed the river, and burnt their barge, and got safe off."

"Who are fond of burning works, how do you like it when it comes so near home?"—N. Y. Packet, D 4, 1777.

Wheeler says, "The Mills of Fishkill, and the ferry on the bank of the North River, between 12th and 13th Sts., at Greenwich, belonged to Sir Peter Warren, but was occupied by Oliver De Lanncy in Revolutionary times. It was to the north of the Manseville homestead (shown on the Montresor map, Pl. 40, Vol. I), and separated from it by the old road which then led back from the river. Ratzer's map (Pl. 44, Vol. I) shows it as 'Oliver De Lanncy Esq.' A deed dated May 19, 1790, speaks of 'the Road leading along the River to the house of the said Sir Peter Warren, formerly occupied by Oliver De Lanncy,' as if the house were still standing (Liber Deeds, XLVI: 149); but this may have been repeating an earlier description. Oliver De Lanncy owned land at Bloomingdale in 1732 (q.t., My 8), and in 1748-1757, but no house is mentioned.—M. C. G., V: 250 (Pt. 3), 337."

At about the same time, James de Lanncy, until recently the Sheriff of Westchester and now colonel of loyalist militia, was captured by one of the American scouts. The report states that "the Colonel was found under a bed, and for a better defence, had himself surrounded with a bulwark of baskets. He was dragged from his humble redoubt, put under guard, and sent to a place better secured (Rutgers' house), where they will hold him until the end of the War."—Kemble's Jour., 134-35.

The American officers billeted at New Lots learn that "a British Sergt was come from N. Y. with orders for us to Repare there to morrow morning with our Baggage."—Diary of Jabez Fitch (M.S.). On Nov. 28, Fitch wrote that they arrived at St. George's ferry about 1 o'clock, "& soon Embark'd in several Flatbottom'd Boats prepared for ye purpose, being guarded by a strong party of Britains & Hessians, whom it seemed took charge of us when we were about to be transported into Brooklyn. The Boates carried us round ye City & up N. River as high as opposite ye old English Church, where they put us on board ye Judith, a large Transport Ship prepared for ye place of our confinement; we soon found our accomodations to be very Similar to those on board ye Mentor ye last year [see S 5, 1776]: there is now near 140 prisoners on board this Ship, & altho' our Births for Lodging are more tolerable than those in ye Mentor, yet we are in a very darkerty & uncomfortable Situation, most of us destitute of Beds, & many have neither Blanket or watch cost, nor any other Lodging than ye Soft Side of a board."—Ibid.

"The People of the Country hear a report that Putnam has had a Battle near Kings Bridge, and was repulsed with the Loss of all his Cannon, part of which were gained from Burgoyne."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), V.

Gen. Howe writes from Philadelphia to Germain: "I candidly declare my opinion, that in the apparent temper of the Americans a considerable addition to the present force will be requisite for effecting any essential change in their disposition, and the re-establishment of the King's authority, and that this army acting on the defensive, and fully employed to maintain its present possessions."

"This Night the Head was broke off Mr. Pitt's Statue that stands in Wall Street."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 58. Stevens in his progress of N. Y. in a Century, 14-15, is therefore in error when he ascribes the date of this matutination to 1776.

Fitch writes: "I took a view of ye Shewing around us, among which is ye Myrtle laying next to us on board of which is our Bro' Prisoners ...; a little further distant lies sectarion 64 in which it is said Grefi[1] Lee is confining; & one ye other side is another large ship in which I informed our private is confining; there is also a large number of other ships near us, of different sizes &c."

Maj.-Gen. James Robertson, the "Commandant of New York," who returned Sept. 26 (p.2), issues the following harbour regulations by proclamation: All ship-masters coming into the harbour, "immediately on their arrival (and before they had their vessel, to the Wharf) are to enter at the Port-Master's Office, an Account of the Powder they have on board," and "receive his Directions for stowing the same."

"No Ship or Vessel to be hove down to burn, at any Wharf, without Leave from the Port-Master, who will appoint Wharfs proper for this Purpose."

—N. Y. Merc., D 22, 1777.

James Rivington, publisher of the Alarm Gazette, announces that he will open on this day a "Glove Store" and "The Stationary Warehouse," where paper, parchments, maps, books, etc. are for sale, also "A few very elegant Pictures of the King and Queen, in gold harnished Frames." In another paragraph he advertises the opening, also on this day, of "The Canoe & Walking Stick Warehouse," where the "gallant, gay Lathario, or worthy Master Balance, the plain and respectable Citizen, may find an elegant and useful Variety of those Articles."

—Royal Gaz., D 20, 1778.

Later, Rivington adds a letter from the "Fishing Tackle," also "Breakfast Tid's," to the "Tempting Goods." He deals also in "Gentlemen's Dress Frockes, of scarlet cloth." (Ibid, Ap 4, 11, 1778), and in "French Raisber Brand'y."—Ibid, No 13, 1782. He later included still other articles, such as musical instruments.

"Three Rooms and a Kitchen to be let in Cherry Street, opposite to the Rising Sun Tavern; for particulars apply to Thomas Lorrain, in William Street, No. 463, corner of Golden-Hill."—Royal Gaz., D 20, 1777. As this is the only mention of the "Rising Sun," we may presume it had a brief existence.

The commandant (Robertson) issues a proclamation stating that he has appointed John Thompson, of Brooklyn, to employ persons to cut wood on Long Island, "that the poorer inhabitants of this city may receive some supplies of wood at a reasonable price. Those with property in the neighborhood from the commandant for a proportion of the wood, on their paying Thompson the charges for cutting and carting," with an addition of four shillings per cord for his trouble in this service."—

William Fowler, the naval storekeeper, gives notice "That a Salvage will be paid for such Stores belonging to his Majesty's Ship the Mercury (lately wrecked in the North-River), as may be taken up and delivered into his Majesty's Store House at New York."—Royal Gaz., Ja 3, 1778.

Maj.-Gen. Robertson publishes the following announcement: "Whereas, it is represented to me that the Poor of this City cannot be properly relieved without some Provision be made for that Purpose, as there is not a Vestry at present in this City to assess the Quotas of the Inhabitants, and to Superintend the Poor as formerly; and it appearing to me highly reasonable that some Method should be adopted for their Relief, and Elias Desbrasses, Miles Shadbrook, Isaac Low, Charles Nicol, Gabriel H. Ludlow, James Jauncy, Richard Sharpe, Charles Shaw, Hamilton Young, Theophylact Bache, Rem. Rapalje, Jeromins Alstyn, William Walton, William Ustic, Peter Stuyvesant, Nicholas Bayard, and John Dyckman, of this City, Gentlemen, having offered to take upon themselves the discharge of the Trust hereinafter reposed in them: I have therefore thought fit hereby to authorize them to solicit and receive the Donations of the Charitable and well-disposed, and to appropriate the same to the Relief of the Poor according to their several Waits and Necessities."—T. N. M., Ja 5, 1778.

They collected a sum sufficient to afford temporary relief. "These gentlemen with the Magistrates of Police were then formed into a vestry & the almshouse & poor of the city were committed to their care over the pumps, laundry, etc. This vestry had a Treasurer & Secretary the former to receive & pay monies on their account & the latter to keep minutes of their proceedings. Proper funds for the execution of the trust reposed in them were necessary — therefore the rents of such houses & stores as were not wanted for the service of government & the ferries & markets were appropriated to the funds for the vestry—the fees arising from licenses & excise, fines inflicted for breach of the peace, or other offences were also added & ordered to be paid into the hands of their Treasurer. He was accountable for the payment & receipt of all monies on their account, not only to the Vestry, but when required, furnished the Commander in Chief & Commandant, with his accounts—When he gave a receipt for rent such receipt specified that the sum had been paid by orders of the Commander in Chief in this form:

"Whenever the proprietors of houses so rented out by the vestry came within the British lines, & made application to the Commandant, their pretensions were referred to the vestry, & on their report & recommendation, the property was restored—and

"When the Proprietors of houses or stores in the king's service or barracks department came in, & made similar applications their pretensions were referred to the Magistrates of Police, & Barrack Master & on their report the property was restored, unless in some instances, where his Majesty's service would not permit."—From the "Case of William Butler" in N. Maj.-Gen. Robertson, in a proclamation hearing this date, states that, as the generous price allowed for wood by a former proclamation (see D 22) has been the means of bringing larger quantities of fuel to the city than was expected, therefore, after Jan. 10 next, there shall not be demanded or received more than $1/2 per cord of Walnut Wood or more than 55 sh. for "a Cord of Oak or other wood."—Royal Gaz., Dec. 22, 1777.

Patrick Blanchette, at his store "next door to the George and Dragon, opposite the lower end of the Fly-Market," offers for sale an assortment of wares.—Royal Gaz., D 27, 1777. As early as Nov. 1, 1775 (p. 4), a tavern with this name existed in New York. Among other taverns to which volunteers were directed, in 1778, was that of "Mr. John Davan, at the sign of the George, the corner of the Fly-Market."—See F 16, 1778.

"The Washington's Army during the Previous Days Past has been encamp'd near the Valley Forge."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.). Maj.-Gen. Robertson, the commandant, issues a proclamation which recites that the public cartmen are "declining, under various Pretences, carting for the Inhabitants, when required, as by the exorbitant and increasing Demands which they insist on receiving for their Services." Regulations are established prohibiting this practice, and prescribing what the "Fare" shall be for carting articles of various kinds.—N. Y. M., Ja 5, 1778. See, further, D 7, 1778.

Gen. Chas. Lee, who since Jan. 1 (p. 2) has been held prisoner by the British in New York, writes to Gen. Washington that he has been admitted to parole. His parole was dated Dec. 27. He states: "I have the full liberty of the City and its limits, have horses at my command furnished by Sir Henry Clinton and General Robinson [Robertson]—an lodg'd with two of the oldest and warmest Friends I have in the world—Colonel Butler and Major Disney of ye 38th Regt. . . . in short my situation is rendered as easy, comfortable and pleasant as possible for a man who is in any sort of Prisoner."—Lee Papers in N. Y. H. S. (1873), II: 376. See, further, F 5, 1778.

In this year, the death of Voltaire and Rousseau occurred, the former on May 30, the latter on July 2. Rousseau's Confessions appeared in 1789.—Dictionnaire Historique de la France.

"A view of the City of New York from Long Island," evidently drawn during the English occupation, perhaps by Montresor, probably dates from this year. It is reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pl. 48.

A view from Paulus Hook, showing Manhattan Island, probably drawn by Montresor in 1776, is reproduced in Vol. III, A. Pl. 68. "The Markets at New-York are so overstocked with Goods of English Manufacture, that they sell at London Prices, notwithstanding the heavy duties on them by the American Freight, etc."—St. James's Chron., D 30, 1777-Ja 1, 1778.

Announcement is made that, "By Permission of his Excellency Sir Henry Clinton, the Theatre will be Open'd early next week, by a Society of Gentlemen of the Army and Navy, for the laudable Purpose of raising a Supply for the Widows and orphans of those who have lost their Lives in his Majesty's Service, as well as to support other Charities as their funds may enable them to perform; . . . Notice will be given in the next Paper of the first Night of Performance." Tickets may be bought "at Mr. Rivington's, Mr. Hugh Gaine's, and Mills and Hicks's Printing-Houses, at both Coffee-Houses; and at Marshall's Tavern, opposite to the Theatre in John-Street."—Royal Gaz., Ja 3, 1778. Marshall's tavern was later known as the "Shakespeare Tavern," perhaps because of its proximity to the theater.

The name of the actors are not given in the newspapers, but most authorities agree that André was among the performers during this year. Dunlap includes his name in the list of players (Dunlap, Hist. of Am. Theatre, I: 94, 101); and Sellemayer says: "When the season of 1778-9 opened Sir Henry Clinton was back in New York with the army that had spent the previous winter in Philadelphia. André was with him and had but recently been appointed his aide, with the Provincial rank of Major. That gay young officer now took part in the theatrical preparations and activities of the season may be assumed with safety."—Sellemayer, Hist. of Am. Theatre, II: 38-39. The season of 1778 lasted from Jan. 6 to June 8.—Ibid., II: 36. See Ap 21.

There is preserved in the N. Y. H. S. the account-book of the managers of the theatre; it is a manuscript volume, bound in velvet, and records, among other things, the receipts for each performance and sums paid out in charity. Ticket sales averaged about $200 a night; they mounted to $258,118 at the first performance of "The West-Indian," on Jan. 15. At times a memorandum appears of "Light Gold taken at the Door." Payments appear to John Scliff, the chimney-sweeper, and for his season's box Sir Henry Clinton pays "50 Guineas."

A lottery scheme is launched, by permission of Maj.-Gen. James Robertson, to raise £1,080 for "the poor and distressed objects in the almshouse of this city."—Royal Gaz., Ja 3, 1778.

Twelve Guineas per cent. premium is now giving here to insure goods at New York from fire and the enemy: till 1st of April next, and Twenty Guineas per cent. have been given to pay the loss if our troops are not in possession of New-York the first of this month, and we have very appearance of a French and Spanish war."—_N. "The Whigs rail at Genl Futram without the least Restraint... They charge the Loss of Port Montgomery to him... and now they allege that it is his Fault that NY is in Peace and not taken this Winter."—_Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V._

Dr. Cornelius (see _Ag 23, S 20, 1777_), refers in his journal, to his return to the Livingston sugar-house, of which he says, in part: "This prison was much worse than when I left it before, from the fact that there were nearly thirty soldiers, who went around to the other prisoners and stole from them the few comforts they had, and take the sick from their beds and take their bed clothing, and beat and kick them almost to death. The articles which they took from us they would carry to Mr. Walley [who had charge of the prisoners] and sell them for rum." On Jan. 15, being ill, he went to "the hospital, which was the brick Meeting House." He remained here until Jan. 16, when he made his escape. This he describes in his _Diary of Dr. Ephraim Smith_.—_Ephraim Smith’s Diary (MS.), V._

Among the taverns maintained during the British occupation of the city, was one on Water St., generally known as "Smith’s Tavern." It was first designated as "opposite Commercy Loring’s," then as No. 939 Water St., and still later as No. 55 Water St. It stood near the Fly Market. Richard Wotton first opened the house as the "London Chop-House, at the sign of the Earl of Percy’s arms."—_N. Y. Merc., Ja 12, 1778._ He was succeeded by Ephraim Smith (ibid, Ag 10, 1778), and he in turn by Mrs. Sarah Shaw, "late in partnership with Mr. Smith."—_Royal Gaz., D 23, 1778._ Mrs. Shaw turned over the tavern to Charles Roubaleet the following spring (ibid, My 22, 1779); but while within a year Ephraim Smith had returned—See Je 5, 1780. The rapid succession of tenant tavern keepers to this tavern was part of one, and when the house was advertised to let on Jan. 31, 1781, it was distinctly specified that "No tavern-keeper need apply."—_Ibid., Ja 31, 1781._ It had become an auction-house by Nov. 17, 1781.—_Ibid., N 17, 1781._

Geo. Forbes, commonly called "Black George," offers "at the White Hall" fried and pickled oysters for exportation to the West Indies. He also "keeps good entertainment for Gentlemen" at his house at Whitehall.—_N. Y. Merc., Ja 12, 1778._ Forbes may have acquired the house with the "Sign of the fry’d Oysters" which we know stood at Whitehall.—_See My 20, 1773._ In 1780 (q.v., Je 3), he removed to Little Dock St.

Doran’s tavern (see _Ja 15, 1770; Mr 24, 1777_ is now kept by "the widow Doran," according to a notice for the Marine Society to "take them in, Ja 5, 1778._

On the departure of James Robertson for Philadelphia, the publication of his newspaper, _The Royal Am. Gaz._ (see _Ja 16, 1777_), was continued by his brother, Alexander Robertson. James returned to New York, and with the issue of Oct. 6 of this year the paper was published by Alexander and James Robertson.—_Brigham, in A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 489._ See _Je 25, 1780._

Robert Hull, "intending shortly for England," announces that he has "declined the business of tavern keeping," and wishes to settle all accounts.—_Royal Gaz., Ja 17, 1778._ Hull had been proprietor of the City Tavern since 1771. He apparently left during the month, for, by Jan. 31 (q.v.), William Hick had taken the house, recently the White Horse of N. Burles.—_Capt. James Cook discovers the Sandwich Islands.—Alexander, _Brief Hist. of the Hawaiian People (1891), 104._

News reaches England that "a Conspiracy had just been discovered at New York. Many of the Inhabitants, who had taken the Oaths of Allegiance to his Majesty, had entered into a League with the Commander of the Rebel Troops in the Neighbourhood, that on a certain Night, on his making an Assault on the Place, they would set the City on Fire in several different Parts, in order to throw the Whole into Confusion, and make it the more easy Conquest. Happily this diabolical Plot was timely discovered, and forty of the Ringleaders are now in Irons."—_St. James’s Chron., Ja 12-20, 1778._

Wm. Smith writes: "My Brother has heard that Col. Roger Morris is under Guard at NY. for declaring that the People of England and the Generals and Lords Howes with holding overtures [of peace] in his power to make, and that they began to riot upon the Prolongation of the War."—_Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V._ On Feb. 8, he added: "The Report of Roger Morris’s Imprisonment at NY. gains Credit & tis said that Beverly Robinson his Brother in Law died lately in Town."—_Ibid._

If America can neither form an army to drive the British Force off of the Continent nor to disturb them at N Y Phila or Rhode Island this Winter the Prospect of general Devastation next Summer will wear the People from the Congress & all will then be over with their present Leaders. If they make an Attempt to raise Forces for this Purpose and do not succeed the Delusions will vanish before the Season for opening the Campaign... Tis said Genl Lee is exchanged and come out—Perhaps he is to be made a General & bring about the Treaty—It is said many weeks ago the Patriots denied that Lee had ever urged since his Captivity to Overtures of Peace. Mrs Watkins who came lately from NY saw Lee walking the Streets. He would not have had that Privilege if it was not known that he had changed his Sentiments—They would not have suffered him to procure Information & inspect their Condition if they were not confident of his Conduct.—_Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V._

"Supposing the Court Emotions to amount as Mr Duane says 26 to 34 Millions of Dollars or as Mr Law of Connecticut who left the Congress with him in Dec[em]ber to 38 Millions, tho’ I believe they are more [;] even then our Colony is under a Debt of near Two Millions Currency. Compare this to our largest Public Burden the 1776 debt which was $3,743,000—Our Annual Levies were then a little more than $40,000 and the Complaints of the Burden were universal—Parliament reimbursed us in Part. The Congress have ordered us to raise 100,000 Doll[ar]s this year viz[12] $80,000 What Clamours must arise—Then [in 1762] we had a Successful Trade & immense Gains by Privateering & a clandestine Commerce by Flags to Hispaniola—Besides we now cast the whole Burden upon the Dutchess Utler Albany & Broadway & the N. and the public for the Southern Counties cannot or will not contribute & as to Charlotte Cumberland & Gloucester they were never taxed as able to bear any Burden & now claim to be a separate State under the Name of Americana.—The City of NY generally bore ¾ of all public Colosy Levies—With Respect to this Province the Congress may perceive the End of their Thread.—What will the Province do in another Year? They tax now more than 38 Millions of Dollars. There are great arrears due to all who serve under them."—_Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V._

"William Hick returns his sincere thanks to all those who were pleased to favour him with their company when he lived in the Jerseys, and takes the liberty to acquaint them that he now lives at the Bunch of Grapes in the Broadway lately kept by Mr. Hull the City Tavern, 115 & Broadway, where they may, and the public in general may depend on his utmost endeavours to make their entertainment agreeable."

"N. B. Jellies to be had every day."—_Royal Gaz., Ja 31, 1778._

Hick, or Hicks, seems to have been occupying a house, prior to taking over the City Tavern, at "No. 326, opposite Mr. Isaac Low’s in Dock-Streets," where, on Feb. 5, he sold his household furniture by public vendue.—_N. T. Merc., Mr 27, 1780._ When Gen. Patton, at the request of Commercy Loring, turned him "out of his house, into the street, with his family, his furniture, and effects, and substituted in his place one Roubaleet, a pimp, a defendant, and a servant of the Commercy,"—_Jones, Am. Hist. Mag., N. Y., 11: 86._ Roubaleet remained until the end of the Revolution.—_See O 13, 1783._

A captain of a victualling transport who left New York in this month reported in London that "there were then Provision enough for the Soldiery and Inhabitants for more than three Years", and that the Warehouse and Stores were so full that he lay three Weeks at the Quays before he could deliver his Cargo, and that the whole were covered with Casks of all Kinds."—St. James's Chron., O S 9-10, 1778.

3 Elias Boudinot, who had been appointed by Gen. Washington a commissary-general to look after the prisoners of the continental army held by the British, goes from New Jersey to Staten Island, "in my own sloop," as he states in his journal, and thence to "the Wharf in New York." He relates his experiences in the city, commenting upon the fact that he was treated by Gen. Robertson, commandant of the city, Commissary Loring, and other British officers, "with the greatest Civility & good Humor," and was afforded every opportunity to see the prisoners, converse with them freely, and ascertain the conditions of their captivity. Accompanied by a British officer, he first visited the Provost prison where, he states, he found "near 70 Officers from Colonel downward in close confinement in the Goal." These officers complained that "they had been confined on the most frivolous Pretences," and that "they had received the most cruel Treatment from the Provost Marshal [Cunningham]," being, on the most trifling occurrences and on false charges of misconduct, "locked up in the Dungeon, ... 10, 12 & 14 weeks" or in some instances 11 months, with "provisions marathons," over which with great Insolence answered that every word was true," and "spoke that he was as absolute there as Gen'l Howe was at the head of his Army." Mr. Boudinot continues: "After this I visited two Hospitals of our Sick Prisoners and the Sugar House: in the two first were 241 Prisoners & in the last about 190—They acknowledge that for about two Months past they fared poorly for food," Mr. Boudinot remarks that previous to this, the treatment of Gen'l Burgoyne, and for sometime after, their Treatment had been cruel beyond Measure—that The Prisoners in the French Church, amounting on an Average to 3 & 400, could not all lay down at once—that from the 11th of Oct to the 1st of Jan'y, they never need a single stick of Wood, and that for the most part they eat their Pork raw When the Pews & Door & Windows were frequently called upon for food."

"The next day," Mr. Boudinot concludes, "as a result of this examination, Measures for alleviating the Miseries of War" were agreed to by the British authorities.—Jour. or Hist. Recollections of Am. Events During the Rev. War, by Elias Boudinot, from his own manuscript (Phila., 1804), 9-15; Life, Public Services, Addresses and Letters of Elias Boudinot, Pres. of the Cont. Cong, by J. J. Boudinot (Boston, 1866), I: 90-99. See My 13, 1778.

Boudinot writes of his successful efforts to secure the exchange of Gen. Lee from the British, who had captured him at Baskingridge on Dec. 13, 1776 (p. v). Lee had been "confined to a handsome House under Care of 4 or 5 officers who lived with him & kept a genteel Table." He particularly describes his visit to Lee in Jan. (evidently error for Feb.), 1778, with a letter sent to New York by Washington, to examine into the condition of the American prisoners there, saying: "The Morning after my Arrival, I waited on Genl Lee who received me with great pleasure indeed, and asked me to breakfast with him the next day. This I did in Company with the officers who had the Care of him, and was treated with great politeness & affability. When Breakfast was over Genl Lee asked me up into his Room. He soon began to complain very hazily of the treatment he had receiv'd from Congress, in not complying with his request," which had been that a committee of members of congress should be sent to New York to confer with him. Boudinot gives in detail his conversation with Lee, who said that he wished to reveal to congress the plans of the British summer campaign; that he considered it improbable that the Americans "under such an Ignorant Commander in Chief" (meaning Washington) could ever withstand the British, and that he desired to send to congress a plan for military operations that he had drafted. Boudinot says that he declined to undertake such a mission, and adds: "I endeavored to negotiate his Exchange and it was agreed (hypo-thetically) that it should take place for Major General Prescott, subject to Genl. Howe's approbation. Genl. Howe objected and ordered Genl. Lee transferred to Phila."

"Addresses and Letters of Elias Boudinot*, by J. J. Boudinot (Boston, 1866), I: 138-42. See Jl 4, Je 4, D 30, 1777.

Boudinot's care for the American prisoners of war in New York did not end with his departure from that city in February, 1778. He formed a plan of requiring Gen. Burgoyne to pay "hard Money" for the support of the British prisoners whom the Americans supplied with daily rations. In the meantime he proceeded to borrow money or take goods in New York on his own credit.

"Thus," he said, "I furnished 500 Officers with a handsomely Suit of Cloathes each and 1100 Men with a plain Suit, found them Blankets, Shirts, &c, and added to their Provisions found by the British a full half ration of Bread & Beef per Day for upwards of 15 Months. Part of this I supplied by sending Wheat & Flour to New York & selling them for hard Money under leave from General Robertson."

Subsequently, in 1778, he applied to the continental congress, sitting in Philadelphia, for a settlement of his accounts, explaining that as a result of his undertaking in behalf of the prisoners in New York, he had advanced from his private resources and owed on expenditures ordered a total of $66,666.66. When Congress took no action to settle the account, he wrote: "I sent orders to my Agent in New York [Lewis Pictard] and all further Issues were stopped accordingly."

The final outcome of the affair is thus described by Mr. Boudinot: "The latter End of July I rec'd a very affecting Letter from my Agent pointing the Distresses of the Prisoners in so striking a Manner and the Death of Several more than had been usual, that I could not longer persist in my Expecation of leave to remain on the Subject—Having rec'd their Letter in Congress I rose with Tears in my Eyes, and reminding them of my former Promise begged Leave to break thro' it, so far as to read the Letter which I did—On this Mr. [Wm.] Duer (a Man of much Feeling) arose and in a speech of more than half an Hour declaimed so severely agt the ungrateful Conduct of the House that a unanimous Vote immediately declared for the final resolution. They were again under the necessity of sending a Deputation to the House of Representatives, which was immediately sent to New York."—Life & of Elias Boudinot, by J. J. Boudinot (Boston, 1866), I: 158-61; Jour. Cont. Cong. (Ford ed.), XI: 736. See F 7 and My 13, 1788.

In reply to Howe's letter of Oct. 22, 1777 (q.c.), in which he sought the king's permission to resign his command, Germain writes that the king has been "pleased to order me to signify to you, [Admiral] Howe, his Royal commands, that the latter be transmitted to the British commanding in the admirality of America, and that a letter from the king's Privy Council, respecting the troops, or the operations in which they have or were to be employed."

Treaties of "Amity and Commerce," and of "Alliance, Eventual and Defensive," are agreed upon at Paris by France and the United States. They are signed, on the part of France, by C. A. Gérard, and on the part of the United States, by Benjamin Franklin, Silas Deane, and Arthur Lee.—Jour. Cont. Cong., XI: 421-53. The treaties were unratified by congress on May 4—Ibid., XI: 457. They were printed together as a folio broadside, a copy of which is in the N. Y. P. L.

Joshua Loring, British commissary of prisoners, writes from New York to Gen. Howe: "that Mr. Boudinot, Commissary of the Rebel Prisoners, came to New York by permission of Sir Henry Clinton a few days ago [see F 3], to visit the Prisoners and settle his acct with Mr. Pictard. Loring states that he accompanied Boudinot " thro' the Hospitals, Sugar House and Provost, and he is perfectly satisfied in the Treatment they meet with."—Report on Am. Mss. in the Royal Institution of Gt. Brit. (1904), I: 191. As some British sailors recently "attacked, and with knives wounded and defaced three Hessian soldiers," and as other acts have been committed tending to raise discord between the Hessians and the British, Maj.-Gen. Robertson by proclamation orders that the Hessian troops be treated "with the civility due to strangers, and the kindness we owe to our faithful slaves and friends," and offers a reward of £50 for the discovery of the perpetrators of the attack.

printed and dispersed throughout the Colonies, by such means as shall be most likely to make them generally known and considered, and that you embrace every opportunity of circulating them by flag of truce, or private persons among the rebel troops, and in those parts of the country, where the authority of the Congress prevails. And this you are to do with all possible expedition, so as the people at large may be acquainted with their contents, before ill-intentioned persons can have time to diffuse prejudices against them, or, by misrepresenting their tendency, excite jealousies and distrust of the favourable disposition of Great Britain towards the American Colonies.—Parl. Reg. (1779), XIX, 406. About this time bills had been prepared and had received the king's assent, printed copies were forwarded by Germain for further distribution.—Ibid.

desperately wounded by a secret enemy, and there is no prospect of his recovery.—Royal Gaz., Mr 7, 1778. An announcement that this "chief prop of rebellion" was dead had appeared earlier in the year.—Ibid., Jl 31, 1778. These are samples of the falsehoods circulated to stimulate optimum among the Loyalists in New York.

Other examples have been cited by Van Tyne in The Loyalists (1902), 251-52, as follows:

Another day brought the golden tidings that Robert Morris died, Congress in disguise, having first made a motion for rescinding independency [citing Royal Gaz., Jl 3, 1778]. Wild reports got abroad that Washington had been made Lord Protector, or, again, this 'Caesar,' this 'Cromwell,' was dead or, at least, captured [Jour.
and Letters of Samuel Carwain (1864), 125]. Sometimes 'court cookery' prepared for the gazette the news of a treaty with Russia by which 36,000 Cossacks—a most plausible number—had been taken into British service. The King of Prussia, too, had yielded to British diplomacy [Royal Gaz., N 1, 1777]. 'Poor Rivington,' sneered a Boston editor, was hard put to it to keep up the spirits of the Loyalists in their confined district in New York [ibid., D 1, 1779].

Another editor observed that the printer of the London Gazette had been thought the greatest liar on earth, but Rivington had far exceeded in his various art his master in England [North Carolina Gaz., D 12, 1777].
[See A., Jl 13, 1777, Vol. V.]

'Not only did the loyal papers publish these curious items of news, but they gave to a hungry world morsels of political argument filled with bold antithesis, turbulent eloquence and the 'rant of passions which the writers never felt.' The peaceful citizens of New York, in nightly terror of the sailors from the British ships, who visited in the streets and dispersed the 'false news' [Royal Gaz., Ap 14, 1779], were told of the terrible scenes of anarchy in the Whig centers. The refugee, groaning under the war prices, which were fast consuming the few funds that he had brought with him, was made content by the tale of grinding taxes in the provinces. There was, asserted one writer, hardly one article of live or dead stock, or of the produce of the earth or waters, or the result of industry or labor that was 'exempt from the fangs of those devouring locusts,' the Whig legislatures. America was mortgaged for ages to come. They had incurred this intolerable burden because, forsooth, England had laid that 'most exorbitant and grievous tax' of three pence on a pound of tea [ibid., Mr 20, 1781].'

'General Lee is still in New York tho' discharged. He begins to be considered as a Deserter and probably will not come out till the Work of Reconciliation is advanced & the Minds of the Multitude turned to Peace. His Letters have estopped him from serving the Congress any longer as a Soldier. His Captivity may have saved his Life."—Win. Smith's Diary (M.S.), V. See My 4.

A London news item reads: "Our Readers have heard that the Prisoners have melted the leaden Statue of their most gracious King, at New-York, into Bullets; but they were guilty also of a Joke, for they reserved the leaden Head, and consigned it by the next Opportunity, to one of his Majesty's principal Ministers, who, upon the Receipt of the weighty Parcel, could not easily imagine what were its Contents."—St. James's Chron., Mr 7-10, 1778.

The royal assent is given to Lord North's conciliatory bills providing for the appointment of commissioners 'to treat and agree upon the means of quieting the disturbances now subsisting in certain of the American colonies,' and for a parliamentary declaration 'concerning the exercise of imposing taxes in the American colonies.'—Ann. Reg. (1778), 130-42, 1771; Parl. Hist., XIX:

The French ambassador informs the British court that France has signed a Treaty of Friendship and Commerce with the United States.—St. James's Chron., Mr 17-19, 1778; Winsor, VII: 45, 84.

The legislature, sitting at Poughkeepie, passes "An Act further to organize the Government of this State." It defines the powers and duties of the council of revision. The state courts are regulated. The secretary of state shall have, by ex officio, the clerk of the council of appointment. Regarding the arms and seals of the state, it states: 'Whereas, Arms have been devised for this State, and two several Seals have been devised and made, one of the said Seals, as and for the Great Seal, and the other, as and for the Privy Seal of this State, (and which said Seals are now in the Custody and Possession of his Excellency the present Governor;) and it therefore furthered that the said Arms and Seals, shall severally be, . . . the Arms, the Great Seal, and the Privy Seal of this State, . . . That the said Seal, hereby declared to be the Privy Seal shall be the Seal for military Commissions; and all such Matters and Things as heretofore, while this State, as the Colony of New-York, was subject to the Crown of Great-Britain, were issued, under the Seal at Arms, and the Governor or Commander-in-Chief, of the Colony for the Time being, shall issue under the said Seal, hereby declared to be the Privy Seal of this State. And that all such Matters and Things, as heretofore, while this State, as the Colony of New-York, was subject to the Crown of Great-Britain, were issued under the Great Seal of the Colony, shall in future, (the Proceedings in the Court of Chancery hereinafter in the said Edict excepted,) be issued under the said Seal, hereby declared to be the Great Seal of this State; and shall be made out and entered of Record, in the office of the Secretary of the State, in the same Manner as, when this State, as the Colony of New-York, was subject to the Crown of Great-Britain, the same were made out and entered of Record, in the Office of the Secretary of the Colony.

...— Laws of N.Y. (1778), chap. 12.

There is a record of the adoption, in 1778, of a coat of arms designed by Lewis Morris, John Jay, and John Sloss Hobar, and three copies made before 1785, are known. One is upon a military commission issued by Governor Clinton in 1778; a second was painted on the flag of the Third Regiment; and the third is a picture hung over Governor Clinton's pew in St. Paul's Church, in this city, in 1778. — Preble, Hist. of the Flag of the U.S., 616-17. See also "The Arms and Seals of New-York—a defence," by Homes (Henry A.), in N.Y. Gen. & Bing. Record (1886), Vol. XVI; and "The Arms of the State of New-York," by Howell (Geo. R.), in ibid. (1888), Vol. XIX. On May 18, 1893, "The State Seal," constituting Chap. II of "The General Laws" of the state, prescribed, among other things, the arms and great seal of the state. The device of the arms of this state, as adopted March 16, 1778 was there correctly described. — Laws of N.Y. (1893), chap. 678, § 40.

... Letters from London mention, that a naval-yard is about to be established in this city, and that Capt. Le Cras is to be appointed Commissioner.—Royal Am. Gaz., Mr 19, 1778.

An advertisement offers "the farm called the Hermitage" for rent. It is "situate between the Bloomingdale and Greenwich roads, about four miles from town, containing near 25 acres with an house and garden, . . . barn and stables, and two large bearing orchards." — N.Y. Merc., Mr 23, 1778; Landmark Map, Pl. 176, Vol. III.

The assembly concurs in a senate resolution of March 23: "That the Secretary of this State and the Clerks of the several Counties, in the same, be respectively authorized to put or cause to be put, the Records and Papers belonging to their respective Offices, in strong and light Inclosures, sufficient to exclude Rain, and to keep or cause them to be kept, and from Time to Time to be removed in the same respectively, to such Place and Places, as they shall severally think most conducive to the Security of such Records and Papers." The commanding officer of any regiment of militia shall furnish such guards as the secretary of state and the clerks of the counties may require.—Potts and Proc. of the Assembly (John Holt, 1777), 99.

New York State passes an act to regulate elections.— Laws of N.Y. (1778), chap. 16 (passed by Holt, 1782).

Smith writes: "Read a Letter from Brother Tru of 22d Inst. — General Sullivan there 18th & gone to form an Army in N England where they expect the British will attack & leave another Army in Pennsylvania. He owned the arrival of Coms of Peace at NY—I informed him of Conversation with Lord Howe & that he brought out Instructions to settle Terms to be laid before Parliam."... A Fleet arrived a few days after 22d Inst at NY whether with Troops or Provisions not yet known. A Fleet sailed from there before the supposed Blockade. Talk in NY of coming up the River but most of going to N England to relieve Burgoyne.—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), V.

Du Simitiere makes a memorandum that he has added to his collection "A Cast of plaster representing in baso relievo the model of the equestrian Statue of the King that was erected in New York in August 1770 & destroyed in July 1776." He describes it as "gilt on a Silic blue ground, this cast was from a casting on Copper done by a genevios [resident of Geneva] nam'd Goao a worthless [sic] fellow but what became of the original I know not." From Du Simitiere's "Memoranda," MSS, Vol. II, in Library of Congress. Du Simitiere began to inquire what became of the fragments of the statue by asking Col. John Lamb by letter of Nov. 14, 1778—ibid. As shown in the summary under date of July 19, 1776 (p. v.), he was evidently in possession of the information by Feb. 22, 1779.

Frederick Earl of Carlisle, Wm. Eden, one of the commissioner's for trade and plantations, and Geo. Johnstone, captain in the royal navy, are named by the king to act with the Howes as commissioners "to treat, consult, and agree upon the means of quieting all the disturbances now existing in certain of the colonies, in the planting, and provinces in North America."—Ann. Reg., XXI: 222. In a letter of Apr. 12 to Howe, Germain enclosed "A copy of the instructions his Majesty has thought fit to give his commissioners for their guidance in this most important business," and declared: "They are so particular and comprehensive, that it only remains for me to add my wishes for their happy execution, and that peace may be restored between Great Britain and the Colonies upon the ground of that connection which, so happily for both, formerly subsisted between them."—Parl. Reg. (1779), XI: 470.

An item of London news of May 9 stated: "The Emoluments of the American Commissioners are as follow:—1000 l. each for a Service of Plate, &c. 300 l. each for sent on Duty and Pay. 100 l. per Week Salary, except Lord Carlisle, the President, who has thrice that Sum."—St. James's Chron., My 7-9, 1778. The commissioners reached America on June 3 (p. v.).

The Earl of Chatham makes his last appeal in the house of commons against giving up the sovereignty of America. The Duke of Richmond answered in a long speech to the effect that England could not fight single-handed against France, Spain, and America. Chatham rose to reply, but swooned and was carried from the house. He died four days later (April 11)—Winsor, VII: 51-52, and authorities there cited; St. James's Chron., My 9-12, 1778.

Mr. Hartley, in the house of commons, moves to put an end to the American war. After figuring that the expense of the war, if concluded at the end of 1779, will be £54,990,000, he says: "This enormous sum, if it is to be maintained, it is very dear to the country. At what rate shall I set the loss and destruction of the trade of this country, with all its rich resources and produce? At what rate shall I set the loss of 13 provinces, once the pride and strength of the parent state? At what rate shall I set the ruin of the British navy, which has hitherto been the bulwark of this country? At what rate shall I set the lives of many thousands of British subjects, whose valor might have been reserved for the defence of their country instead of being thrown away in the attempt to enthrall slavery upon the new world? These are losses not to be estimated in the vile trash of pounds, shillings, and pence. When will these follies come to an end? The trade, the revenues, and all the strength and resources of this country, are sacrificed to the pursuit of this mad and ruinous war."—Parl. Hist., XI: 1605-71.

An advertisement offers to let "The House, Garden, Stable, and Coach-House, at Belvoir, The most delightful situation within the environs of this city. The House consists of eleven rooms, seven fireplaces, a Hall, Lobby, Kitchen and garret, with three commodious cellars." Applications are to be made to Mr. Rivington, or to "Mr. Howard, in King-Street,"—Royal Gaz., Ap 11, 1778. This was Belvoir, later called the White Conduit House, and still later, Ranelagh, for history of which see Mr 24, 1777.

Gen. Tryon causes to be "printed and dispersed" the draft of a bill, read in the house of commons on Feb. 19 (p. v.), "declaring the Intentions of the Parliament . . . concerning the Exercise of the Right of imposing Taxes within his Majesty's Colonies. . . ." The bill states, in part, that the exercise of the right of 1778—taxation by Parliament has caused "great uneasiness and disorders;" that it "has, by sundry misrepresentations, been made the means of misleading many of his Majesty's faithful subjects, who yet acknowledge the justice of contributing to the common defence of the Empire, provided such contributions should be raised under a system of General Assembly to which each respective Colony, Province, or Plantation." To restore peace, etc., it is therefore deemed "expedient to declare that the King and Parliament of Great Britain will not impose any duty, tax, or assessment, for the purpose of raising a revenue within any of the said Colonies ..."—From original broadside, in N. Y. P. L.; Evans Bibliography, No. 1597.

15 Kemble informs me he was appointed to the Command, Vice Sir William Howe; General Robertson and others informed of the circumstance, and made public by them. The ship-of-war "Andromeda" brings "an Account of ten thousand Men being ordered to America, of which 7,000 are Highlanders, and of terms to be offered the Americans."—Kemble's Jour., 149.

A "Bathing Machine. Upon the plan of those used at Margate, and other watering-places in England," is to be established on the North River near Vauxhall by June 1. The subscription price is a guinea a season, or five shillings a bath. "The benefit of bathing in Salt-Water, being universally acknowledged, is it not astonishing that the Inhabitants of New-York, who have the means at hand should never yet have provided a conveniency for the purpose? The inhabitants find a great difficulty in procuring the means and the Ladies, though it is known to be of the greatest advantage to their delicate frames, have been totally excluded. "It is to be open from June 1 to the end of September from 6 A.M. until 12 noon.—Royal Gaz., Apr 18, 1778. By Aug. 1 (q.r.), the bathing-machine was in operation "behind Mr. Harrison's Brewhouse."

19 Howe writes to Germain from Philadelphia: "The Drafts of the (conscriptory) bills inclosed in your Lordship's letter of the 19th February [q.v.] have been published, and dispersed in obedience to his Majesty's commands, and will, I have no doubt, be shortly spread over this continent. "The enemy's position continues to be at Valley Forge and Wilmington; their force has been diminished during the course of the winter by desertion, and by detachments to the back settlements, where the Indians make constant inroads; but the want of green forage does not yet permit me to take the field and their situation too strong to hazard an attack with a prospect of success, which might put an end to the rebellion; whereas a check at this period would probably counteract his Majesty's intentions of preparing the way for the return of peace, by the bills proposed."—P.R. Reg. (1779). X. 465.

20 "By the Law, the master of the port, issues a notice to all ship masters to "wait on the commandant" (Geo. Robertson) on their arrival in port, and report in writing the names of their passengers, and other information "that may be conducive to the public safety."—N. Y. Merc., Apr 20, 1778.

According to the advertisement of one Christian Werner, an artist of the first rank in the city, it was "formerly called Flattenberg-Hill." Werner's shop, where he sells "Butter Biscuits," is "No. 224, corner of Broad-street," at the "bottom" of this hill.—N. Y. Merc., Apr 20, 1778.

The advertisement of one Thomas Smith, a ship and house joiner, gives his address as "north-east of Schuyler's sugar-house, on Cowfoot-Hill, King-George-Street."—N. Y. Merc., Apr 20, 1778.

21 "The "Sons of St. George" celebrate the anniversary of "their Tutelar and thence renowned Patron," in full assembly in the "Long Room" of Hick's Tavern.—N. Y. Merc., Apr 27, 1778. It was announced before the meeting that Gen. Tryon would preside; and that the dinner would be at 4 o'clock.—Royal Gaz., Apr 4, 1778.

25 A woman living in New York writes to her son in Philadelphia: "Sir Henry Clinton leaves this city in a few days for Philadelphia to take the command [see My 2], when I suppose Sir W. Howe will, decamp. We are all here in the greatest consternation at the pacific measures the Ministry seem disposed to take with the Americans. General Tryon lately sent a copy of the acts [see Ap 15] to Governor Clinton in the Jersey, who returned them with the greatest contempt imaginable, desiring him to make use of the paper. By all accounts, a French war is inevitable, which is an alarming circumstance. Lord North appears, by his speech, to be frightened out of his wits. I am most wretched that I cannot get away."—N. T. Jour. (Poughkeepsie), Je 8, 1778.

Sir Henry Clinton, Maj.-Gen. Daniel Jones, Maj.-Gen. Tryon, and Maj.-Gen. Valentine Jones, with their suites, review the troops in the vicinity of King'sbridge, passing along the lines to Fort Independence, and from thence to Capt. Emmerick's quarters. Here a sham fight is presented, "by firing from within a House, to defend it against many fierce Attacks made upon it ..."—N. T. Merc., Ap 27, 1778.

Sir Henry Clinton sailed this day to Philadelphia, to take upon him the Command. —Kemble's Jour., 150.

The ship-of-war "Andromeda" brings "an Account of ten thousand Men being ordered to America, of which 7,000 are Highlanders, and of terms to be offered the Americans."—Kemble's Jour., 149.

Volunteers of Irish extraction, wishing to join a corps being raised by Lord Rawdon, are requested to apply at certain places, including "Mr. Dean's, at the Sign of the Ship, near the Fly-market."—Royal Gaz., My 2, 1778. See also Ap 28, 1781.

Kemble records: "General Daniel Jones succeeded to the Command of York Island and Posts depending; find him as precise and Exact as Sir Henry was on the Contrary ..."—Kemble's Jour., 150.

Maj.-Gen. Daniel Jones, commanding the British troops on New York Island and Posts Depending," states in a proclamation that "Maj.-Gen. Valentine Jones being Appointed to succeed Maj.-Gen. Robertson as Commandant of this City, he will be assisted in the Civil Department by Andrew Elliot, Esq., Appointed Superin- tendent General of the Police, and David Mathews, Esq., Mayor of this City."—Kemble Papers, in N. Y. H. Collections (1883), XVI: 605. The "Superintendent General of Police" will have "Powers and Authorities to issue such Orders and Regulations, from Time to Time as may most effectually tend to the Suppression of Vice and Licentiousness—the Support of the Peace—the Direction of the nightly Watch—the Regulation of Markets and Fairs and all other Matters in which the Oconomy, Peace, and good Order of the City of New-York, and its Environs are con- cerned. The Superintendent General will be assisted in the Adminis- tration of the Police by David Mathews, Esq. Mayor of this City. ..."—N. T. Merc., My 4, 1778, Man. Com. Coun. (1863), 659.

It is announced that certain British officers in the hands of the American forces have been exchanged for Maj.-Gen. Lee and Ethan Allen.—N. T. Merc., My 4, 1778. See My 13.

Continuing his diary under this date in Vol. 3, Wm. Smith writes: "I have kept notes of the public Transactions of this Colony in other Books & a part of last year on loose Sheets. We have arrived now to the 6th May 1778 from which Time I shall preserve my memoranda in this Book, and I hope the war will end before I have blotted many Pages with the Occurrences I am often obliged to set down from very muddy Streams of doubtful Information which if I have Time I will hereafter digest preserving a new Picture of the Times."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), III: 43.

General orders contain, among others, the following references to shooting-grounds: "The four Hessian Regiments will fire to-morrow morning, between the Hours of 8 and 10. upon the Common beyond the Jews Burying-Ground."—Order-book in N. Y. H. Collections (1883), 607. The same order, repeated on May 10, has this added: "and the Regiment of Mirbach upon the Bloomingdale road between seven and eight in the Morning."—Ibid., 608. On May 15, the orders assign the Greenwich Road as the shooting-ground for the 38th Regiment.—Ibid., 611. On May 19, an order reads: "The Grenadier Battalion of Kohler will fire to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock near Fort Krayhausen."—Ibid., 614. On May 21, "The 53rd Regiment will fire this afternoon between the hours of 5 and 7 on the Common, to the right of the Bowery Road, and the Regiment of Wissenbach between the hours of 7 and 10 to-morrow morning upon the Communication to Mc- Gowen's, East River."—Ibid., 615. On May 28, it is ordered that "The 75th Regiment will fire to-morrow morning between the Hours of Six and Nine, on the Common, to the Right of Buaker's Hill."—Ibid., 621.

From a British officer Smith learned on June 3 "That there arrived on NY on the 7th May 16000 men from Great Britain—1778 Two Expeditions were preparing from thence. It was believed that 1779 would be ready to set by Sunday next [Je 7]. That before the 16000 arrived there were at NY 7000 Regulars & 3000 Militia. That 20 Vessels had sailed from France with Gen. Smith's Corps, which arrived & brought to New York of which he had seen there & the other 12 were at the Hook & coming up. Smith says of this information "As this Man's Intelligence on 26 March ... were probably false I give him very Little Credit for what he says now." From another source Smith learns "that the ReinforCm which arrived NY on the 7th May amounted to 22000."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), III: 67-69.

"If the British General & Commissioners are wise they will now publish a Relation of all the Attempts that have been made to induce the Congress to come to a fair Settlement with the Colonies & at the End threaten Desolation as the consequence of the last Rejection. This would convert Multitudes and totally destroy the Confidence of the Multitude in all those Leaders who have been in the Secret of the various overtures they have received."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), III: 48.

9 The same morn., "If France is really a Friend [to] the Liberties of America let her declare War & send her Fleet and Armies here. A Treaty of Commerce is Nothing. The News of A Treaty of Commerce with the Contents unknown less than Nothing. She is an old Cunning Monarchy proceeding on an antient well digested Policy & not to be diverted from her Interest by upstart Politicians."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), III: 49.

10 Among general orders is this: "Officers or non Commissioned Officers Commanding Guards are to send Patrols to apprehend any Persons Gaming in the Streets or Ruins near their Posts; They are to send such prisoners to the Main Guard, and a Report is to be made immediately to the Commandant of the City."—Order-book, in N. Sir William Howe having obtained his Majesty's permission to return to Europe, the King has been pleased to appoint His Excellency Sir Henry Clinton to succeed him, upon his departure, as General and Commander in Chief of the Army in this district of America, and all orders issued by Gen. Sir Henry Clinton are to be obeyed."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), III: 67.

12 Sir William Howe cannot think of taking leave of the Army without expressing in the strongest terms the very high sense he entertains and ever shall entertain of the distinguished Spirit, alacrity, and unanimity exerted upon all occasions by every Officer and Soldier he has had the honour to Command, as well Foreign as British, in the course of a service attended with much fatigue and hardship. He now having the sense of the satisfaction in being able to congratulate the Army on his being succeeded in so important a Command by a General who, he is fully persuaded, will not only add Lustre to His Majesty's Arms, but acquire great Honour to himself and to the Army under his Command."—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1833), 579-80. See My 24.

John Holt having suspended publication of The New-York Jour- nal at Kingston with No. 1771, which was the issue of Oct. 13, 1777 (see Jl 7, 1777), now begins publishing it in Poughkeepsie, with No. 1772, and with the title The New-York Journal, and the General Advertiser. "It was suspended from Nov. 6, 1780 to July 30, 1781, because of scarcity of paper and lack of financial support. After being resumed with the issue of July 30, 1781, it was sus- pended with the issue of Jan. 1, 1782, No. 124, to allow Holt to print the State Laws."—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. Steuben enters the American service as inspector-general. For his oath of office, signed "the Steuben," and attested by Wash- ington, see Wisn, VII: 36-37.

17 The latter part of the letter (Excerpt) F writes to Gen. Washington of his suc- cess in securing an exchange of prisoners. Col. Campbell was sent out from New York by Gen. Howe to confer with him, and he relates that, having received permission from Gen. Clinton, he re- turned to New York with the British officers. There he met "Major Genl Daniel Jones in the Command & General Valentine Jones May Commandant of the City," and he reported: "They treated me with uncommon Civility & granted me everything I asked. The Exchange I took with Me was compleatly carried with Execution, with the Addition of forty-five Officers & about Twenty Privates being for the Servants of Genl Burgoyne, Coll. Campbell & others. Genl Jones has given me the strongest assurance that our officers & Privates shall not have reason again to Complain of unnecessary Severity; indeed their whole System appears to be changed or at least in Confusion."—Life, Pub. Services, Addresses and Letters of Elias Boudinot, ed. by J. J. Boudinot (Boston, 1896), I: 115.

Maj.-Gen. Alexander McDougall sends to Gen. Gates a tabula- tion of events showing that Sir H Clinton has taken steps to strengthen the Enemy's Strength in New York, and its Dependencies." This he has "Collected from De- serters, & friends to our Cause, who have come from Long Island, & New York." It shows a total force of 6,503 men, of whom 2,060 are British, 1,250 Hessian, 3,803 new levies, and 100 Anspackers. These are stationed at Brooklyn, City of New York, Fort Wash- ington, York Island (Manhattan), Long Island, Paulus Hook, Kingsbridge, etc.—From the original MS. with Gates Papers, in N. Y. H. S.

We both apprehend that this Colony will soon be- come the main Theatre of the War & that Sir H Clinton will correct Howe's Blunder by a greater if he draws all the Troops from Pennsylvania where it will be his Interest to avail himself of the Disaffection complained of by the Independents to overturn the Congres- sional Authority."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), III: 60.

Sir Henry Clinton, as Commander in Chief of the Army."—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1833), 586.

General orders from headquarters at New York, on this Sun- day, contain the following: "The Battalion of the 71st. Regiment on Long Island are to March to Hallett's Cove on Tuesday Morn- ing, to Pass in boats to Horn's Hook, on this Island, and March from thence to the Ground appointed for their Encampment on the left of the Redoubts of McCown's, near Jones's House." At the same time, it is ordered that "The King's American Regiment, Commanded by Col. Fanning, are to March on Tuesday Morning, at Five o'Clock, to Hora's Hook, from whence they are to pass in boats to Hallett's Cove, and are to be Quartered in New Town, where they will receive Orders from Maj.-Gen. Tryon."—Order- book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1853), 618.

It is reported in Poughkeepsie by people who left New York about ten days ago that provisions, both fresh and salt, were very scarce, and, though prices are limited by martial law, yet the seller usually found means to obtain more; that a good quart of meal might be sold for "half a job," and other provisions in proportion, and that even the soldiers were stinted to half allowance of salted meat. It was supposed the scarcity would increase, as 42 transports had just arrived from Philadelphia, with invalids and Tory inhabi- tants.—N. Y. Jour., My 25, 1778.
1776. It is also reported that "there seemed to be some relaxation of the severity with which our prisoners [Americans] had been used, many of them being now allowed the liberty to walk the streets."

29. Wm. Calwelry announces that he "has erected a Stage Waggon, to go between New-york and Kingbridge, which sets out from this City every Monday, Wednesday and Friday Morning at 9 o'clock, and from Mr. M' Fraser's at the camp, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon; each passenger to pay Six Shillings going and Six returning."

30. Among the general orders issued from headquarters by Gen. Jones is this: "The Commanding Officers of Regiments are to be answerable that no fences near their Camps are Damaged, nor Gardens and Cultivated Grounds trod down or injured. The Regiments shall be able to make good any Damage done, the Officers of the respective Regiments are to be responsible for the good performance of this order."

32. Gen. Jones orders that "The Corps of Artillery will fire a Royal Salute of Twenty One Guns on Thursday [July 4, 7.5] at One o'clock, in Honour of His Majesty's Birthday." This is to add: "The Commanding Officers of Regiments are to Order the Men of their Corps off Duty to be dressed on His Majesty's Birthday as for Parade."

33. The variations in these Returns from Week to Week to be accounted for in the next Return. No Rations are to be delivered but for the present time.

The Commandant of New York is desired to Order an Exact Return to be made out every Saturday of the number of Rations to be drawn for their Effective Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, Soldiers, Servants, Women, and Children for the ensuing week, which Return they are to sign themselves and transmit to the Deputy Adjutant General.

The Vegetables in these Returns from Week to Week to be accounted for in the next Return. No Rations are to be delivered but for the present time.

12 Smith learns that 'the British have 5 Regiments at Kingsbridge for Fort Washington or Kaipalun, and that Troops had been for several days inquiring at Hoorn's Hook.'—Win. Smith's Diary (MS.), III: 70.

13 The name of Cricket, to be played on Monday next, the 14th instant, at Cannon's Tavern, at Cofear's Hook. Those Gentlemen that choose to become Members of the Club, are desired to attend. The Wickets to be pitch at two o'clock.'—Royal Gaz. Je 13, 1778. Later, the cricket grounds were 'where the late Reviews were, near the Jews Burying Ground.'—Ibid. Je 17, 1780.

14 About a 0'clock this Morning a party of [of Frenchmen], said to be about 20 Men, some Armed, others not, with their Faces blacked, and otherwise disguised, came into Flatbush, took off Major Moncreiffe and Mr. Bache; attempted the Mayor, Mr. Matthews's house, but it being well fastened, and a Shot being fired which they apprehended might give the Alarm, induced them to go off with the two first mentioned Gentlemen, supposed into Jersey.

—Kemble's Jour., 151-52. Major Moncreiffe was the father of the young lady who came as a spy into the household of Geo. Putnam. See S 14, 1776; Memoirs of Mrs. Coghill (London 1794), and The Social Lady, by Mrs. John King Van Rensselaer (1824).

15 Hostilities between England and France begin with a naval battle off the French coast.—Guizot, Hist. of France, V: 380. The outbreak of war had been expected since the French alliance with the United States, Feb. 6 (q.v.).

In answer to the letter of the British peace commissioners (see Je 9), congress by unanimous voice declares: 'Nothing but an earnest desire to spare the further effusion of human blood could have induced them to read a paper containing expressions so disrespectful to his most Christian majesty, the good and great ally of these states, or to consider propositions so derogatory to the honor of an independent nation.'

'The Acts of the British parliament, the commission from your sovereign, and your letter, suppose this people of these states to be subjects of the crown of Great Britain, and are founded on the idea of dependence, which is utterly inadmissible.'

I am further directed to inform your excellencies, that Congress are inclined to peace, notwithstanding the unjust claims from which this war originated, and the savage manner in which it hath been conducted. They will, therefore, be ready to enter upon the consideration of a treaty of peace and commerce not consistent with treaties already subsisting, when the King of Great Britain shall demonstrate a sincere disposition for that purpose. The only solid proof of this disposition, will be an explicit acknowledgment of the independence of these states, or withdrawing his fleets and armies.'—Jour. of Cong. (Ford ed.), XI: 615. A poem on the commissioners' 'Peace Offerings' was published subsequently, the closing lines of which read: 'Our Birth rights which our God to us did give
We can't give up while we have Life to breathe.
Our Faith we've pledge'd with France, henceforth no more.'

Shall we ask Favors from the British shore.

Take all the dastard Tories; none but God Shall bind us in all Cases by his Word.
Tell your perfidious King soon as you please,
That Yankee's won't accept such Terms as these.'—Boston Gaz. Je 21, 1778.

The following order is found among the general orders of the British army issued from headquarters at Haddensfield: 'The Women of the Army are constantly to march upon the flanks of the Baggage of their respective Corps, and the Provost Martial has received positive Orders to Drum out any Woman who shall dare to disobey this order.'—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1831), 595. For other references to the women of the British army, see ibid., 596, 598.

The city watch, which was established soon after the King's Troops took Possession of New-York, is complimented in orders from headquarters. The 'inferior Officers, Artificers, Labouers etc. employed in the various Branches of his Majesty's Service June (whose Duty will permit of it) are required in the Share of the City Watch.'—N. Y. Merc., Jl 18, 1778; Man. Com. Coun. (1865), 660.

Kemble records: 'The Troops expected daily from Philadelphia. The Hospital crowded with about six hundred sick and Wounded, but most of the former.'—Kemble's Jour., 152.

Kemble records that there are 'two Battalions of Delancy's on Long Island, to hold themselves in readiness to Embark, and two Battalions of Anspach arrived from Philadelphia.'—Kemble's Jour., 152.

Congress, at York (see S 20, 1777), adjourns to Philadelphia.—Jour. of Cong., II: 610, 616. The first session there was held on July 2, and adjourned from day to day until July 7, when business was again transacted.—Ibid., II: 616.

The battle of Monmouth occurs, the 'last general engagement fought on Northern soil' during the Revolution. Clinton, after evacuating Philadelphia (see Je 18), retreated across New Jersey toward New York. Washington followed, in an attempt to capture or destroy the British army, but his plans were frustrated by Gen. Lee, who disobeyed his orders to attack the enemy at a crucial moment in the vicinity of Monmouth court-house.—Winsor, VI: 397-400; Fish, Hist. & Lit. Essays, essay on 'Charles Lee.' Under date of July 11, Smith writes in his diary: 'Lee under an arrest—for not attacking according to Orders—retreating unnecessarily & for dispersing troops to WashAGO.'—Wm. Smith Arch. (MS.), under Je 28. Kemble records details of the action, with a 'Return of Killed, Wounded, & Missing.' The British loss was 299, of whom 56 died of severe heat of the Weather.'—Kemble's Jour., 154. See Jl 20.

 Holt prints in the Journal a letter to Lord North signed by William Smith, which reads: 'My duty to the King, and the melancholy state of his affairs on this Continent, command me to deal plainly and truly with your Lordship. The overthrow and capture of Gen. Burgoyne and all his army, has inspired the base rebels of this country to such a degree of insolence; that they are determined to attack Gen. Howe in Philadelphia. In short, my Lord, if France enters into treaty with the rebels, I am afraid America will be forever lost to Great Britain; to prevent which permit me, my Lord, to say, that I think the only means left are to cede to France forever:

1. All Canada, in the state she possessed it before the late war.
2. To give up Cape Breton and St. Johns, with their dependencies.
3. To cede to them Nova Scotia.
4. A right to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, as possessed by them before the treaty of Paris..
5. In consideration of those concessions, France on her part.
6. To cease all connection, correspondence, & commerce with the rebel colonies.
7. To call home all her subjects, that are now in actual service of the rebels, and prevent them in future.
8. To assist G. Britain with a corps of 12,000 auxiliary troops, to be employed in the service of Great Britain, with the British Army, in order to reduce the rebels to obedience.
9. The honour I have of being one of his Majesty's council as well as duty and gratitude, have all called on me to give you the best advice for his Majesty's service in my power, in this dreadful situation of the King's affairs here, which are such as require some Genl. to be made.'—N. Y. Gaz. (New London), Jl 3, 1778. In his diary Smith declared this letter a 'wicked Forgery,' and penned this record: 'Wrote a Letter to London to defeat the Design of the Forgery in Holt.'—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), Jl 1 and 2, 1781. In a later issue of the Journal the letter was branded by Smith as a forgery.—N. Y. Jour., Jl 27, 1781.

The legislature of the state of New York passes a banishment act against Tories, entitled 'An Act more effectually to prevent the Mischiefs arising from the Influence and Example of Persons of equivocal and suspected Characters in this State.' It requires that, on the refusal of such persons to take an oath of allegiance before 'the Commissioners appointed for inquiring into, detecting and defeating all Conspiracies,' they shall be removed 'to any Place where the Enemy's Lines.' If they fail to appear within 21 days, they shall be adjudged, upon conviction, when loused, to be guilty of 'Misprision of Treason,' and their lands shall be charged with double taxes.—Laws of N. T., 1st sess. chap. 47 (Gaine ed., 1789, I: 30). A probable origin of this legislative measure is given by Wm. Smith in his diary: "The popular Zealots have lately been sanguine. They are elevated by the Report that the British army have evacuated Pennsylvania and that Arnold is in Possession of it—They probably imagine that such [as] have not joined them may in the moment of Despoyndence be induced to it."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), III, under Jl 3. Regarding the banishment of Tories, see Winsor, VII: 201.

A list of the receiving sentence of banishment, which includes the name of "William Smith, Esq. [see Jl 3], one of the members of the late Council of the King of Great Britain for this State," is preserved in the secretaries office.—Mag. Am. Hist., June, 1881, pp. 428, 433. See, however, My 4, 1780.

Maj. John André, having recorded in his daily journal an account of the withdrawal of the British troops under Sir Henry Clinton from Philadelphia through New Jersey to New York, concludes his report with the arrival in the city on this date (it is probably this date André meant when he wrote "June 31") of the "Guards Hessians and Cavalry." He says: "Thus was completed a March of many miles thro' the Enemy's country in defiance of every obstacle they threatened or attempted to throw in our path by every possible means to hinder and pursuing them at Freeman's [Monmouth—see Jl 28] that a superiority both of skill and powers was shewn; but throughout the march they were perplexed in their conjectures by the secrecy observed respecting our route and by false movements made to deceive them; neither could their Militia or Light Troops with their boasted knowledge of the country and dexterity in hovering round us, find an opportunity to give the least opposition of eight miles in length.

André's Jour., from the manuscript in the library of Wm. K. Bixby, St. Louis, ed. by Henry Cabot Lodge (pub. by the Bibliophile Society, Boston, 1903), II: 16-17.

In this month, John Wilson, ensign of the 71st Regt. and assistant-engineer of the British army, drew a topographical plan of the upper end of "The Island of New York from Horn's Hook to the Point of Ferguson Bridge from a Survey in July 1778..."—See facsimile reproduction in André's Jour., ed. by Henry C. Lodge (Boston, The Bibliophile Soc., 1903), II: following p. 50.

On July 1, 2, and 3, the British, embarking at "the Hook," landed the 1st. and 2d. Brigades upon Staten Island; 3d. 4th., and 5th. New Utrecht, Long Island; the rest of the Army upon New York Island.—Kemble's Jour., 154.

In accordance with the act of June 30 (q.v.), Wm. Smith receives an order to appear at Poughkeepsie before the commissioners for detecting conspiracies, to take the oath of allegiance. On the same day he wrote in his diary that he did not intend to take the oath, and added: "I shall imitate the Conduct of Metelus Numidicus. I shall refuse to be banished from the United States in order to Oath contributed to his Honor. Of this I am clear that my Submission to it would not only wound my Innocence but disgrace my Character. What shallow Policy! The Act will turn the distressed Exiles into bitter Enemies, such as take it [the oath] for Force will be less friendly than if it had not been tendered. It is oppressive & impolitic."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), III.

Smith appeared before the commissioners on July 6 and refused to take the oath.—Ibid., V, Supplement. He came to New York City in August (see Ag 26).

"The number of deserters, chiefly Hessians, who have left the British army since they left this city [Philadelphia—see Jl 18], amounts to upwards of 1500.

We hear that the British troops now in New-York, are preparing to evacuate that city, and that the whole of the troops now on the Continent, will soon be drawn off to Britain or the West-Indies.

When Sir William Howe, General Burgoyne, and Sir Henry Clinton embarked for America in the year 1775, the following lines appeared in a London Paper:

Behold! the Cerberus the Atlantic plough,
'Her precious cargo—Clifton—Burgoyne—Howe.'

Bow—Bow—Bow!

"We leave it to our readers to determine, whether those military 'dogs of war' have done any thing but bark ever since they came to America."—Penn. Packet, Jl 4, 1778.

A reward is offered for the return to John Bouwer's "English Tavern," at the 4-mile stone, of a "black sprig'd Sattin Clock."—Royal Gaz., Jl 4, 1778. The 4-mile stone stood on the north side of the present 46th St, west of Third Ave. The "English Tavern" was a place of resort, as we know, since they came to America.

Sir Henry Clinton, "Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Forces in North-America," arrives in New York from Philadelphia (see Jl 18)—N. Y. Merc., Jl 6, 1778.

The British army establishes headquarters at Sandy Hook, where its march is completed, and orders are issued for the disposition of the troops. Those assigned to Manhattan Island in the orders of this day are the "16th. and 17th. Dragoons, and the three Provincial Troops, the Guards, Queen's Rangers, Flank Companies of 2d., 43d., and Marines, and all the Hessian Corps."—Order-book, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1885), 603.

A letter from Poughkeepsie states that Samuel Brosome has donated $1000 to Mr. Jay for the distressed prisoners confined at New-York;" and that the governor of the state has undertaken "to transact this business," as soon as military operations "will admit of any communication with the enemy." All intercourse with them has been suspended "for several months."—N. Y. Jour., Jl 6, 1778.

The king's commissioners having arrived in New York "last week" (cf. Jl 3), with power to appoint governors, Tryon writes to Germain asking that he may be recalled.—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 747. The request was refused.—Ibid., VIII: 749.

Capt. Archibald Robertson is "Employ'd in making a sketch of the Attack at Monmouth [see Jl 28] to be sent home by the Governor's Private of the Campaign 1778 (M.S.)." He made a second sketch later (see O 24).

Montresor accompanies Sir Henry Clinton and the general officers to the Narrows, both on Staten and Long Islands, and explains a project of his "for defending that Pass, for preventing an Enemy's Fleet passing to New York."—Montresor's Jour., 504.

Washington, writing to Gov. Clinton from headquarters at Paramus, says, in part: "By the latest accounts from New York it does not seem possible that the Enemy will operate anywhere suddenly; They have been much harassed and deranged by their march thro' Jersey, and are at present encamped upon Long, Staten and York Islands.

We have this day a rumor that a French Fleet has been seen off the Coast, and that the English is preparing to sail from New York in pursuit of them. But it is but a rumor."—From Letters of Geo. Washington to Geo. and Jas. Clinton, 18.

Kemble records: "The Count D'Estaing, with 13 Ships of the Line, came to Anchor off the Hook; our Fleet under Lord Howe drawn up within the Hook to receive them."—Kemble's Jour., 155. Montresor states that the French fleet consisted of "11 Ships of the Line and 3 Frigates," and that of our Fishing Boats.—Montresor's Jour., 504; and foot-note, showing list of the Toulen fleet off Sandy Hook under command of Count D'Estaing. See also Robertson's Private Jour. of the Campaign 1778 (M.S.). A carefully executed sepia drawing of the French fleet lying off Sandy Hook, drawn by Ozanne, the official French artist attached to the fleet, is preserved in the Library of Congress with 21 other drawings by the same artist showing the fleet in various American ports. These drawings were bought in Paris in 1911 by the author.

Several letters passed between Lafayette and the admiral while his fleet was anchored off Sandy Hook.—Doniol, Correspondance inédite de La Fayette avec Le Comte D'Estaing (1892). For an account of the movements of the French fleet during this and the following year, see Plutarch, "Etats-critiques des operations de Flamil D'Estaing aux Eats-Unis et aux Antilles (1779-1779)," in Bulletin Historique et Scientifique de L'Auvergne, Sept. 1921, and succeeding issues.

Clinton, and the British commissioners, Carlisle, Eden, and Johnstone, at New York, address the following letter to the continental congress: "We received soon after our arrival at this place, your answer [see Jl 17] to our letter [see Jl 9],... and are sorry to find on your part any difficulties raised which must prolong the calamities of the present war.

"You propose to us as matter of choice or other of two alternatives, which you state as preliminaries necessary even to the beginning of a negotiation for peace to this empire.

"One is an explicit acknowledgement of the independence of their office at the battery on the side, their masts and gunports.

It is therefore more than probable that the destruction which the emisaries of Britain had concerted for the free and independent sons of America, will, ere long, fall with tenfold misery upon their own heads.—Ibid. Montresor records that the French fleet has already taken "Eleven sail of our (British) vessels on entry to the port of New York."—Montresor's Jour., July 506. André records the capture of a still larger number (see Jl 22).

"At 4 o'clock this morning Sir Henry Clinton went from New York down to Lord Howe at Sandy Hook."—Montresor's Jour., July 504.

Von Kraft records in his journal: "I was sent with one Coral and 18 privates a distance of 3 English miles from our camp to Yorck on watch on the road at a place called Tortellsey [Turtle Bay] to guard three powder-magazines. Never until then did I eat so much in six days, and only at this place. A very pleasant place."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1882), 54.

Encouragement is offered to win recruits to the "Roman Catholic Volunteers." The recruiting stations are at "No. 51, in Cherry street, near the Ship Yards," and at an encampment "at Yellow-Hook."—N. T. Misc., Jl 13, 1778. It appears by this that the British military authorities disregarded the provincial statute which supposed Edel's, Catholics and other Catholics unfit for service.

"The French Fleet [is] still at Anchor & taking a good many 16 Ships bound for this Port [New York]."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Sir Henry Clinton changes his headquarters from the Narrows to New York.—Montresor's Jour., 505.

"By a person who came out of New York last Saturday, we are informed the tories were in the greatest consternation.—Their Incendies had quite vanished—and now they begin to send toast and batter to the prisoners by way of making fair weather for themselves against our army takes possession of that city, which time is near at hand."—Penn Packet, Jl 16, 1778.

"This day the 1st. Brigade and 2d. Battalion 71st. were brought from Staten Island, the 71st. to proceed to Kings Bridge, the 1st. Brigade to occupy Gowanus Pass. We were now on the Island: 10th. regiment, 47th. 27th. and 49th. 52d. 45th. 71st. Regiments, 13 Battalions Hessians, Queen's Rangers, 2d. Brigade Delancey's and Robinson's Provincial's in the whole about 9,000 fit for Duty."—Kemble's Jour., 1756; see also Montresor's Jour., 505.

Smith writes in his diary: "The Confidence of the Whigs is at its highest Elevation if we were to judge from their Words—but I impute this... Language to Fear in the Leaders of a Rising of the People—Great Pains are taken to render it credible that the British lost in Jersey is 3000 and that a French Fleet & 12000 Troops are arrived in Delaware & the Kings Army leaving NY. for Halifax. Yet melancholy Truths slip out which the Whigs affect to disbelieve—The advance of an army to Fort Stanwix—The cutting off of Wyoming by Indians. ...The Assembly of an army at Ticconderoga—That the Loss in Jersey was Trifling & no Victory—See Washington's & Lee's Letters in Loudon's Paper of yesterday. Many suspect that the fleet said to be in Delaware on the 12 Ins & gone to Sandy Hook is an English one—See Franklin & Adam's Letters dated at Paris 18 May advising of 11 Ships of the Line [see Jl 22] ready to sail for America. ..."—Wm. Smith MSS., folio 195. Private letter. For a report of the convention of the 7th. Delaware there is blocked by the French fleet: "If the French fleet should preserve its present station, a famine must, I think (and very soon) ensue in the enemy's army, as all their supplies must be cut off. Nothing but rice, instead of bread or flour, has been dealt out to the soldiers since their arrival in New York. A loaf of bread that used to cost 4 d. now sells in the city for a dollar. In short, it appears to me, not at all impossible, that if they should be thus kept hem'd in on the sea and land side, they will be reduced to the necessity of surrendering the city in less than a month, without any enterprise of General Washington against them."—Penn Packet (Phila.), Jl 25, 1778. In the same paper it is reported that Washington has crossed the North River to unite with Gates above Kingbridge. "Thus are the enemies of America surrounded on all sides, by the forces of the magnanimous and Most Christian King, and the virtuous citizens of America. It is therefore more than probable that the destruction which the emisaries of Britain had concerted for the free and independent sons of America, will, ere long, fall with tenfold misery upon their own heads.—Ibid. Montresor records that the French fleet has already taken "Eleven sail of our (British) vessels on entry to the port of New York."—Montresor's Jour., July 506. André records the capture of a still larger number (see Jl 22).

Smith says there are many negroes in Washington's army: "they mix, march, mess & sleep with the Whites." The soldiers complain of a "want of Pay." Many are "in Rags without Shoes & Stockings" and "wish the war ended."—Wm. Smith's MSS., folio 195.

Sir Charles Blagden, an officer in the British hospital service, writes from New York to Sir John Hopkins: "In the affair of the
A GENERAL PEACE.

NEW-YORK, March 25, 1783.

LATE last Night, an EXPRESS from New-Jersey, brought the following Account.

THAT on Sunday last, the Twenty-Third Instant, a Vessel arrived at Philadelphia, in Thirty-five Days from Cadiz, with Dispatches to the Continental Congress, informing them, that on Monday the Twentieth Day of January, the Preliminaries to

A GENERAL PEACE,

Between Great-Britain, France, Spain, Holland, and the United States of America, were signed at Paris, by all the Commissioners from those Powers; in consequence of which, Hostilities, by Sea and Land, were to cease in Europe, on Wednesday the Twentieth Day of February; and in America, on Thursday the Twentieth Day of March, in the present Year One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty-Three.

THIS very important Intelligence was last Night announced by the Firing of Cannon, and great Rejoicings at Elizabeth-Town.---Respecting the Particulars of this truly Interesting Event no more are yet received, but they are hourly expected.

July 28th of June [q.v.] we lost upon the whole between three & four hundred men & about the same number had deserted during our first three weeks' march.-"Reported..." (22)

23 The next day the French fleet sailed from Toulon, and we had 900 men out in pursuit of them, but lay all asleep at Spithed. From the original letter in the N. Y. P. L. printed in Library Bull. (1903), 422-24.

Lord Carlisle writes from New York to Lady Carlisle: "The common people hate us in their hearts. ... Formerly, when things went better for us, there was an appearance of friendship, but now the contrary seems to be the case; but no sooner was our situation the least altered for the worse, but these friends were the first to fire on us; and many were taken with their pardons in their pockets."—Trelvery, The Am. Revolution, III: 404.

The French fleet, which has been lying off Sandy Hook since the 11th inst., weights anchor and sails for Rhode Island, as recorded in the military journal of Maj. John Adams, which says: "Finding the French ships at anchor, they landed a considerable body of men in Shrewsbury River and took in water. They captured about twenty sail of trading vessels and one or two sloops of war, an object of no consequence, compared with the expectations they might have."—André's Jour., 17-18; see also Montresor's Jour., 506; and Kemble's Jour., 156.

Channing says that during the eleven days the French had been "busily engaged in sounding the channels leading over the bar. ... Suddenly, on July 22, when the depth of water on the outer bar rose to thirty feet—ample for the passage of the biggest French line—D'Estaing stood out to sea. ... Treachery or unwillingness of pilots has always been alleged as the reason for this sudden turnabout; but the necessity of keeping his fleet intact, or possibly some knowledge of the approach of Commodore Byron, may have impelled him to this action."—Channing, Hist. of U. S., III: 298-99.

A recent French treatise, Étude critique des opérations de l'amiral d'Estaing aux États-Unis et aux Antilles (1778-1779), by Col. Phylle, defends the admiral thus: "D'Estaing préoccupa immédiatement de faire rechercher des pilotes et de faire reconnaître les pas conduisant dans la rade intérieure. Ces passages, situés entre New-Jersey et l'Île Long Island, sont autant de quatre; mais une seule est accessible aux navires. Les pilotes consultés prétendaient que la passe en question ne pouvait être utilisée par les vaisseaux de 74 canons. En vain, d'Estaing insista; en vain, promit-il cent cinquante mille francs au pilote qui ferait passer l'escadre. Tous refusèrent. L'amertume au cœur, d'Estaing dut renoncer à son projet. "Il semble que d'Estaing se soit heurté dans cette affaire à la mauvaise volonté des pilotes américains. ... Les concours des pilotes du pays était donc absolument indisponible; or, il semble que la plupart de ces pilotes aient voulu nous refuser l'occasion de remporter des succès, soit que certains d'entre eux fussent accrétement à la solde des Anglais, soit par jalousie de race."—Bulletin Historique et Scientifique de L'Amérique (O, 1901), 200.

Kemble avers that "want of Water may have induced Count D'Estaing to leave His position without the Hook, as well as having Effected his present business, the Opening Southern Ports, and taking the Tobacco Trade under his Convoy, which may, by this time, he prepared and ready to Sail. If Mr. Byron is near, he [D'Estaing] never will venture himself in Rhode Island."—Kemble's Jour. 1777. On the 24th, the French fleet was said to have been seen "off the Delawar."—Ibid. Its destination, however, was Rhode Island.—See Ag 6.

Lieut. Von Krafk describes a section of the country near Kingsbridge (evidently on Manhattan Island): "We lost our way in the woods and arrived at some huts, in which and in the adjoining little gardens many things, but no people were to be seen or heard. Presumably it all belonged to negroes. We left everything untouched."—July 28th (23)

40 It is announced that the Bathing Machine is "ready at the North River, behind Mr. Harrison's Brewhousd, when [where] Attendance will be given every Morning during the Summer Season."—Royal Gas., Ag 1, 1778. The first mention of this machine was on April 18 (q.v.), though apparently in another location.

Another large fire occurs in New York. The following is the first newspaper report of it: "About 1 o'clock this morning, a most dreadful Fire broke out, in the Store of Mr. Jones, Ship Chandler, on Cruger's Wharf [now Front St.], in this City, which, notwithstanding the utmost Efforts of the Nivey, Army and Inhabitants, soon consumed all the Buildings on the East, South, and West End of said Wharf, and every House on the South Side of Little Dock Street. The Street being narrow, the Flames soon communicated to the North Side of Little-Dock-Street, and consumed the whole (five Houses excepted) at the W. End. The Fire soon caught the Back Buildings in Dock-street [now Pearl St], and burnt every House to the East of Isaac Low's so far as the Great Old-Slip, and three opposite the Slip. Mr. Low's House, the not burnt entirely, is greatly damaged, as well as that next to it on the West. The Loss . . . is great, there being no less than 64 Dwelling Houses, besides Stores, consumed.

... two small Vessels burnt, but . . no lives . . lost. . . .

"Col. Coburn and the Officers and Men of the 53rd Regiment were among the first of the Military that attended the fire, and they, with the other Gentlemen of the Army gave their Assistance during the whole time."—N. Y. Merc., Ag 3, 1778. The account in the Royal Gaz. of Aug. 5, is the same as this, excepting that, in place of "the Store of Mr. Jones, Ship Chandler" is substituted "the House of Mr. Stewart." See, however, Ag 7.

Kemble states in his journal that the fire broke out "near the Shews, and consumed all the block of Houses and Stores between that and Mr. Isaac Low's, with some King's Stores, Provincial Clothing, &c."—Kemble's Jour., 158. The quartermaster-general's store-house was one of these.—N. Y. Col. Doc., VIII: 775. Provision and bake-houses were among those burned. A few suspected persons, including Frenchmen, were arrested.—Van Kruiff's Jour., in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1884), 101. The building where the fire broke out was "on the Dock near the Old Slip Market." Three topsail vessels, besides the store-houses, were burnt. The total loss is supposed to be £250,000.—Montresor's Jour., 508. Another report stated that "it consumed all the houses between 'Countries' and the 'Old Slip Market,' from the water-side to Dock [Pearl] Street."—N. Y. Jour., Ag 24, 1778.

The owners' names, and the number of houses owned by each that were burned, were published a week later. Col. Wm. Bayard, who lost several houses in the fire of 1776, lost six in this, the income of which was £520 a year.—N. Y. Merc., Ag 10, 1778. One of the heaviest losers was Peter "Meyffer" (Meier). He and his relatives, in the last 23 months, have lost 15 houses and stores, "some of them large and elegant Buildings."—N. Y. Merc., Ag 17, 1778. A letter of Mrs. Rachel White, a White Plains refugee (who has a brother aide-de-camp to Gen. Clinton), who saw the fire, states that "it began in a house filled with King's stores—68 houses consumed and a vast quantity of stores, amongst which 30,000 blankets or pairs of blankets, . . . 10,000 suits of cloaths, and a great deal of provisions, computed at four weeks supply. . . .—Penn. Packet, Ag 15, 1778.

Mayor David Mathews, who did service at the fire, was dangerously wounded, but recovered.—Ibid., Ag 16, 1778.

See the plan of the city, drawn and described by David Grim, showing the locality and course of this fire (and also that of 1776), owned by the N. Y. H. S., and reproduced in Man. Com. Coun. (1866), opp. p. 766. He states: "The cause of so many houses being burnt in this time was the Military Officers taking the ordering and directions of this fire from the firemen. The citizens complained thereof, to the Commander-in-Chief, Who immediately gave general orders that in future, No Military man should interfere with any fire that may happen in the City, and leave the extinguishing thereof to the entire directions of the firemen and inhabitants."—Ibid., 766.

In the correspondence having gone to New York and formed his lines, "with the left on the Hudson and the right on the East river, about a mile in front of the city," Von Elking writes: "The mob had again set fire to many of the best houses and churches, while the garrison was quartered in other churches, and in Fort St. George and in wooden barracks. The party feeling ran high in the city; its civil government was in loyal hands, and the Germans found evidences of luxury and hospitality in the well-furnished houses on Queen and Water street, where the rich merchants then lived." The city was divided into seven sections, and a mayor, with seven councillors and seven aldermen—loyalists, of course—had charge of the civil government. Many of the citizens were supplied with arms and employed as militia, to guard the city.—The German Allied Troops in the North American War, 54.

A London news item, on Oct. 15, stated: "The Fire which has happened at New-York was foreseen by several Merchants in London, who as soon as they had Advice of Clinton's Return to New-York from Philadelphia, immediately insured their Goods there from Fire. The Premium given on this Account, for three Months was Five Guineas per Cent."—St. James's Chron., O 13-15, 1778. A New York letter which reached England in November stated that "14,000 Suits of Clothes and 30,000 Stand of Arms were destroyed in the Fire."—Ibid., N 19-22, 1778.

The British ordnance slop "Morning Star," lying "off the Coffee House in the East River," with 248 barrels of gunpowder on board, blew up. It is supposed to have been struck by lightning. Considerable damage is done to windows and the roofs of houses, and many people are knocked down by the shock.—N. Y. Merc., Ag 10, 1778. Dunlap published in Hist. of the New Netherlands, 2d Ed., CCCXXV ed. 1st, the letter of an old man (dated 1816) giving interesting details of this occurrence. See also Robertson's Jour. (M. S.). See also Ag 7.

A "Gentleman high in Office at New-York" writes to a correspondent in London: "The Conciliatory Bills [see F 19 and Ap 15] have been productive of great Evils, and lost us Opportunities not again to be expected. . . . I am astonished that Ministry could have many Expectations from the Mercantile Men, acquainted, as they must have been, of D'Estaing's Destination, and the Appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary from France to Congress. In short, there is no Alternative but Conquest, or avowing absolute Independence, and we dare the Evacuation of Philadelphia will be followed by that of New-York.

"We have been informed that the Midst of this Distress, and the Dread of Famine coming upon us, by the miraculous Arrival of the Cock Fleet, . . . which escaped the greatest Risk of being taken and converted to Mr. Washington's Use. . . . They are safe now in the East River, and come very opportune to supply several Sorts of Provisions, which were entirely deficient."—St. James's Chron., O 20-22, 1778. Regarding conditions in New York, see also letter in N. Y. Jour. (Poughkeepsie), Ag 10, 1778.

Moniteur Gérard, ambassador from France, the first from any nation, is introduced to congress.—Jour. of Cong., III: 6.

"Arrived this evening an Express from Major General Pigot from Rhode Island to Sir Henry Clinton dated the 3rd and that (sic) he was invested by the French Fleet and 30,000 Rebels and expected the Rebels would open their Batteries against him, on this day. Lord Hood arrived here, and we have a good anchorage again [see Ag 2] and proceeded with a fair wind to attack the French Fleet at Rhode Island."—Montresor's Jour., 508. See also Kemble's Jour., 159.

This date is found on one of the finest of Archibald Robertson's drawings, entitled "New York from Brooklyn Heights." This beautiful sepia drawing, and the one made from Mt. Pitt and bearing the date April 11, 1778 (q.v.), probably never belonged to the series described under July 12 (q.v.); they were separately purchased by the author some time before the portfolio collection was found and are of somewhat larger size. When found these two drawings were mounted on strainers, and framed. See Frontispiece, Vol. V.

For the safety of the city and shipping, Maj.-Gen. Jones issues an order requiring that vessels shall not be near any wharf without permit from the superintendent of the port, and then only to load and unload, and with anchor astern, "to be able to haul off immediately when ordered, or in case of fire."—N. Y. Merc., Ag 24, 1778.

In an open letter, John Stewart publishes a contradiction of a statement, which John Jones printed in Robertson's Gen. of Aug. 4, that the fire of Aug. 3 (q.v.) originated in Stewart's house. In support of this contention, he publishes the following order from the provost-marshal's aide-de-camp: "John Stewart having been confined in the Provost at his own Request, until it could be proved that the Fire was not occasioned by any Neglect of his; it appearing that the Fire did not begin at his House, he is discharged by the General's order."—Royal Gen., Ag 8, 1778.

(MS.).

13 The Penn. Packet prints a "genuine copy of an Advertisement lately printed, and pasted up in New-York, at all the public places in the city." The advertisement reads: "To be Sold at Private Sale; The British Rights in America consisting of, amongst other articles, The Thirteen Provinces now in Rebellion, which Britain, in the hour of her insolvency, attempted to subdue; the reversion of the government of Quebec, Nova-Scotia, Newfoundland, East and West Florida; the territory of the Hudson’s Bay Company; a respectable body of his Majesty’s troops, and a considerable part of the royal navy, together with all the loyal subjects of America."—Penn. Packet, Ag 13, 1778.

14 A proclamation is issued by Maj.-Gen. Jones, offering a reward of 100 guineas for the discovery of the incendiaries who, it is believed, started the recent fire. If the informer is an accomplice, the commander-in-chief offers him a pardon for his crime. "It is reported that a Man suspected to have been concerned, being pursued, was wounded in the Back with a Bayonet, immediately after the Fire broke out."—N. Y. Merc., Ag 15, 1778; Mass. Com. Coun. (1863), 661. ibid. (1866), 753. The next day, John C. Knapp, offered reward of 20 guineas on the same conditions.—Royal Gaz., Ag 22, 1778.

15 "Our Fleet [British] came to Sandy Hook had received some damage the Appolo Frigate was entirely Dismasted L. Howe was on board of her—Two of the French Fleet were Dismasted—The Iris 50 engaged their Rear Adm in a 74 & made her steer off—Two others of our 50’s were a little engaged—The French Fleet came to an Anchor off the Mouth of the Delaware."—Robertson’s Jour. (MS.). "Commodore Hotham also fell in with another 74 French Ship dismasted, and would have taken if some of his Squadron had not appeared to rescue him."—Kemble’s Jour., 160.

18 "The Battalion American Loyalists [of New York] embarked on board of transports from Flushing."—Montresor’s Jour., 310. On the 20th, they were ordered to disembark "and take up their old Ground."—Ibid.

This is recorded on one of Archibald Robertson’s drawings (No. 42—see JL 12, 1776), entitled "Kepp’s Bay 17th Aug 1778, where the Troops landed 17th Sept 1776."—Phoenix 44, Capt. H Parker Roebuck 44, Hammonds, Carisford 28. Finisham Aug. [2], Rose 20, J. Walton.

"All our fleet assembled at the Hook preparing to go to Sea as soon as possible."—Kemble’s Jour., 160.

Kemble records a report that "the French fleet left all their Troops upon Conanicut Island in Rhode Island Harbour, said to be about 2,000 under Command of the Marquis De Lafayette;" and he adds: "All this time our Army lays idle."—Kemble’s Jour., 160. He records on Aug. 24 a report that, on Aug. 21, "the French fleet [was] still in the Offing, but had not entered the Harbour of Rhode Island."—Ibid., 161.

"The general calculation made of the sick in our Military Hospitals [N. Y. City] is that seven men die out of every hundred." This is due to the season of the year, when the number of patients increases.—Montresor’s Jour., 318.

"The Experiment," a British ship of 50 guns, having been chased from sea by some of the French fleet, arrives through the Sound. In consequence Sir Henry Clinton went from hence to Lord Howe at Sandy Hook."—Ibid.

Inhabitants of New York and vicinity are cautioned not to purchase "any articles of clothing, furniture, or any part of the appointments or necessaries of a soldier." They are subject to fine or imprisonment for doing so.—Royal Gaz., Ag 22, 1778.

Two British fire-ships are sent from New York to Sandy Hook.—Montresor’s Jour., 511.

Deserters from the Americans come daily to New York.—Ibid.

Kemble records: "Went down to the Hook and Dined on board Commodore Hotham’s, with a number of Captains of the War, whose Unanimity and Confidence in Lord Howe is most pleasing, who they talk of as the best Officer ever known."—Kemble’s Jour., 160.

"Lord Howe sailed out of the Hook with his fleet and Anchored about six or eight Miles off; in the Evening the Experiment joined them, who had Sailed about eight days before for Rhode Island, but was chased on her arrival by a Horse by three 74 Gun French Ships, and obliged to come thro’ the Sound, and was the first 50 Gun Ship ever known to come through Hell Gate."—Kemble’s Jour., 160. Possibly this event is depicted in A. Pl. 7b, Vol. III.

There was a skirmish this morning "between Emmerick’s Chasseurs and some Indians and Rebels dressed like them near King’s bridge—9 wounded and 2 taken—we had 2 men wounded."—Montresor’s Jour., 511.

Two sloops arrive at New York, "as Flags of Truce," loaded with "Inhabitants from the country that have refused the Test Oath."—Ibid.

An item of Boston news states: "By a gentleman who has been some time a prisoner at New-York, but left that place about a fortnight since, he learns, that all the additional prisoners were at last sent out of the city; not from motives of generosity, but because the enemy found it difficult to subsist them there in their present situation, and because under the apprehensions they are now in, of an attempt to dislodge them from that place, they thought themselves safer without such a body of Americans among them, though unarmed and confined. . . . According to the account of this gentleman as well as that of others, though the severe treatment of our prisoners has been lately mitigated, it has yet to the last been hard; sick and well have been crowded together, and no difference allowed respecting rank, while the French have been treated in another manner; particular attention having been paid to their rank, and compliance shewn them in many instances. . . . Upon the appearance of the French fleet at the Hook, the French and American prisoners discovered their joy as far as they dared, but every countenance in New-York, friendly to the British cause was appalled. The merchants were solicitous to turn their goods into money at any rate, or to conceal them, or to exchange them for the least bulky and most portable articles. The heavy cannon, and other things were already embarded, and the transports had taken on board provisions, and were wooded and watered for three months. . . .

"The enemy now freely acknowledge that the tables are turned, and they put on the offensive and have nothing to do but to provide for their own safety at every quarter, in the best manner they can."—N. Y. Jour. (Poughkeepsie), 3, 5, 1778.

This evening arrived the fleet of Victuallers from Cork in most excellent condition. His army [at New York] had but 7 weeks provi- sions left, and this fleet had been at Reddy Island in Delaware river, in a mistake not having been informed of our evacuating Philadelphia though they left Cork so late as the 31st March."—Ibid.

Kemble is informed that the French fleet has left Rhode Island, and is supposed to have gone to Boston. He adds "One Battalion Grenadiers [1st], one of Light Infantry (1st.), and 3d and 4th Brigades Marched this day from Bedford towards Flushing, under Command of General Grey, supposed to Embark there for Rhode Island. Sir Henry Clinton went this day to Flushing, . . ."—Kemble's Jour., 161. See Ag 30.

William Smith continues his diary under this date in a new book, Vol. VI. He heads it "New York Bowery at Mr. Stuyvesant's," and then gives an account of his trip from Livingston Manor, which he left on July 31. Stops were made at "Poughkeepsing" (Poughkeepsie), Fishkill, and Haverstraw. At Fishkill he was given over "to the Care of L Col. Burr an officer . . . from General Washington to conduct the Flag to N. York." He gives a description of the fortifications along the river shore between "Poughkeepsie" and Haverstraw at which place he spent the 7 & 8th Aug in making my Effects and imbedded Sunday the 9th. Came to that Night below Dobbs Ferry which is now poss'd by the Continental Troops, in Sight of the Ships lying near Spuyten-Divyl.—We fell down to them in the Morning & were ordered to anchor a Head of the Swift Ship of War & soon after visited by an Officer who took Cap Rindmond on Board & forbids us to proceed till we had the Advertisement. I went down in the Ship's Boat with a L. & Mr. Colden & reached the Town about Noon Monday 10th."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI. See Ag 11.

During the pre-Revolutionary excitement Smith deprecated the unreasonable views held by king and parliament on the taxa- tion of the colonies; likewise he condemned the idle fester with the violence of the colonists, and working tirelessly for conciliation (see J. 5, 1775). Any one taking such an intermediate position in time of war is readily maligned, and Smith was char- acterized by a London paper (see Ji 15, 1776) as one of a number of "American informers" who have deceived Lord North. When it became necessary for him to take sides, he declared to the council of safety which questioned him "that he did not conceive himself disfrached from his oaths of fidelity to the crown." Thereupon, he was ordered "to be confined within the manor of Livingston" (see J. 3, 1777), where he remained until his return to New York at this date.

Smith's diary, from this time until the close of the war is a most valuable manuscript source, and copious material from it is pub- lished for the first time in this Chronology. Smith was intimate with the British official family. Sometimes "dining at Headquarters," again "walking with the Gent at the Battery," often called on for advice, frequently requested to draft letters or proclama- tions, at all times he recorded his characterizations of men and events with the utmost frankness. Appointed to the office of chief-justice (see My 4, 1779) at a time when visions of displacing the British government by a civil war were entertained, he never actually served in that capacity because the change to civil government was never made. He was one of the British embassy to confer with Washington concerning Andre's case (see S 30, 1780). He assisted Benedict Arnold to prepare the latter's letter to Lord George Gernoio, also his "Address to the Public." (see O 4, 1780). He helped in receiving and entertaining Prince William Henry dur- ing his visit here (see S 25, 1781, et seq.)

The diary, also, for the first time, reveals Smith as the author of many newspaper letters and articles, and, above all, of the pam- phlet. A Candid Retrospect, published anonymously, first in Charles- ton, Sept. 30, 1780 (q. v.), subsequently reprinted in New York, Jan. 30, 1781 (q. v.).

The final pages of the diary are many newspaper clip- pings and sometimes letters to which the writer makes reference. He often mentions articles appearing in newspapers—New York, New Jersey, New England, Pennsylvania, London—and offers comment. Again he will record the appearance in print of some- thing he has contributed anonymously; indeed, his contributions were rarely signed and his authorship of them is revealed for the first time in this volume.

When Smith was appointed by Sir Henry Clinton on the latter's council, Dec. 23, 1779, he expressed the hope that "the Station you have assigned me will enable me to manifest a Zeal for the King's Service in some Degree answerable to your Expectations." Subsequent to this appointment, there are few proclamations or orders issued from headquarters which Smith did not personally draft. Judge Thomas Jones, about this time, took occasion to write: "The General had an advisor, William Smith, Esq., in whom he placed implicit confidence, a pretended loyalist, a corre- spondent of some of the leaders of rebellion. By this man Clinton was absolutely governed. By this man's advice the General lost America."—Jones, Hist. of the Rev. War in N. Y. C., I: 568-69. The reader of the diary finds such a derogatory statement impossible of belief, and is forced to conclude that easy or malice engen- dered it. On the other hand, the sincerity of the chief-justice seems unquestioned when he writes (Wm. Smith's Diary, Ji 1, 1781, q. v.): "I will persevere nevertheless in what I conceive to be the true Interest of the whole empire & if possible bring on an American Parliament."

The above appreciation was prepared by Dr. A. E. Peterson, who has spent several months in looking through this fine collec- tion of "Wm. Smith's Diary," by which name it has since been placed in the library. This is the first time that these pages have been comprehensively and critically examined, and the new material which they have yielded constitutes a noteworthy contribution to our knowledge of the period covered, especially for the years 1778-1785.

Two private "Victuallers," much needed by the British forces at New York, arrive from Glasgow, after 15 weeks' passage. There also arrive five 74-gun ships, "being part of Admiral Byron's squadron."—Montresor's Jour., 512.

Samuel Fraunces, at "the corner of Dock street, near the Royal Exchange," offers for sale "One clock, one desk and book case, one chest of drawers, a variety of kitchen furniture, looking-glasses, some table Chinas, a few mahogany tables, a few boxes of spermaceti candles, one mahogony desk, and a variety of other articles too tedious to mention; likewise, a Negro boy, about 14 years of age, hearty and strong, and is used to household work. N. B. He has had the small pex."—Royal Gaz., Ag 29, 1778.

Fraunces turned the Queen's Head over to John and William Smith before Nov. 14 (ibid. N. 14). He offered it for sale in the spring of 1781 (see Mr 19, 1781), but it was not until April 25, 1785 (q. v.) that he succeeded in disposing of the house. Just prior to this, congress leased the property for two years, paying Fraunces $1,625 for the lease, besides $2,000 to repay advances made by Fraunces to American prisoners.—See Ag 4, 1785.

It appears from an advertisement for the recovery of a stray horse that there was a Hessian camp at Belvoir. The horse, when found, was brought to the Bull's Head Tavern.—Royal Gaz., Ag 29, 1778. For the location and history of "Belvoir" see Mr 14, 1777.

"Sir Henry Clinton Sailed this day for Rhode Island with near 30 four thousand Men" (see Ag 25)—Kemble's Jour., 161. See S 7.

The "Rebels" send a detachment "to attack the Yagers' out- post in the Front of Spiten Devil near King's Bridge," which was oblige d to be re-inforced by the rest of the Yagers. This incident occurred at Valentine's Hill. Prisoners of the house, just prior to this, were dispossessed of the property for two years by Congress. New York was the next day.—Montresor's Jour., 512.

Admiral Parker "and four Ships of Byron's fleet, all 74s," Sept. arrive in New York harbour.—Kemble's Jour., 161.

Walker's Charing-Cross Tavern, in the Broad Way, is offered to be let, and the furniture for sale.—Royal Gaz., S 2, 1778.

John Walker was listed in 1776 as a tavern-keeper, at the upper end of Broadway.

Nicholas Jones, in a manuscript memorandum, lists the names of 121 vessels commissioned by General Tryon from the Port of New York since the 1st of Sep, 1778, and adds: "by March '79, upwards of $6,000,000, taken." Each ship's master and number of guns are listed.—Stewart and Jones, New-York Merchants' Letters, 1787 (MS.), in N. Y. P. L.

Wm. Price, surgeon of the "Lord Hyde," writes on his arrival at New York that "to be set down at a Place so beautifully situated, and where Nature was so much more luxuriant in the vegetable Kingdom than I had ever yet seen, gave me a Satisfaction unfeigned before: And if so lovely now, what must it have been in its Prosperity, in the Enjoyment of every Blessing which Peace, Commerce, a well regulated Government could bestow upon the Inhabitants..."

"The bad Success of the Commissioners, and the War which we must be engaged in, in Europe as well as here, leaves very little Hopes of ever bringing this Country again to a Dependance: It will be well if we can keep what we now have, for in giving them these Provinces, and especially this Port, we exclude almost a Possibility of rupturing any Part, the Situation of New-York render ing it the best Key to North America in general."—St. James's Chron., O 17-20, 1778.

Kemble records: "General Grey's Aid-De-Camp, Capt. "Accounts from New-York by deserters, as well as persons come out of the city in exchange—that the enemy by appearance, are preparing to leave the city—their heavy baggage and artillery being embarked. In another letter to Sir Joseph Banks, Sir Charles Blagden says: "Our Fleet either through the fiddle-faddle preciseness or design of the Admiralty, or what ever prevailed in our movements, has failed in the attempt to intercept D'Estaing's Squadron on their way to Boston... Numerous parties of Indians & Whites, all of whom seem to have some connexion with Col. Butler, commit great devastations on the Frontiers. Congress, however, do not relax, as you will see by their late resolves... The people in power all give out that New-York is to be kept this winter; & several circumspect counsels are that they are met as a blind. An expedition seems preparing, but whether to the W. Indies, as was intended in the summer, or up the North River, as some imagine, nothing enables me to judge. The principal people of the army have no cordiality; they are disgusted with Clinton's favours. Washington insults us on the White Plains with scarcely 10,000 men... Our commissioners act toward the rebels with great Temper, & we should say in any other state of affairs, with degrading condescension. They seem to entertain hopes that the people will at length compel the Congress to negotiate, without considering perhaps sufficiently the strong Despotism established by these demagogues, who have contrived to put all the arms of the country into the hands of their friends. The principal officers of the rebel army indeed are quarrelling, but that is only a proof how much they now despise us. Danger wd. reunite them..."—From the original in the N. Y. P. L., printed in the Library's Bull. (1903), 450.

A London news item reads: "A Number of Houses at New-York having been quitied by the Disaffected, when that City was taken, a great Many People who came with the King's Army took Possession of them, and since that Time lived Rent free: There being no Funds to relieve the Refugees and Poor, the Magistracy petitioned the General to oblige such Holders of Houses to pay Half a Year's Rent for the Purpose of relieving the Distressed, which was complied with, it being thought but reasonable; all Persons therefore who could not prove any Title to their Houses, were accordingly assessed Half a Year's Rent [see Mr 3], and Two Thousand Pounds were collected thereby for the above Service."—St. James's Chron., S 17-19, 1778.

Earl Cornwallis, supposed on a Foraging party into Jersey; the same day ordered to attend Lord Cornwallis."—Kemble's Jour., 1. 2d. Corps under Cornwallis "crossed the North River to Bergen." "The Populace are in Spirits. They believe (I know not upon what Authority) That Washington's army are in great Dissentions murmuring about the French Alliance & that he has in a Fright retired from White plains to the Highlands & sent a Part of his army to the New England Coast. That offence is taken at D Estaing's leaving Rhode Island—asking Supplies from the Congress & behoving with a Hauteur disgusting to the Leveling Principles of New England..."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Lord Carlisle writes from New York to Lady Carlisle: "How people exist in this town is to the greatest degree wonderful. All the necessaries of Life are dear beyond concepcion. Meat is from fifteen to seventeen pence a pound, and everything else in proportion. My weekly bills come to as much as the house-account at Castle Howard when we have the most company..."—Trevelyan, The Am. Rev., II: 154 (1778).

A New Yorker writes: "General Lee and Millfin have raised such Dissentions in the Rebel Army, that General Washington's Authority is much curtailed; and the Rebel Soldiery say publicly, that he and the Congress aim at absolute Power, and mean to sell their Country to the French; they like wise add, if America is to be subject to Monarchy, a British King shall rule them. A "Manifesto and Proclamation" is issued to the members of the congress and of the provincial legislatures, and to the inhabitants of the several colonies, by the king's commissioners. Congress is assured that the re-establishment of peace will be accompanied by "an exemption from any imposition of taxes by the Parliament of Great Britain in all the colonies in the union;" as well as that it would be "expressly for the purpose of considering whether every motive, political as well as moral, should not decide their resolution to embrace the occasion of cementing a free and firm coalition with Great-Britain." The colonists in general are reminded of "their own appeal to Heaven in the beginning of this contest, that they took arms only for the redress of grievances and that in no way whatsoever. They are charged with their interest in the several colonies and "... the interest of the United States." They are also charged with their interest in the United States.

From an original in the N. Y. P. L. Wm. Smith wrote anonymously of this effort for peace: "The transactions of the Commissioners, and the manner in which they have been treated, and the miscarriage of America slighted by the Congress, will never be forgotten. Let the suffering Americans peruse the pamphlet published by the Royal Commissioners before they took their departure in November 1778 (see N 25), and for himself determine in his enquiries concerning the authors of his own, and of the present and future calamities of his country."—Candid Retrospect, 27, footnote, a pamphlet published by Rivington, Jan. 30, 1781 (q.v.), and preserved in N. Y. N. S. See also Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI, under O 1, 2, and 5.

Commenting on the "Manifesto," a Philadelphia newspaper said: "The contemptible figure which the British king and ministry have cut in the present war, cannot be better shewn than in the... proclamation, which has been lately published at New York by Carlisle, Clinton and Eden. Those gentlemen seem to consider their master's commission as a sort of a pass to go a begginning with; for if any thing can justly be called begging, this last performance of theirs deserves that name. It is in the true style of 'Gest your honors, bestow your charity for the Lord's sake.' Poor devils! Why don't they go home and mind their hardware and broadcloth, and not pester us with scribbling letters and petitory proclamations?"—Penn. Ev. Post, O 16, 1778.

Lafayette sends a letter to the Earl of Carlisle, in New York, challenging him, as chief commissioner, to answer in the field for some insults to France contained in the commissioners' letter to Congress of Aug. 26.—Ann. Reg. (1779), 317. For factsmile of the challenge, see Avery, Hist. of the U. S., VI: 104. On Oct. 11, Carlisle rejected the challenge, stating: "The injury alluded to in the correspondence between the King's commissioners and the Congress, I must remind you, is not of a private nature; and I conceive all national disputes will be best decided by the meeting of Admiral Byron and Count d'Estaing."—Ann. Reg. (1779), 311-18.

"Elizabeth Powers, Late from Philadelphia; From her strong attachment to the army and navy, has opened a house in Smith-street, the Sign of Cornwallis's Arms, where she proposes to entertain these gentlemen, and the public in general, who will be pleased to favour her with their company. ... She has provided excellent Waiters, and a Cook not inferior to any in America. Public Dinners at half past two o'clock, private Dinners at any hour, bespoke; ..."—Royal Gaz., O 7, 1778. Cf. Sir Charles Blagden writes again from New York to Sir Joseph Banks. He says: "The Army here is now breaking up, & no more men seem likely to be left than are necessary as a garrison to the place. ... The Commissioners meet with no success, but [on] the contrary are treated with great rudeness, & the [Com]m ender in Chief with still greater, by demagogues of America. They are preparing to go home."—From original letter in N. Y. P. L., printed in the Library's Bull. (1903), 437.

A letter from a field officer in Maxwell's Brigade (American) at Elizabeth Town states that "The enemy have embarked to full regiments, and the vessels have fallen down with them to the Hook;" also that they "have information by deserters this day, that the enemy have evacuated Ports-Hook and Hoebuck; so if they have not post left in Jersey. They were also evacuating fort Cornwall, fort Independence, and their other works west of the Brige. ..."—N. T. Jour., N 2, 1778. It is even supposed by the Americans that "New York will be evacuated by the enemy in the course of this week, wind and weather permitting."—Ibid., N 9, 1778.

Washington writes to a friend: "The Enemy have been very busy since their return from the Jerseys in Imbarking Troops—Nine Regiments are completed to their full establishment by drafts from some others which are reduced, & these I am persuaded are destined for the West Indies—whether the rest of the Troops will remain in New-York—return to England—or go to Halifax is yet matter of uncertainty.—Appearances seem to favour a general evacuation of the City but the Matter is by no means certain."—From original letter in Letter Coll. (No. 9200) of N. Y. P. L.

Gen. Alexander MacDougal writes from Fredericksburg to Gov. Clinton at Poughkeepsie: "The Enemy have sent from New York a Fleet of 150 Sails of Transports with Troops on board under convoy of a number of men of war [see O 19]. As their destination is uncertain and the Fleet at Boston may be their object, and the release of Gen. Burgoyne's Army, General Gates with his Division has marched from Danbury to Connecticut River there to wait events. Three Brigades march this morning for Farmington under my orders for the like purpose; but I am confident we shall soon redeem the Enemy cannot be guilty of so much folly as to attempt an Enterprise of that Nature at this late season. As the merchants are not preparing up in New York, nor the Hospital removed, the Enemy do not yet intend a total evacuation. But I think it must take place, when the Court of Great Britain are advised of the Loss of Dominica. General Putnam is playing the old preposterous Game with Flags, attended with such Circumstances as indicate more than mere Folly. In short I begin to suspect his..."

"General Officers and Commander in Chief in general upon bad terms; want of steadiness in Commander in Chief. The Sailing of Transports with Troops and their destination not secret enough, for the no absolute publication of them, yet from circumstances they may be guessed at. Commissioners and Commander in Chief on not the most Cordial footing; neither is the former with the Admiral; but that does not surprise."

"This day Colonels O’Hara and Stevens, of the Guards, proposed to go and settle a mode of Exchange of prisoners with the Rebels."

"Mr. Washington has crossed the North River, and proposing to proceed to the Southward; thought in consequence of our Expedition going to that part of the Continent. Lord Stirling informs Sir Henry Laurens that Sir Henry Clinton is absent from New York; he believes that Clinton sailed with the fleet on Nov. 3 (q.v.). Stirling adds: "On Monday and Yesterday Ships have been dropping down from New York to Staten Island they amounted Yesterday afternoon to near one hundred Sail, a Considerable Number of Hessians besides other troops are on board, but very few Ships remain in the harbour of New York. From the testimony of "3 British Soldiers wife whom we took near poules Hook," it appears "that the Hessians Embarked three days ago, that the troops had all Marched from Kingsbridge leaving their Huts Standing and that there remains no troops above three or four miles above New York."—From a letter preserved in the L. H. S.

"The third New York fleet is Now in Motion, thirty Eight Sail of Ships dropped down from Staten Island to Sandy hook Yesterday afternoon, and I doubt not the rest, making in the whole about One hundred Sail, will follow with this Mornings Tide."—From a letter from Lord Stirling to Henry Laurens, in the L. H. S.

"Captain Fielding, of the Diamond Frigate, one of Admiral [Byron’s] Squadron, came in this day," bringing recent news of the British fleet. "Captain Fielding thinks he saw the French Squadron, and supposes by their Course intended for the West Indies; should Mr. D’Estaing have intelligence of General Grant’s destination [see O 27, and N 3], we have much to apprehend for his safety. "Admiral Byron was left by Captain Fielding making the best of his way to Rhode Island with nine great Ships, and one fifty."—Kemble’s jour., 166-67.

"Lord Stirling writes from Elizabeth Town to Henry Laurens: The fleet which dropped down to Sandy hook on the 12th [see N 13] remained there yesterday Evening; the Winds have been either ahead or too high, for anything to put to Sea. 16 & 21 Gibbon proposed this morning to take a Party to Tarry Town for the seizure of stores there. Sir H Clinton refused—saying that he was age carrying a Torch thro' the Country, for he appre-headed Mr T's Designs were to burn the Village—The proper Mode of conducting the War was to seize the Highland Forts and make a Lodgment there of 6000 men—to put 8000 more on the Coast of Connecticut and to act by Detachments from N Y & Rhode Island of occasional Descents favoring the main Bodies."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

put to two-thirds Allowance, the Army Stores not over plenty.
The Admiral a Money getting Pompous foul, and the Schemes he makes use of to fill his Pocket very much unlike an Officer of his Station."—Kemble's Jour., 167.

Writing from New York to Joseph Galloway, London, on Nov.
23, Abel Evans states that, from a vessel which reached New York out of Boston, he had learned that "the Count [D'Estaing] seau" sailed from there two days before him, (the 4th inst.) generally thought for the West Indies. Admiral was not able to prevent it, being blown off the harbor in a gale of wind, and is since got into Newport. He continues: "The Refugee scheme so much talked of when you were here, seems to be dropt—nothing being said of it —and a proposal is made them by General Robertson to go near Huntington to cut wood off Rebel Estates, for the sake of this garrison. . . ."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., V: 295. See also ibid., 296.

Writing again to Sir Joseph Banks, Sir Charles Blagden says:
"I hope . . . [Mr. Eden] will bring you this safe, after escaping, with his companions the dangers of a winter's passage, & of a powerful enemy who insults us even in the Channel: How unsucsessful it has proved in a piece of bad news which will arrive long before them. Their departure will be much regretted by all ranks of people in this place [New York], to whom their conduct has greatly endeared them. There are some appearance as if we should follow them before next summer; & I fear it will prove highly fortunate for our country if we remain here long.
All the detachments are gone away, excepting a body of 2,000 men, under Lt. Col. Campbell, well known for the long imprisonment he suffered at Boston. This body of troops were just on the point of going to sea, when a gale of wind arose, which did some damage to the shipping that they are now detained to repair. They are supposed to be destined first for Georgia, & then for Florida [see N 7]. Part, if not the whole, of D'Estaing's Squadron is got out of Boston [see the same account, 21] in honor of the occasion of Geo. Clinton's detachment of 5,000 men, which sailed from hence [see N 3], for the West Indies it is said, about the same time that the French left Boston. . . . Gerard's dispatches to the Court of France, written in Cipher, are taken by the Daphne. The Somerset, a sixty-four, is shipwrecked on the the "Somerset," see also Kemble's Jour., 167, 174.

From the Gentleman's Magazine, London, an account of the military situation to this date, adding this statement: . . . The Remainder of the Troops are gone into Winter Quarters, there are near 2000 on Long Island, these consist chiefly of the light Troops & Dragoons. I dread the consequence to New York from the Destruction they make on Long Island, I think it will be felt severely the next Spring.

The Swiss has ended a mart the next season in consequence of the winter without any thing Capital being done, or even attempted.

How will the Historian gain Credit, who shall relate that at least 24,000 of the best Troops, in the World, were shut up within their Lines, by fifteen thousand at most, of Poor Wretches, who were illy paid, badly fed, and worse clad, and scarce at best deserved the name of soldiers—but I forbear." Continuing his account of events and British prospects, he says, in part: "The Rebellion hangs by a Slender Thread. The Majority of the Inhabitants dissatisfied with their present Tyrannical Government—Their Money depreci-ing—Provisions scarce & that scarcity increasing— . . . In this situation, what is necessary to Crush the Rebellion? It is easily answered—Only one Vigorous Campaign properly conducted.

And by this, that the French Troops should be a National Judgment Spirit & Enterprise, and one who would make himself acquainted, with the Geography of the Country (which has hitherto been a fatal Neglect) & a few more Troops to Supply the place of those gone to the West Indies. . . .

There has lately been made a Calculation of the Refugees, within the Lines of New York, & including those that have joined the Provincial Corps, they amount upwards of ten thousand.

The most of these Persons have from their Attachment to their Sovereign, abandoned their Fortunes, and from Affluence are reduced to Indigence, which they bear with Patience, in full Confidence that the Faith of Government, & the Promises of Protection, repeatedly given them, would be sacrely Observed. . . . "—

A printed handbill states that "At a late Meeting of the Merchants of this city, it was represented that the Inhabitants are particularly desirous of expressing the high sense they entertained of the merit of his Majesty's Commissioners [see Ap 51], and to express their sentiments on the very important situation of affairs.
For this purpose a numerous and respectable body of people were assembled at Hick's Tavern, on Friday the 20th instant, who chose a Committee . . . from this Committee, to Prepare an Address." In substance it was an expression of gratitude for the commissioners' services in America (see Je 3), but more particularly an appeal for the re-establishment of civil rather than military government. The answer of the commissioners, which follows the address in the handbill, says, in effect, "that the great objects of the war, are the re-establishment of the civil constitution, and the preservation of his Majesty's faithful subjects in these colonies."—From B. F. Stevens's Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives Relating to America, 1773-1783 (London, 1892), Vol. XII, No. 1226. Regarding the condition of affairs in New York which occasioned this appeal, see Van Tyne, The Loydists (1902), 249. See also N. T. Merc., S 21 and O 26, 1778; Royal

3 Dec.

"Not known till this Morning that 5000 Men are detached & going up the North River—No orders issued last Night—Some Ships & Troops gone up last Night with the flat bottom Boats."—No Person can tell the Design—Suspected to spread on the West side of Hudson’s River to favor the Flight of Burgoyne’s Men from the Guard conducting them to Virginia—They crossed at Fishkill on Monday or Tuesday last. Several who fled are come in & tis supposed urged to this Sally."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

"Sir Henry proceeded up North River with the Troops Embarked, and Sir William Erskine Marched from Cortland’s with the Troops above mentioned [see Dec. 3] to Tarry Town."—Kemble’s Jour., 167. Sir Henry landed at Stony Point, the object being "to cut off some of the Rebels conducting the Convention Army to the Southward" (see Nov. 9; they returned, unsuccessful, to New York on the 6th. "Sir William likewise returned."—Ibid., 167-68. The British land at Stony Point, opposite Verplanck’s Point, but find that the Americans have already passed. They therefore returned to New York.—Robertson’s Jour. (MS.), under D 5, 6, and 7.

"The Movement up the River is made with great Secrecy. To this Minute it is an Uncertainty whether the Design is not against the Highland Forts. Spades Pick Axes & Bills went off yesterday. The Cannon in Cannon is heard within ten miles of the Grounds."—They have been Packing up for some days past. They are going to open the Ferry at Fishkill—Sir William had ordered it to be kept shut at Tarry Town.

"The Town was astonished by the Return of the General & his Troops last Night—It is said they ascended to King’s Ferry & found themselves 2 Days too late for the Rescue of Burgoyne’s Troops.—But if they did not mean to attack the Forts nor to land at Haverstraw & penetrate to Sussex how could they hope to relieve them?—Then they would have known some one or more of the Divisions & by the Way have received such as had fled from them to the Mountains with Design to escape to N.York."

7 "I now suspect that solicited by Messages to come out the General complied to avoid Censure—It that having gone 40 Miles up the River he thinks he has done enough to satisfy an Administration ignorant of the Geography of the Country."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

8 A New Yorker writes that "The Rebellion in general is more languid now than it has been at any time since the unfortunate affair at Trenton, in 1776 [g. 24. D 26], owing to the failure of the resources of war among the Rebels, and the discontent, on various accounts, amongst the people at large."—Lloyd’s Eve. Post, 3 5 1778.

9 The three "Officers of Police" (the board consisting of Sup’t. Elliott, Mathew Mathews, and Asst. Magistrate Dubois) issue, by order of the commandant, a proclamation establishing a new set of rates for the city cartmen (cf. Dec. 29, 1777). These include an order that any person who, after Dec. 20, "shall be discovered acting as City Cartman, without having obtained such a license, and the number of his license marked with red paint upon each side of his Cart, will be taken into Custody."—N. Y. Merc., D 14, 1778.

Wm. Smith publishes the following signed notice: "When the subscriber retired to Haverstraw, in March 1776, he left in his house in the Broadway, at the corner of Verlenthenberg, various articles of Furniture, with two Trunks of Parcels, and many Bundles of Papers in about 40 small deal bound Boxes, numbered in the front. He is informed that they were moved out of town in August 1776, but can’t discover who has at present the custody of them. There were also taken away, Dr. Mitchell’s large Map of North-America, Mr. Rätze’s Map of the city, and a manuscript Map of the colony of New-York; among the papers, there are some of great consequence to the estates of many persons in town, and country. Satisfactory information, especially concerning the parchments and papers, will be gratefully received and rewarded."—N. Y. Merc., D 7, 1778.

To encourage farmers to bring their hay, &c. to New York, George Brinley, the commissary of forage, increases the price which he offers for these essentials, as follows: "For good Uphland Hay, 8. s. per cwt.;"—Salt Hay, 4 s. per ditto; Spurry Straw, 3 s. per ditto;
1788 Indian Corn, 10 s. per bushel." "Oats, 7 s. per ditto." He fixes the Dec. rate for carriage or water carriage at 2 s. 6 p. per ton. The farmers 9 are to make their deliveries "to the most contiguous Magazines, where they will receive certificates for the quantity delivered, which will be paid at the Forage-Office." If "found delinquent after this notice," the farmers will have "no forage taken, and no receipts given."—N. Y. Merc., D 14, 1778. In 1782, according to a forage office order of June 29 of that year, the payment then offered was somewhat less.—Royal Gaz., Jl 3, 1782.

12 Rev. Charles Inglis writes from New York to Joseph Galloway, London, a lengthy survey of the military and political condition of affairs in America, from a loyalist point of view. In summing up, he says, in part: "You will probably meet with several People in England who feel great Sympathy and Tenderness for the Distresses of the Rebels, but are callous to the Sufferings and Miseries of the Loyalists. . . . Tell them that every Jail in the 13 States is filled with such as from a Principle of Conscience, adhere to their King, and Constitution of their Country—tell them that many Thousands of such are banished from their Homes, their Property destroyed or confiscated, and their Families left to perish—banished into every Part of the King's Dominions, nay, into the Wilderness among Savages, more compassionate than their Republican Persecutors; to say nothing of the Hundreds that have been deliberately put to Death, or of the Thousands that remain at Home, deprived of all the Rights of Freemen for the same Cause." Hist. Mag., V 304.

14 A notice is published that the king's commissioners, Admiral Howe and Gen. Howe, and "the gentlemen of the Army and Navy," having subscribed "in a most liberal Manner for the Relief of the Refugees in this City, who have little Means of Support left," it is hoped "the Citizens will cheerfully contribute when called upon by the Gentlemen who have humbly undertaken to wait on them for that Purpose." Such refugees, with credentials, are required to call at the superintendent-general's office in Smith St.—N. Y. Merc., D 14, 1778. See also Ja 6, 1779.

15 Isaac Ogden, writing to Jos. Galloway, observes: "... You will see by the Papers that a Dissention prevails among the Rebell Generals. Lee's Tryal and Sentence makes a great noise—his Party rather increases. If Milfin, Arnold, Sinclair & Thompson join him he will be formidable—this is Expected & some good may result to the Publick from it. Washington's being a Churchman must in the End if nothing else does the Business discharge him from the Command. The Party against him gains strength. . . . We have established a Refugee Club [see also Ja 11, 1779] composed of the first Characters from the different Provinces. Ours is more worthy of Deference; it will be able to turn good Consequences. I fancy it will be respectable. . . ." He adds: "I remain still without Support except what My Credit with my Friends afford Me, if You can do any thing for me with Administration, for God Sake let Me request it of You."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., V 356.

16 Tryon is alarmed—Like to be a Scarcity of Beef & Bread in about three Weeks pretty well off for Provisions, as the Corps Fleet hourly expected should be driven off the Coast there will be great Dis- tress."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

17 Describing American affairs at the close of the year, Daniel Coxe, writing to Jos. Galloway, London, says, in part: "... Washington's Army is at present much dispersed in their Winter Cantonnments the whole not exceeding 7000 Men from the best In- formation I can collect. This State, York, retains its own Troops at Albany & different Posts on the Rivers. New England the same in order to protect their country; Washington fixes its [his] Head Quarters in Jersey at Baskingridge, Lord Sterling's place, with about 7000 Troops occupying Hacketns, Aquaquenncon, Newark, Elizabeth Town extending to Amboy & Brunswick, and including two Virginia Brigades (about 1400 men) posted on the Raritan at midday. Bound Brook & Mountain Gap, as support to the others. . . ."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., V 357.

18 John Potts, writing from New York to Jos. Galloway, London, says, in part: "... Our situation is really desperate in my Opin- ion, I entertain the highest sense of the honour of Government, but when I consider the number & every circumstance occurs to me I cannot help thinking that the situation of the Refugees is truly desperate & cannot but hasten the day where all was lately desirable."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., V 360.

19 A sloop "laden with Arms and Gunpowder, bound from the Mississippi to Philadelphia, was brought into this Port by the Columbus" (a British privateer).—N. Y. Merc., D 21, 1778.

"It is reported this Day that Laurens has resigned his Place as Dec. President of the Congress & that John Jay succeeds him. This is another Proof of the Weakness of the Faction. The Congress is approaching the Ruin as their Powers fall into the Hands of the most violent. Men of Property & undersadness shall come away from their Trusts, of which all were lately desirous."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"John and Isabella Roberts Return Thanks to the Customers that used to frequent the House kept by Moses Marden, known by the Sign of Tryon's Arms, at the Corner of Crown-street, Broad- way; and they acquaint the Gentlemen of the Navy and Army, etc. that they keep Taverns and Ordinary in said House, where the best of Liquors are sold, Dinners on the very shortest Notice, Relishes always ready, and the best Attendance. . . ."—N. Y. Merc., D 21, 1778.

The benefits of pardon for treason are offered, by a proclama- tion of Gov. Tryon, to persons who will withdraw from the "re- rebellion," and "come in from the rebels" after Dec. 20th.—N. Y. Merc., Ja 4, 1779.

A New Yorker writes: "The arrival of the packet has raised our spirits exceedingly. The Admiral has now consented to permit privateers to go out under particular regulations. Prizes are daily sent in. . . . The winter has set in with uncommon severity: I write along-side a good fire, and yet the ink freezes in my pen. . . ." The Rebels industriously propagate a report of their having obtained a loan of four million sterling from Holland, on French security; a report which I utterly disbelieve. Their national debt amounts now to about 60 millions sterling."—Lloyd's Eve. Post, F 3-5, 1779.

Smith writes: "A violent snow storm with the Wind in vast Power from the N E. This Evening the Bedford & Amazon fell down with a Fleet for England & Ireland."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. On Dec. 28, he added: "No abatement of the Frost. The Fleet sailed yesterday, 7 Vessels lost in our Harbour in the Storm. Three Centinels found frozen in their Boxes."—Ibid.

A London news item stated in January, 1779, that "Ten thou- sand Regulars, and between 6000 and 7000 Provincial, were left at New York when the last ships sailed from thence on the 28th of December."—Lloyd's Eve. Post, Ja 27-29, 1779.

The British barracks of this period were of wood, enclosed by a high fence, and extended from Broadway to Chatham St., along the present Chambers St. They had a gate at each end; the one by Chatham St. was called "Tryon's Gate," from which was afterward derived the street name. "Tryon's Gate," now Tryon St., was named for Mrs. Myers, daughter of David Grim, in Watson's Annals, 185., Cj. "Upper Barracks" in L. M. R. K., III: 924; also the barracks lying along the north side of "Barrack Street," in Pl. 408, Vol. IV; and Holland Map in Man. Cent. Conn. (1861), 552.

Claude Joseph Sauthier's "Chorographical Map of the Province of Jan. New York in North America, Divided into Counties, Manors, Patents and Townships; Exhibiting likewise all the private Grants of Land made and located in that Province; Compiled from Actual Surveys deposited in the Patent Office at New York," which was drawn by order of Maj.-Gen. Tryon, and engraved and published by William Faden at London, bears this date. Upon this map, Ellis Island appears as "Bucking I." For the origin of the name Ellis Island, see F 21, 1785. The "Patent Office" here referred to is the provincial secretary's office, or a department of it, where land patents were filed. For the act establishing the U. S. Patent Office, see Ap 19, 1790.

Rivington publishes an "exhortation" in verse, signed "M" L—n, apropos of an order issued by Washington requiring the inhabitants of certain districts to fatten their cattle, in order to feed his army during the ensuing campaign; it reads in part: "The Proclamation, timely to command The cattle to be fattened round the land, Bespeaks thy generosity, and shows A charity that reaches to thy foes! And was this order issued for our sakes, To treat us with roast beef and savoy steaks?"—Royal Gaz., Jl 1, 1779.

In imitation of the queen, the Marchosness of Granby, and the six ladies of Westminster who own the "Amazon," all of whom have recently equipped private ships of war at their own expense,
"to assist in humbling the pride and perfidy of France, and in chastising the rebels of America," a number of ladies residing in New York proposed to set at work at once, to form a list of out a last privateer, to be called "The Fair American."

—Royal Gaz., Ja 6, 1779.

Apparantly the name of the privateer was subsequently changed to the "Royal Charlotte" (see F 3).

Maj. John André, a social favorite in loyalist circles during the British occupation of New York, delivers an extemporary address on "Loyalism," March 1, 1779, before the citizens of New York, at a gathering this evening at the manorial residence of Dr. (Richard?) Deane. On the same occasion he read a "Political Dream," a violent and coarse attack upon prominent American leaders of the time. This was shortly afterward printed in Rivington's Royal Gaz.

In this paper he adopted, as a basis for his criticisms, the theory of metamorphosis, that when men "degraded themselves from the character of rational beings, it became proper that they should assume the figure of those beasts to whom properties they were already assimilated," and that the soul should be "rewarded or punished according to its deserts in a new state of existence." From these premises he transported himself in imagination into a court where "the infernal judges administered justice to the souls which had animated the bodies of men in the superior regions." First among those whom he pictured as thus arraigned was Chief-Justice [Thomas] McKean of Pennsylvania; and "his more than savage cruelty, his horrid disregard to the many oaths of allegiance he had taken, and the vile sacrifice he had made of justice in the interests of rebellion were openly rehearsed," while "he was condemned to assume the shape of a bloodhound" and be scourged through the infernal regions by his victims. Silas Deane, characterized as "a trickling, hypocritical New England attorney," was declared to be a "wanton judge" who "ate bread and wine," and struck the character of "the monkey who had seen the world." Gen. Charles Lee was held up to condemnation as one "whose ingratitude to his own country was regarded with the utmost detestation," and by direction of the court he assumed "the figure of an adder, a reptile that is big with venom and ready to wound the hand that protects or the body that cherishes it, but whose poison freeway from the source of its destruction.

Andr é next saw that "the black soul of [Philip] Livingston, polluted with every species of murder and iniquity, was condemned to howl in the body of a wolf." John Jay, president of the provincial congress, was the next subject of the writer's vituperation. Jay was described as "remarkable for a mixture of the lowest cunning and most unfeeling barbarity; he had, by a semblance of virtue, acquired the confidence of his fellow-citizens, which he afterwards abused to all the horrid purposes of the most wanton rebellion, and, in the pursuits of ambition and avarice, by all the ways of intrigue, perfidy and dissimulation, he had acquired the station of a chief-justice, and in imitation of the infamous Dudley had framed and enforced statutes that destroyed every species of property, and laid the reproach of "this criminal should transmigrate into the most insidious and hateful of animals, a snake; but . . . a large set of rattles was affixed to his tail, that it might warn mankind to shun so poisonous a being."

After a review of the continental army, "forced to put on the shape of the timid hare, whose disposition they already possessed . . . and ready to fly at the approach of danger," Andr é concluded his sputie tirade by an attack upon "a great and magnificent commander of antiquity [Sir William Howe] transformed into a game-cock who at once began to crow and strut about as if he was meditating a combat, but upon the appearance of a few croppie-crowned hens he dismissed his purpose, . . . brushing his wing and rustling his feathers at every Danne Parrel in the company."

—Life and Career of Major John Andr é, by Winthrop Sar gent (Boston, 1861), 212-16; Rivington's Royal Gaz., Ja 23, 1779.

A notice is published directing "the distressed Refugees" to call at "the Police Office in Smith-Street" on Thursdays, when the money collected by subscription for their relief will be distributed.

A "J. Corre, Pasty-Cook, Has opened his shop, at No. 239, facing Mr. Gainé's, Hanover Square, where the Ladies and Gentlemen will be supplied with all sorts of Pastry Cakes, Sweet-Meats and Jellies, &c."—Royal Gaz., Ja 6, 1779.

On Jan. 10, 1780, Corre advertised that he also sells Raisins,currants, and Almonds, &c. With superfine Flour by the Barrel."—N. Y. MERC., Ja 10, 1780. From this time until long after the Revolution, Corré was one of the principal exeters of New York. See My 22, 1782; My 30, 1783; Ja 10, 1788.

France being at war with England, Lafayette sails from Boston to his native land. This was in accordance with the leave of absence granted by congress on Oct. 21, 1778, at which time congress also voted that "an elegant sword" be made and presented to him in the name of the United States.—Tower, Marquis de Lafayette in the Am. Revolution, II: 49-59. Jour. of Cong., III: 98. See Ap 28, 1780.

Kemble records: "Arrived one of the Cork fleet, very acceptable, as the Troops had been fed for three weeks before on Oaten Meal, and some Deserters from the Hessians the cause of it; these Deserters carried some of their Oaten bread to show the Rebels what they were fed upon."—Kemble's jour., 170. The rest of the Cork fleet arrived from the 9th to the 15th.—Ibid., 172. See also letter of Isaac Ogden to Joseph Galloway, in Hist. Mag., 1st ser., VI: 179.

The season at the Theatre Royal opens with a performance of the tragedy "Chrononhotonthologos."—Royal Gaz., Ja 6 and 13, 1779. At this reopening of the theatre, the prologue was spoken by Capt. [soon After Major] André—Wilson, Miss Hist. N. T. Theater, 1779, x: 537-38. There is an account of this performance in the New-York volume (MS.) entitled Receipts of the Treasurer of the "Theatre Royal," John St. John, A.D. 1779. The book was kept by Thos. Barrow, the treasuerer, and is replete with data for the student of such matters. The receipts for the opening performance (£260: 16) and subsequent performances appear. Names of prima donnas, including Maria Turner, Ann Bell, and Thomasina Galpin, are recorded. Books of receipts for various "Night performances" is apparently a Hessian band of 14 pieces receiving one dollar each man per night, for which "Philipp Picci gives receipt. Large sums go to James Rivington for advertising and printing, as also to Alex. Leslie for "sundry wiggs." Occasionally John Marshall provides "Suppers including liquor" for the performances. There are receipts for "Scene shitter," "attendance at the Door," "washing done for the Theatre," "frommony for the Theatre," "tallow candles," "Sundry dresses," "Hats and Trimings," "Buckskin breeches," "the Guard of light Inf" attending the Rehearsal and play of Rich: the 3d" (probably as supernumeraries), "Coach-biere," etc., etc.

The news was published in Philadelphia, on Jan. 21, that "About 10 days ago [Jan. 10 or 11], a small party of Americans, under the command of a Mr Buchanan, went down the North River and landed near the City of New York, went to the quarters of Gen. Clinton, at a place called the Bowerie, one mile from the City of New York, where they surprised his guards, and brought them off; but Gen. Clinton having supped from home escaped."—Penn. Packet, Ja 21; Conn. Gaz. (New London), T 12, 1779. This news of Clinton's return, probably David Rivington, reported that "this information has been brought to the British commissary-general of naval prisoners—see O 13," writing from New York to Joseph Galloway, London, says, in part: "[The price of Fire-wood is limited at Five pounds a Cord [see N 28, 1778], but it’s not to be got. [See further D 20, 1779; Ja 2o, F 19, 1780.] Irish Pork at 500 a bbl. Beef at £2 5/, and fresh flour will bring 45 p. bbl. Our markets have been pretty fully supplied with fresh provision from Long-Island & nearest of N. York, for they run all riques for a little of the hard money—but what would become of us should a Cork fleet miscarry—which sooner or later may be the case—the army would eat up the market and the inhabitants won’t starve. We have had this prospect staring us in the face for sometime past, but thank God yesterday and to-day a fleet of Victuallers arrived, otherwise we should not [have] had a mouth full in a short time. . . ."—We have now fix’d a Refuge Club [see also D 15, 1778; D 22, 1779], meet once a fortnight at Jic’s Tavern, the Members are respectable people from each Colony—Govermn Franklin in the Chair. We talk freely of Politics, tell all the News, and are for the time happy.

"To know or must have heard that I was the person who opposed Independence (and that in the Month of May and to the declaration) on the Commons of Philadelphia in the face of five Battalions of Associates, and was his[e] of[ff] the Parade—that I maintained my integrity and at all times refused to Acquiesce in any of their proceedings, until I was obliged to flee to this place for refuge. . . ."—Hist. Mag., 1st ser., VI: 365.

By order of the commandant, it is announced that venue—masters, after Jan. 20, shall be licensed by the "Officers of the Jan. Police," before whom they shall oath not to be concerned in 12 13 any offenses, in order to raise the price of any article of trade or provisions. Security also, in the sum of £5,000 currency, is re- 14 quired for the faithful execution of their duty as well as the security of their employers. Among the other regulations in the order are these: "Shipping and other materials, naval stores, prize-goods, provisions and liquors of all sorts, cabinet-ware, and the effects of steamer-deeds, may be sold on the wharfs, or near the Coffee- 16 House Bridge [cf. Pl. 69, Vol. I], by the licensed Vendue-Masters.

"Dry goods, and all other goods that do not come under the above denominations, when intended for Public Vendue, are only to be sold in Auction-Rooms provided by the licensed Vendue- Masters, for that purpose."

"Permissions will be granted to any of the licensed Vendue-Masters when required, for the disposing of household furniture at private houses."—Royal Gaz., Ja 16, 1779.

Brig.-Gen. Leslie regulates the ferry charges between Staten Island and New York. These are to be two shillings for each passenger, and six shillings for each horse. A boat must carry six or more passengers.—Royal Gaz., Ja 13, 1779.

A letter written from New York on Jan. 16 stated that "A Dutch ship of 400 tons, laden with double-headed grape and small shot, and several hundred bales of woollen cloth, was brought in here the 11th instant by the Delight cutter. It appeared very evid- ent, on examining her bill of lading, she was bound to Charlestown."—London Chron., Mr 2-4, 1779.

By order of the commandant, a notice of the rates of ferriage between North and South parts, and between Water-street and Brooklyn, is issued at the "Office of the Police," signed by Supt.-Gen. Elliot, Mayor Mathews, and Police Magistrate Dubois. For example, for every person, 6 d.; for every "Gammon of Bacon, Turkey, or Goose," 2 d.; for every "Piece of Cotton, Penniston, Hanne or Prize.

Garlis, Holland or other men," 2 d.; for every "Hound of Fish (called Sheep's head), a 5 d. for every "Hundred of Bass or Shad," 2 5; and for every "Dozen of Perch," 2 d. If "any Ferryman" shall demand or receive more than the rates prescribed, report is made to the "Officers of the Police," that the "Officers may be brought to punishment."—Royal Gaz., Ja 16, 1779.

John Hales, "Late of Philadelphia," opens a tavern "at the corner of Nassau in King-street, near the Main-Guard, known by the sign of the Tally-Ho!"—Royal Gaz., Ja 16, 1779. Before Nov. 9 of this year, Hales or Hales was ordered to give up possession to "make room for the Troops." His protest to Gen. Patterson sets forth that "the House was allotted to him by an Order from Head Quarters, immediately after the arrival of the King's Troops from Philadelphia," "in consideration of the abundance of provisions he suffered, and his Loyalty, being obliged to fly & leave his Property behind—that the House when he took possession of it was in so ruinous a Condition as obliged him to expend upwards of £300 before it became habitable."... Patterson, in response, wrote to Col. Clarke recommending that if it should be found necessary for Hales to give up the house, reasonable indemnification should be made by the "Barrack Office" for his expenses.—From "Letters of Gen. Patt- 5 sone," N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), VIII: 294. Hales was still keeping tavern in the city on Sept. 6, 1780 (q. v.).

A private letter from Morristown states: "The British troops and inhabitants at New-York have been in the greatest distress for want of bread [see Ja 9].... It is also related and believed that rations are issued to 10,000 men, women and children, besides what the troops draw at New-York, Long Island, &c.—"Penn. Packet", F 4, 1779.

"There is a Scarcity of Provisions and Provender—N England in Distress for Bread—They come from beyond Boston and the Sea Coast of Connecticut to this Colony for Flour, & they suffer but little to go out to the Eastward."—The Paper money $ and to for other goods will only purchase any Thing. Col. Livingston "is said refuses it—Multitudes are distressed.—"Mr Scott sells his Place for Provisions."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Maj.-Gen. Jones, commandant, reaffirms an order of Dec. 20, 1777 (q. v.), which required the farmers of Long Island and Staten Island to bring their wheat, rye, and Indian corn to market at stated intervals; and, as an encouragement to produce an ample supply, he orders that certain specified higher prices will be paid. For example, the farmers may charge 26 shillings per bushel for Jan. wheat, and 25 shillings per cwt., for wheat flour. After Feb. 1, no greater price shall be demanded or paid, on penalty of forfeiture of the grain or flour, or its value, and imprisonment of the offender until the forfeiture is paid, when one-half is to go to the informer and the other half to the poor of the city or the township where the offence is committed.

The order also requires that the police of New York, and the colonel of militia on Long Island and Staten Island, shall take an account of the quantities of wheat, rye, Indian corn, grain, flour, or meal, in their respective districts, noting in whose possession it is found, and shall report as soon as possible to the commandant of New-York.—Royal Gaz., Ja 27, 1779. See, further, Mr 27, and Ap 12.

An assay of bread is regulated by public notice of this date, signed by Supt.-Gen. Elliot, Mayor Mathews, and Police Magistrate Dubois. After Feb. 1st, "all the Bakers in this city are to make their Loaves of Two Pounds, weight," and no baker shall charge more than 22 coppers for each such loaf. Each loaf shall be marked with the baker's initials. The weight of two pounds per loaf is for the convenience of the poor, and to avoid fractions in weight which render the detection of fraud in the issue more difficult.—N. Y. Merc., Ja 25, 1779; Man. Com. Coun. (1865), 669. See Ji 7.

Lieu. Von Krafts records in his journal: "In the evening I took a walk in New York and, on account of the flagrant excesses occurring there, took with me 2 soldiers which I had follow me at a little distance."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1882), 79.

Kemble is ordered to leave the "Rebels" of a forty Gun Ship, two Nathans of 32 Guns, and two smaller, cruising off the Delaware, supposed to Intercept the Remedius coming out with £200,000...

He hears that the admiral has "sent to Rhode Island for Vessels to attack them;" and he asks: "why not send the Ardent out?"—Kemble's Jour., 177.

The "Army & Town" are in high glee on the arrival of Letters yesterday with news of Commodore with Georgia represented as recovered.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. See also Kemble's Jour., 177, 177.

The city vestry gives public notice to persons hiring "the Houses, the rents of which are appropriated for the maintenance of the poor of this city," that they are not to transfer their interest without the consent of the vestry; and that no premiums are to be given or taken by such tenants for such transfers. Some of these tenants, availing themselves of "the rights of preference, they were entitled to by virtue of their pre-occupancy," have engaged houses for another year with no intention of residing in them, but "with a view of extorting extravagant sums over... the stipulated rents from the necessitous and distressed."—N. Y. Merc., F 8, 1779.

Tryon, writing from "Out Post King's Bridge" to Lord George Germain, says that the "adventurers in the letters of Marque desire encouragement of the service. They suffer, in additions to Maj's satisfaction...;" and that 145 vessels have "been taken by letters of Marque, and brought into this Port... since the beginning of last September, when the first ships were Commissioned," their value being over £200,000. He commissines the "Royal Charlotte," fitted out as a privateer by the ladies of New York (see Ja 6).—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 75.

The master of a transport which left New York on this day repor- 9 ted in Cork that "four sail victualers had been taken by the American privateers, and carried into Boston. Great numbers of refugees were coming to New York for support, being driven there by the policy of the Americans, in order to distress the place, by adding to the numbers already there, and knowing their want of provisions. Several of the fires have been brought in by the crucifers, and none of them of any value, except a ship from France with bale goods, woollens, silks, &c. bound to Philadelphia."—London Chron., Mr 11-13, 1779.

During the Revolution, a tavern known as the "Defeat at Bra- 9 20 19 13 dyring," was conducted on Golden Hill—Royal Gaz., F 15, 1779. This may have been one of the taverns on Golden Hill which existed under that name long before the English occupation of the city. Of such taverns, one was conducted by George Hopkins at the "Sign of the Orange Tree." Another tavern, adjoining the Orange Tree, was run by a Mr. McGinniss. Edw. Bardin, for a brief period in 1779, was proprietor of the Golden Ten, at Beekman and William Sts., and undoubtedly other taverns existed in the vicinity, of which we have no record. See Index under "Taverns.

Kemble records the arrival of "Victuallers with Irish Papers..." late as 17th December . . . [Reported also that a large Body of Feb. 1779.] Troops are coming out to America; beware, Rebels!"—Kemble's 178 Jour., 1779.
23 A committee submits to the continental congress a draft of provisions to be insisted upon in the event of a peace treaty between the United States and Great Britain.—Jour. Cont. Cong., XIII: 1779: 240–44. Winor, VII: 89. The conditions of a peace were not described in the congress until Aug. 19 (p. 426).
24 Kemble describes in his journal an expedition of the British from New York to Newark where they burned the barracks and court-house. The British naval and general were present, as well as Gov. Franklin of New Jersey.—Kemble's Jour., 1779. See also description given by Isaac Oglen in a letter to Jos. Galloway 25 May 1780. "General Tryon marched from King's Bridge 4 3 or 4 Reg't to Horse Neck [Greenwich, Conn.]
& his return had about 50 men taken."—Robertson's Jour.
(M.S.). See also Kemble's Jour., 1779.
26 There appears in the London Chronicle "A View of the Republic or State of New York." In a tone of ridicule, this long article opens thus: "The contracted boundaries of this Pittiful commonwealth must expose such an impotent ally to the derision of France.—
What does this ape of a nation consist of. Nothing more than the Counties of Albany, Ulster and Dutchess, with the undislosed fragments of Westchester, Orange and Tryon; For New-York, and the four counties on Long and Staten-Island, have renounced the wrastern; and Cumberland, Gloucester and Charlotte, revolving from King's Bridge & Employees [Greenwich, Conn.]
& his return had about 50 men taken."—Robertson's Jour.
(M.S.). See also Kemble's Jour., 1779.
27 Today the deputy, or assistant deputy, of a comissary or forage-master, rife the farmer's barn, of what a single justice of peace conceives to be more than his family can consume in the course of the year; and he is paid in a certificate that makes him only a creditor to the Congress, of a sum that may never be discharged to-morrow he contributes in wagons and horses, which are then made use of by many contrary order.
28 "Nor is the waste of property the smallest branch of the common calamity. The tyrants who exempt themselves from military services, exact them without remorse from everybody else—from boys beyond the age of 15, and from all adults under 55. Was this only on emergencies, and to march at small distances, under officers to whom they are known, in company with their neighbours, and for only a few days, the vassalage might be borne; but the Poughkeepssie Militia act compels them to turn out as often as Mr. Governor thinks fit, to go as far as he pleases, to take the place of common soldiers in the continental army; and to complete the disgrace and slavery of the common people, the forced husbandman or mechanic, as well as the voluntary hiring, is subject to the judgment of a court martia.—He marches, messes and sleeps with the Negroes, who are relieved as substitutes for their masters on the promise of manumission at the end of the war; there being several of this species of sweet-scented liberty boys in the continental army."—Royal Gaz., Aug. 18 and 21, 1779, reprinted from London Chronicle, F 26, 1779.
In research connected with the publication of this Chronology, it has been found that Wm. Smith of Wn. Smith's Diary (M.S.), New York's first historian, was the author of this "View." In his diary, under Aug. 21, he writes: "I perceive that Penderleath [Smith's son-in-law] has printed the View I sent him of the Republic of New York—Rivington reprint it from a London Paper last Wednesday & to Day, while I was looking over it in Gaine's Shop on Wed: I heard it ascribed to Peter Van Sbcllich of Kinderhook who went to England last Fall.
There are small additions & several Blunders. I suppose its to the Oblivion of my Handwriting."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.
Tryon now writes to Germain (cf. F 5): "Our Privaters have taken above one hundred and fifty prizes since the 15th September last; yesterday a small sloop, loaded with ammunition was brought in here by the Revenge, from Philadelphia, bound to South Caroolina. Seldom a day passes without a prize by the Privaters."— 29 Leut. Von Krafft records in his journal an account of an unpleasant encounter he had with a drunkened soldier, and adds:
"I could narrate many and very frightful occurrences, of theft, fraud, robbery and murder by the English soldiers, which their love of drink excited; and as they received but little money, they used these disgusting means."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1882), 81–82.

30 Gov. Tryon is given leave to return to England, on the arrival of his successor as governor, Gen. Robertson.—N. Y. Col. Docs.
VIII: 759–60, 761. For Robertson's instructions, see ibid., VIII:
767–68. In Nov., Tryon was notified that the frigate carrying Gen.
Robertson was to sail from England for America by way of Georgia.

32 The inhabitants of New York are ordered not to discharge firearms in the city by day or night, the penalty for violation of the order being forfeiture of the arms and possible imprisonment.—
Rout., Mar. 7, 1779.
33 Gov. Tryon issues a proclamation in which he informs "all those who are inclined to escape from the barbarous Dominations of the Usurpers, and are desirous to contribute their Aid to its speedy Subversion, and the Re-establishment of the Harmony, Quandry and Prosperity of the Empire, that ample Provision is made . . . for the Employment of all Seamen, Ship-Carpenters and other Persons resorting to this Port, in short and successful Cruizes against his Majesty's Enemies—that generous Bounties are given to all the Adventurers, and especially to such as are able to serve the Crew in the Capacity of Surgeons—that I have already issued one hundred and twenty-one Commissions, to as many pri-ivate Vessels of War—that in the short Space of Time elapsed since the sixteenth of September last, the Prize Vessels arrived here, amount to one hundred and sixty-five, and their total Value, according to authentic Information, is above six hundred thousand Pounds, and that by these Captures, and the signal Success of the Ships of his Majesty's Navy, and other private Letters of Marque, the City of New-York is become an immense Magazine of all Kinds of Supplies, for a very extensive Commerce . . .”—Man. Com.
Cens. (1780), 880.
34 An insurrection is disclosed in New York by a negro. The band is said to consist of several hundred rebel conspirators who intend in case of arrest to set fire to the city. Some of them have been arrested.
In consequence, there is much anxiety among the soldiers in New-York.—Kemble's Jour., 51. See also M 20.

Grenadiers, Flank Companies of the Guards, 33d, and 42d. Regiments under Orders, and fourteen Transports proceeded to White Stone."—Kemble's Jour., 1779.
37 "The anniversary of St. Patrick, "the Tutelar Saint of Ireland," is celebrated "by the Natives of that Kingdom with their accus-tioned Hilarity." The "Volunteers of Ireland," preceded by their band of music, "marched into the City, and formed before the House of their Colonel, Lord Rawdon, who put himself at their Head, and, after paying his Compliments to his Excellency General Knyphausen, and to General Jones, accompanied them to the Bowery, where a Dinner was provided, consisting of five hundred Dishes; after the Men were seated, and had proceeded to the Joynment of a noble Banquet, the Officers returned to Town, and dined with his Lordship."—N. Y. Merc., Mar. 22, 1779.

CHRONOLOGY: THE REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD 1776-1783

Sir Charles Blagden writes from New York to Sir Joseph Banks: "The Troops still remain in winter-quarters; . . . Various reports of peace come in to us from the rebels; whether they really expect such an event, or mean only, by spreading those rumors, to keep the people more satisfied for a time, we cannot yet learn. No preparations are making on their side for a vigorous campaign; no quotas of men are appointed for the different States to raise, as in all the former years of the war. This conduct is inexplicable [sic] on no other principles than those of complete security, or absolute inability. Commissioners from us are to meet others on the part of the rebels next week, to settle the exchange of prisoners, which, after so many prevarications, is now thought likely to be effected on a liberal issuing." From original letter in N. Y. P. L. printed in Library Bull. (1903), 442.

"To be Sold! The well known and pleasant farm, called the Glass-House, Containing thirty acres of land. Enquire of William M. Adam, Hanover Sq."—Rivington's Royal Gaz., Ap 10, 1779. This place had been established as a glass manufactury and later was turned into a tavern.—See 0, 9, 11.

This date is found on one of Archibald Robertson's drawings (see, further, July 12, 1776), entitled "View of New York taken from one of the Redouts in the Lines thrown up by the Rebels behind Mount Pitt." This drawing is now in the collection of Mr. Harris D. Colt. See Frontispiece II, Vol. V.

Spain, by treaty, makes common cause with France against England; but the treaty is kept secret.—Winson, VII: 54, 55, 57, 178. War was declared by Spain on June 16 (p. 57). It is stated in a proclamation, issued on board H. M. S. "Rainbow," off New York, by Sir George Collier, "Commodore and Commander in Chief of all his Majesty's Ships and Vessels employed in America, from the North Cape on the Island Cape Breton to the Bahama Islands, and Florida inclusive," that "many Seamen have been lately inveigled from his Majesty's Service into Privateers, Letters of Marque, and Merchantmen, owing often to Drunkenness, and want of Consideration of the heavy Penalty attending such a Crime, which is Death by the Sentence of a Court Martial." Pardon is offered for such desertion to those who will return to the king's service within one month. Any vessel which "shall be found to harbour a Desertor, or in which a Desertor shall be found, will have every Man (except the Commander) without exception impressed for his Majesty's Service." The "Excuse of not knowing him to be a Desertor, will not avail or be received, unless the troop is perfectly clear that neither the owners, master or mate, knew of his being such."—Royal Gaz., Ap 17, 1779.

Kemble records that it is "Reported strongly that Admiral Byron had deflected the Port of St. Eustatius, destroyed five and taken six line of Battle Ships." He states also that "Commissioners Colonel Hyde and Captain Andre [have] gone to Treat with Rebel Deputies on an Exchange of Prisoners" (see Ap 17).—Kemble's Jour., 176.

Kemble notes: "the arrival of a Flag of Truce from Boston;" and that "The Commissioners, Colonel Hyde and Captain Andre [see Ap 14], are still at Amboy, and it is hoped will bring about an Exchange of Prisoners of all denominations. They went on this business the 13th. ultimo." (see Ap 23). He also records that "One of the Transports, with part of the flank Corps from Halifax, is lost on the Jersey Shore, and upwards of 100 Men and one Officer Drowned; they belonged to the 82d. Regiment."—Kemble's Jour., 176.

Leut. Von Krafft records in his journal: "I was in the little town of Harlem not far from where our camp had formerly stood. There were no inhabitants in it. All had left . . ."—Von Krafft's Jour., 84.

Officers and seamen belonging to the "Light Bob schooner privateer, Annamias M'Douggall, Commander," are ordered to report on board the schooner which lies at "Tolomeo's wharf, opposite to Lennox's Tavern, in Water-street," on or before April 26.—N. Y. Merc, Ap 19, 1779. Lennox's Tavern, according to later advertisements, stood three doors east of the Coffee House (Wall and Water Sts.), and carried a sign representing Capt. Joseph Brant (Thayendanegea), of the Six Nations. The tavern was also called the "Indian King." Lennox, who styled himself as "late of Philadelphia," (see Jr. 2, 1785, Vchcrs, etc.) a notice is issued by Commodore George Collier on board the "Rainbow," directing government officers to prohibit shore-leave for seamen after dark. —N. Y. Merc, Ap 12, 1779; Man. Com. Coun. (1803), 673.
March 26, 1785 (q.v.), but probably gave up tavern-keeping upon the withdrawal of the British army. In the spring of 1784, the sign of the Indian King had been removed to a tavern at 110 Water St. (see p. 312).

21 "Golf Players" are notified that, as the "Season for this pleasant and healthy Exercise is now advancing," "Clubs and the veritable Caledonian Balls" may be had by enquiring at the printer's.

22 "John M. Kenzie, Tavern Keeper, in Queen-Street, No. 35. Begs leave to acquaint the Officers of the Navy and Army, and the Respectable Public, that he has opened an Ordinary..."

—Royal Gaz., Ap 21, 1779. This tavern was known as the "Mason's Arms." A little over a year later, McKenzie became proprietor of Ranelagh Gardens, or the White Conduit House, at Broadway and Leonard St.—See Jl 15, 1780.

23 The Commissioners for Exchange of prisoners [see Ap 14 and 15] returned from Amboy, having been able to do nothing. —Kemble's Jour., 177.

At this time, the house formerly occupied by Judge Horsmanden was a tavern, the Cornwallis Arms, kept by Elizabeth Powers. —See her notice in Reviving's Royal Gaz., Ap 21, 1779. Cf. Mr 17.

24 Capt. Scott of the artillery shows me his "Map of the Province," says he, and I showed him the advantages of Fort at Verdigris Hook. He perceives them & laments that there is no Body about the General who knows anything of the Country. His Aid de Camps are all without Reputation—young & raw. Capt. André in best Repute & he has acted upon the Stage all Winter.—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

25 Lieut. Von Krafft teaches in his journal that, as he knows something of the desertion, he has been attached to assist at the redoubts which are being completed on "Lourall [Laurel] Hill," opposite "Fort Knippshausen." —Von Krafft's Jour., 84. 29 Letters from New York, by the last ships, give a very favourable account of the situation of affairs there. —Mr. Washington could not keep his army together, the desertion was so great, numbers coming in daily to New York; and that General Clinton disposed of them in the following manner; some he incorporated with the royal army, and new raised corps; some he sent to the navy and privateers, and others had portions of land allotted to them to cultivate near Kingsbridge; that the army were healthful, and the people in high spirits, not doubting but the rebellion would soon be at an end; and that a great number of prizes had been brought in by the privateers and cruisers. —London Chron., Ap 27-29, 1779.

30 Kemble records: "42d. Regiment, Regiment Prince Charles, Lord Rawdon's Corps, four flank Companies Guards, and one Company 82d. Embarked under the Command of Major General Mathews. Sailed the 4th. out the Hook, Conveyed by the Rationships of the 2d, 4th, and 14th, and destination supposed for some part of the Chesapeake or Delaware River, and intended as a diversion to favor the progress of General Prevot's movements into Carolina; but as a positive source it was the making of the Jason [rumoured in New York on Ap 27], and most of her Convoy, by three Rebel Frigates, with Provisions, &c., for the Troops, the Movement intended by General Prevost must be laid aside these Accounts received on the 1st, 2d, and 4th. —Kemble's Jour., 178.

31 "The dissensions among the rebels are still violent, though perhaps less so than two months ago; their paper currency is reduced to a 30th part of its original value, and the Indians are threatening their frontiers in the most formidable manner; but still I do not find that they relent, or that the French Party loses ground among them." —From letter written by Sir Charles Blagden to Sir Joseph Banks, preserved in N. Y. P. L. and printed Library's Bull. (1905), 441.

34 Wm. Smith is appointed chief-justice of New York.—American Loyalists, Audit Office Transcripts, XLIV: 617, in N. Y. P. L. Commenting on this appointment, Gov. Robertson said: "When I saw Governor of New York Lord George Germain then Secretary of State, after which this letter, destination supposed for some part of the Chesapeake or Delaware River, and intended as a diversion to favor the progress of General Prevot's movements into Carolina; but as a positive source it was the making of the Jason [rumoured in New York on Ap 27], and most of her Convoy, by three Rebel Frigates, with Provisions, &c., for the Troops, the Movement intended by General Prevost must be laid aside these Accounts received on the 1st, 2d, and 4th. —Kemble's Jour., 178. THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND of course, out of the question. "The object now... is to preserve such a connection with the Colonies in North America, as to unite the force of the whole empire, in time of war, for the common safety..."

"This object will be attained, if the Colonies acknowledge the same King, which involves the power of peace and war, and the rights of mutual natural subjection and succession." The author thinks that American independence would be injurious both to America and to Great Britain. He concludes:

"Till the late offers of conciliation were made to America, a great part of this Kingdom, were averse to the war... On the other hand, America was in general united, and few were our friends there... The contest is now entirely changed. The offers of Great Britain have been such, as become a brave generous nation, and have left nothing, in point of freedom, to be wished for, by our fellow-subjects. The rejection of these offers by the Congress, has dispelled every doubt, in the minds of impartial men, with respect to the justice of the war."

Pulteney reminds the people that a large amount of money will be needed to continue the war, for Great Britain "must be prepared to hold out for many years." He computes the total wealth of Great Britain to be £1,000,000,000, and shows that if each man were assessed 1% of his capital, to be paid by instalments in the course of 2 years, the sum of £1,500,000 would be raised, which "without supposing much economy, ought, with the ordinary supplies to support a vigorous war of two years at least."

Smith writes his diary: "The Town is alive with a Detach'd guard; all the houses before last [towards Hackinsack]—various Conjectures—Some expect the Troops back this Day—others say they are gone to take a Post up the river on the West Shore."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Kemble records the arrival of a "Vessel Express from General Matthew and Sir George Collier," with an account of important successes of the British at Portsmouth, Norfolk Co., Va.; and the taking of stores at Gosport, Va., intended "for the Continental Vagabond use."—Kemble's Jour., 178.

Kemble records nothing extraordinary, but a Report that Mr. Washington had set off in great haste for Philadelphia.—Kemble's Jour., 178.

The commandant appoints Jeremysum Alatyn and John Amory directors of the city watch, and decrees certain regulations and fines.—N. Y. Merc., My 21, 1779. See also Dawson's report on the city finances during the Revolution, printed in Proc. Bd. of Ald., LXXXVI: 217.

James Smither, Engraver and Seal Cutter, Late of Philadelphia, at the Golden-Head No. 923, in Water-Street, near the Coffee-House, and next door but one to Mr. Nutter's," advertises that he engraves "in the most elegant manner Coats of Arms, Seals, Maps, Copper Plates, and all other kind of engraving."—Royal Gaz., My 22, 1779. Smither returned to Philadelphia in 1786. For a further account of him, see Stouffer's Am. Engravers on Copper and Steel, ii: 254-55. Check-lists of his plates may be found in ibid., II: 490-91, and in Fielding's Am. Engravers on Copper and Steel, 253-55.

Charles Roubalct, later the proprietor of the City Tavern at 115 Broadway, opens an "ordinary" at 939 Water St., in the house generally known as Smith's Tavern.—Royal Gaz., My 22, 1779. See Ja 13, 1778.

Smith's Diary A Report by 5 Deserters from Peak's Kill that Fort Stanwix is taken—They came in at the Bridge last Night. It is credited by some.

"Great Preparations making for going out—Tis generally reported that they are destined up the North River. I wonder at it—Tis as if it were determined it should be known, but none however speak of the Spot for taking Post—in General that they are going ag't to the Highlands.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

A New York letter contains the following information: "Provisions are very plenty, and every thing else but groceries and naval stores. So many privateers are fitted, and such a call for ropes, &c. that cordage will bring an advance of 40 per cent. steriling on the invoice... The people at New York have feathered their nests; the success of their privateers, but, having swept the seas, prizes drop in but slowly at present."—Lloyd's Eur. Post, Je 25-28, 1779.

Congress adopts an address "To the Inhabitants of the United States of America." The opening paragraph reads as follows:

"Friends and Countrymen,

"The present situation of public affairs demands your most serious attention, and particularly the great and increasing depre- ciation of your currency requires the immediate, strenuous, and united efforts of all true friends to their country, for preventing an extension of the mischief that have already flowed from that source."

The emission of paper money is defended as an expedient "generally and successfully practised on this continent." Attention is called to the endeavour to prevent too frequent emissions by the establishment of loan offices "so early as in Oct. 1776." These demands, however, have been"for the want of a general acquiescence to the public exigencies." The situation is made worse, they say, by the "artifices of men who have hastened to enrich themselves by monopolizing the necessities of life" and by the "misconduct of inferior officers employed in the public service."

For the prosecution of the war to Jan. 1, 1780, it is estimated that $245,000,000 is necessary in addition to the $15,000,000 "required by a resolution of Congress of the 2d of January last." They further recommend to the states to pay "as much as can be collected as soon as possible into the continental treasury."

An expression of encouragement follows: "Think not we despair of the commonwealth, or endeavour to shrink from opposing difficulties. No, Your cause is too good, your objects too sacred, to be relinquished. We have been ready to sacrifice our lives, for cause you and your freemen who can hear us and may profit by us, and when they reach your enemies, we fear not the consequences, because we are not ignorant of their resources or our own." Hope is expressed that the French alliance may be followed by other alliances "on principles honourable and beneficial to these states."

The enemy appears to despair "of the success of their united forces against our main army," and are restoring "for predatory, desolatory operations."

Such being the case, "if you are assiduous in improving opportunities, Saratoga may not be the only spot on this continent to give a new denomination to the haffed troops of a nation inopiously priding herself in notions of her omnipotence."

The address concludes with the following exhortation: "Encouraged by favours already received from infinite goodness, gratefully acknowledging them, earnestly imploiring their continuance, constantly ex- deavouring to draw them down on your heads by an amendment of your lives and a conformity to the divine will, humbly confiding in the protection so often and wonderfully experienced, vigorously employ the means placed by Providence in your hands, for completing your labours."

"Fill up your barns—be prepared in part to repel the incursions of your enemies—place your several quotas in the continental treasury—lend money for public use—sink the emissions of your respective states—provide effectually for executing the conveyance of supplies for your armies and fleets, and for your allies—prevent the produce of the country from being monopolized—effectually interdict the behaviour of public officers—delegently pro- mote piety, virtue, brotherly love, learning, fragility and moderation—and may you be approved before Almighty God worthy of those blessings we devoutly wish you to enjoy."—Royal Gaz., Je 9, 1779; Penn. Packet, My 29, 1779. Commenting on this address, under date of June 5, Smith says: "They must know the money can not be raised in the Year—The Tax on N Y now raising is Half a Million of Pounds—Her Proportion of the 45 millions more of Dollars will be another Million & a Half in all 2 Million for this Year."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Kemble records "the Movement of [British] Troops on the 28th, in order to form an Encampment from Phillips's House on the North River, Extending nearly to the East River, keeping the Brunks [Brons] in great part on their front."—Kemble's Jour., 178-79. The particulars given by Capt. Robertson are as follows: "The following,"—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

A New York letter contains the following information: "Provisions are very plenty, and every thing else but groceries and naval stores. So many privateers are fitted, and such a call for ropes, &c. that cordage will bring an advance of 40 per cent. steriling on the invoice... The people at New York have feathered their nests; the success of their privateers, but, having swept the seas, prizes drop in but slowly at present."—Lloyd's Eur. Post, Je 25-28, 1779. May

The British take possession of Stony Point "w. out any opposition."—Robertson's Journal (M.S.). See J. 1.

Smith writes that he has been informed that Sir Henry Clinton embarked all his Troops at 10 last Night except 2000 which he has left under Sir Wm. Erskine at Philadelphia—at 6 this morning they were out of Sight—He adds that Sir H Clinton took Bombs with him which indicate a Design upon the Forts.—Govt is vastly mortified by being left at Home."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

About 40 refugees start on an expedition to Shoal Harbour which, on June 3, they attacked the houses of "some notoriously violent Rebels." The party returned to New York on June 3, bringing with them "27 milch cows, 7 horses, 2 waggons loaded with goods &c."—Royal Gaz., Je 5, 1779.

This plunder appears to have been disposed of at auction, for we find the following notice in the same paper: "To Be Sold, This Day at Public Auction, At the Bull's Head Tavern, in the Bowry Lane, between 2 and 3 O'clock tomorrow, several one very fine Ox, several Horses, Wagons, &c."—Ibid., Je 5, 1779. Similar advertisements appeared in ibid., Jl 10 and 16, 1779.

The British invest Verplank's Point and take about 70 prisoners.

After mentioning this, Robertson adds: "The Rebels cooeive Sr H's Intended to Attack West Point, wth appears an important object to them."—Robertson's Journal (M.S.). Wm. Smith says: "The manner in which it was reported, it cannot be doubted that Mr. W. E. of Wm. E.'s one very fine Ox, several Horses, Wagons, &c."—Ibid., Je 5, 1779.

Clinton reconnoitres Peekskill and makes a "Show w't Transports &c. to go up to West Pt."—Robertson's Journal (M.S.). Robertson sketched them.

Capt. Robertson writes: "Rebels said to have about 2,000 men in West Point & 2000 w't Mc Dougall between Fish Kill & Peak's Kill."—Robertson's Journal (M.S.).

This being the king's birthday, an "elegant entertainment" is given "by his Excellency General Tryon, at which were present the Governors of New-Jersey and North-Carolina, the Members of his Majesty's Council for the Province of New-York, the Judges and other Officers of Government. . . . every Tavern in the City and its Vicinity was crowded with Gentlemen, where all possible Demonstrations of Joy, Affection and Conviviality were expressed on the Return of this Festival, a Day dear to every Friend of our monarch, and illustrious SOVEREIGN, and the admirable constitution of Old England."—Royal Gaz., Je 5, 1779. Notice had been previously published: "The Loyalty of the Inhabitants of New-York is sufficiently known. The General requests there may be no Illuminations or Fire Works, the evening of his Majesty's Birthday."—Ibid., Je 2, 1779.

Washington passes through Pompton "from his Camp at Morris Town w't 5,000 men, to succour W. Point."—Robertson's Journal (M.S.).

Kemble records: "Sir Henry went down to Phillips' s; the Works at Verplanck and Stony Point begun."—Kemble's Journal, Jl 19, 1779.

Kemble is employed on these works, which, he says, were "near complete" on the 26th.—Ibid.

Abigail Adams writes to her husband, John Adams (who is in Paris), about prices in America: "Corn is sold at four dollars, hard money, per bushel, which is equal to eighty at the rate of exchange. Labor is at eight dollars per day, and in three weeks it will be at twelve, it is probable, or it will be more stable than anything else. Goods of all kinds are at such a price that I hardly dare mention it. Linens are sold at twenty dollars per yard; the most ordinary sort of calico at thirty and forty; broadcloths at forty pounds per yard; West India Indigo as high; molasses at twenty dollars per gallon; sugar four dollars per pound; bohea tea at forty dollars; and our own produce in proportion; butcher's meat at six and eight shillings per pound; bread at fifty and sixty dollars per week."—Familiar letters of John & Abigail Adams (1836), 365.

Smith writes: "Seven Ships ordered up the River & all the flat Boats. If one may Credit the Papers Washington is gone thro' from Ringwood to New Windsor . . . His avoiding the Clove Road shows his apprehension that the West Forts are the Object & that he is fearful they may be taken before he could pass the Clove. But then I should imagine he would halt at Goshen and either Case Sir Henry [Clinton] should seize the Mouth of the Clove & carry his Main Body into Jersey."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

A newspaper contributor, signing himself "Americanus," gives an extract of a letter from a Virginian to a friend in Philadelphia, in which the Virginian says: "we should have had peace this spring, had it not been for the—execrable faction." Commenting on this, "Americanus" declares: "when this bleeding country is told, that an execrable faction prevents peace, it is but natural to enquire where this faction is, who compose it, and what are their views. Congress alone are invested with the powers of war and peace; this faction must therefore be in that Body, or he be so powerful at least without doors, as to influence a majority of the votes within. From what this gentleman has positively asserted, and from the general execration which have been raised against the proposals of peace have been made from some quarter or other. Every one will agree that peace is an object most devoutly to be wished for, if to be had on safe and honorable, as well as just and equal terms . . . it is reported that the debates and delays in Congress, on the terms of the treaty proposed to be opened, have arisen from the desire and wishes of some men to include in it certain objects of their own profit, which were not in the momentary thoughts of any part of the declaration of independence, or of the concluding the treaties of Paris: In a word, that a right of fishing on the Banks of New- findland shall be acknowledged and guaranteed to these States, and that such an article shall be made a sine qua non of the treaty. . . . The delaying the resolutions, as to the terms on which we are willing to treat, has already produced the most mischievous, if not fatal effects; on our commerce as well as navigation, which neither the declaration of independence, nor the treaties of Paris, authorized us to challenge as our rights, has caused the late, otherways unaccountable delays, and prevented a peace, or at least a negotiation being opened for one, those who have challenged and insisted on those claims are justly responsible for all the consequences."—Penn. Gaz., Je 23, 1779. This article was republished in the Royal Gazette for July 7, and invoked a comment from William Smith in his diary of the same date (q.v.).

Smith writes: "A Report that there is a Fleet of armed Vessels from Philad: att the Hook & that one of our Frigates is taken by the Dutch, was the cause of many Loud exclamations and taking for the most part a serious aspect.—This last April & agt the Ministry for not dispatching the Reinforcements & British Fleet sooner & agt Sir George Collier for not sending out the Reasonable & Camilla."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

Blagden writes again to Banks: "I have now the satisfaction of informing you that our Army has taken the field, and met with some little success in the capture of two posts which the rebels had fortified to command an important pass over the North River, called the King's Ferry, about 44 miles above this town [New York]. We have now been raising works at the same place, & made it a very strong post. . . . About 12 or 14 miles further up the river, the rebels have a very strong Fort, at a place called West Point, with a numerous garrison, & every provision for a stout defence: M'h Washington's Army is also moved to cover it, but we do not know here that Sir Henry Clinton has any intention of attacking it. An Expedition was sent last month into Virginia, which met with great success in destroying large quantities of stores belonging to the rebels, & in bringing away a fine boat, which is to be divided between the navy & army employed upon that service; the first instance, I believe, of a regular division of service in America this war. But all are very much dependent on you from your side of the water, & hope you will send us peace, the negotiations for which, as the rebels give out, are very far advanced, but on such terms that we cannot credit them. The best symptoms of distress I can perceive among them is the excessive depreciation of their paper-money, which is now so great that [their] bills will scarcely answer as a means of commerce; in some places, especially within reach of the gold & silver circulating from this army, one silver dollar will purchase thirty of paper!—From original letter in New Y. P. L., printed in Library's Bull. (1901), 443-44.

Robertson records in his journal that, "to stimulate the Militia to turn out," a "Lye" is propagated that there is a "Report of Our Army in Carolina being heat by the Rebels 14th May—w great Loss."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

A letter from New York states: "Our force here, and on Long and Staten Islands, if the regiments were complete, would exceed 20,000 men. As it is, our army is very respectable. I compute it at 15,000 men. . . ."

"It has been talked of here to offer the rebel Officers the same rank they hold under their Congress, on coming over to us. It is thought this would give us the whole rebel army.

"The people have been so harassed and plundered by the Congress that the whole country is almost unanimous for a submission. One fifth of the able-bodied men among them have already lost their lives. Their tradesmen enter on board their merchant ships and privateers to prevent their being sent a soldiering as they call it.

"There is a general want of provisions and cloathing in the Northern Colonies. Ladies of the best families, for more than two years past, have only worn sacks made of woollen, and even linen rags sewed together, instead of shoes. Indeed on the sea-coast shoes and stockings are got, but at an immense price—a pair of shoes 45. sterling; a hat double the price."—London Chron., Jl 22-24, 1779. Cf. T. Todd, p. 52.

"Twenty-three members of the Chamber of Commerce meet in the Upper long room at the Coffy House" and draw up the following letter to Lieut.-Gen. Daniel Jones:

"We beg leave to inform your Excellency that the Subscribers are Members of a Society known by the Style and Title of a Chamber of Commerce which, before the present unnatural rebellion, met under certain regulations (of which we have the honor of including a copy), and determined the principal matters relative to trade in this City.

"The good effects of this Institution having been felt and acknowledged by all persons concerned in Trade, and the increase of Commerce encouraged by the Proclamations of his Majesty's Commissioners, together with the success of Private Ships of War, has induced the Merchants in general (who are ready to join us agreeable to our regulations) to solicit a renewal of our Meetings in order that the many mercantile differences which so frequently happen may be adjusted.

"As Commandant of the City, we esteemed it our duty to lay before you the intent of our proposed meetings and at the same time we beg leave to assure you that our assistance, when called upon will always be ready to facilitate the Public good." This was the first meeting of the institution since May 2, 1775.—Col. Rec. of N. Y. Chamber of Commerce, 1768-1784, 204-4. Lieut.-Gen. Jones answered the letter on June 25 (p. v.) The "Coffy House" was the Merchants' Coffee House, at the s. e. cor. of Wall and Water Sts.—L. M. R. K., III: 979.

Smith writes: "The Ministry seem to desire the common Censure of neglecting to forward Intelligence as well as of Inactivity in the Prosecution of the War."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

In response to the letter of June 21 (p. v) from the Chamber of Commerce, Lieut.-Gen. Jones writes:

"I have laid the Letter you favored me with before the Commander in Chief, and I have the Pleasure to acquaint you that his Excellency approves of the Gentlemen, and of the Chamber of Commerce renewing their Meetings as formerly. I was happy to hear of this Institution and regret only that I have not had the benefit of your assistance sooner to procure to New York every advantage our present situation would admit of, which I have always had much at Heart. You may therefore Gentlemen be assured every Proposal coming from you, for the good of the City, shall meet with my hearty concurrence and assistance, and when I quit this place in a few days I shall recommend to my Successor the usefull assistance that I think may be drawn from your Institution."—Col. Rec. of N. Y. Chamber of Commerce, 1768-1784, 205. See Jl 10 and Ag 3.

Extracts from letters of this date from London are published by Rivington. They declare that it is the "determination of Government, never to relinquish the object of reclaiming the Colonies;" also that parliament has failed to pass measures "for renewing the Conciliatory Bills, and appointing Commissioners, to treat with America upon this express principle, that no negotiation could be admitted but upon previous application and concessions from the colonies."—Royal Gaz., S. 4, 1779. Smith wrote in his diary, on Sept. 5: "Rivington's Paper . . . contains a Letter of 26 June hinting a Design to continue the War till America is reduced & I think I have heard that a Motion to continue the Offers of the Commissioners to America was rejected. It was made by Hartley of the Opposition. I believe I saw it in the London[on] Chronicle of 18 June."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

A New Jersey justice of the peace speaks thus, according to Smith, of conditions in that state: "The Militia every where tired of the War—A Tax of 1 Million this year on Jersey—Last year 100,000. He thinks the Million will be raised for he paid £20 last year & that will call this year for £200.—It will be but a cow worth £150 & a Call worth £50—Such the monstrous Depreciation—Many however will be ground to Powder by such a Load for a Law is made to ingage 10000 of the Militia for a Defence of Jersey—In every Regiment Volunteers will turn out for a Bounty given by the Rest to prevent Drafts—He thinks it will be not less than a £1000 per Man—This on the Back of the Tax will occasion great Dissipation & from the Disgrace of the Volunteers not serve the End of the Usurers—They may assist in putting their Employers to Flight."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Tryon writes Vice-Admiral Arbuthnot that the crews of privates that have been fittet out at New York number over 6000.—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII: 772.

Bonhomme Collin (Ap 13) issues a proclamation forbidding privates to anchor outside the Hook, on their return from cruising, and landing their prisoners on Long Island. The owners are required, instead, "to direct their Vessels when they return from their Cruizes, to bring to near the Guard ship, in Order to their being properly examined, and not to shew so much Disrespect to the King's Colours, as to make Sail away, when they see the Guard Boat come to receive them." He threatens with dismissal and loss of pay any government pilots who go on board merchant vessels "when Men of War are not supplied with them, who may want to come in over the Bar."—Royal Gaz., Je 30, 1779.

Chilton issues a proclamation which reads: "Whereas the Enemy have adopted a practice of enrolling negroes among their Troops; I do hereby give Notice, That all Negroes taken in Arms, or upon any Military Duty, shall be purchased for a stated Price; the Money to be paid to the Captors. . . . But I do most strictly forbid any Person to sell or Claim Right over any Negro, the Property of a Rebel, who may take Refuge with any Part of this Army: And do promise to every Negro Who shall desert the Rebel Standard, Full Security to follow within these Lines, any Occupation which he shall think proper."—R. J., Jl 11, 1779.

Smith says he has sent to Gov. Tryon a new draft "for a Project to draw into Service such Refugees as will not become Soldiers."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith records that Gov. Tryon has left the city "to attack some part of Connecticut."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. See Jl 4.

"By the Threat of pouring many Detachments into Connecticut I have led Sir Henry to draw Washington into that Country. So far right—I was always of Opinion that this Colony would be the first to renounce the confederacy."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"Rivington has published this Day the Paper I gave him," says Smith.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. It is in the form of a letter, with a signature, addressed to "Mr. Rivington," and reads in part as follows:

"It was a coarse but true observation of the late Jenny Otis, that the filth of the political Pot had got upon us; and we know that now, the most reputable part of the community, rarely attend the elections. It is an undoubted fact, that in Connecticut the public officers have been of late voted in, by less than 100 voices in towns of two hundred and a thousand electors. What wonder then to find, Waggoners, Blacksmiths, Butchers and Tavern-keepers on the list of Generals; and in their councils, Pettifloggers, Parish Schoolmasters, fraudulent Debtors and Bankrupts. . . ."

"I only add, Sir, that if you can persuade your correspondents, to give you an abstract of the constitutions of the respective republics, with an account of their civil and military officers, and to state their former and present burthens, you will have the clearest demonstration, that the rebellion is in the hands of mean agents, and abhorred in every colony by a vast majority of the inhabitants; and by detecting the false representations made to France, prevent even that kingdom from being a refuge, to those who are hourly sucking the heart's blood of America, and sending off their spoils, resolved upon a turn of affairs, to spend them in the dominions of a Prince, whose subjects have the highest reason to execrate the men, that have seduced him to violate a treaty, with the whole British Empire, for a destructive and scandalous compact with only a weak and divided branch of it."—Royal Gaz, JI 3, 1779.

Sir Wm. Erksine and the Cork fleet sail for England, and an expedition under Gen. Tryon goes "up the Sound."—Robertson's Jour, 1779 & 1780 (M.S.). Wm. Smith says that Tryon went immediately to Stamford and Norwich, and that on the 5th he was at New Haven. His plan was to have proceeded to a British a Hessian & Fanning herd with 500 of the associated Refugees from Rhode Island—a Regt more from here with 2 Companies of the Guards & 2 of Light Infantry."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI, under JI 7 and 8. See also Kemble's Jour, 1780, in which, however, it is erroneously stated that the landing at New Haven was on July 7. See JI 10.

"An Address to the Inhabitants of Connecticut" is issued by Commodore Collier and General Tryon. It reads in part: "The ungenerous and wanton Insurrection against the sovereignty of Great Britain, into which this colony has been deluded by the artifices of desperate and designing men, for private purposes, might well justify in you every fear, which conscious guilt could form, respecting the intentions of the present armament. Your towns, your property, yourselves, lie still within the grasp of that power, whose forbearance you have ungenerously constricted into fear; but whose lenity has persisted in its mild and noble efforts, even though branded with the most unworthy imputation. . . .

Reflect upon what gratitude requires of you if that is insufficient to move you, attune to your own interest: We offer you a refuge against the distress, which, you universally acknowledge broods with increasing and intolerable weight over all your country.

"Leaving you to consult with each other upon this invitation; We now do declare,—That whatsoever shall be found, and remain in peace, at his usual place of residence, shall be shielded from any insult, either to his person, or his property; except such as bear Offices either Civil or Military, under your present usurped government: Of whom it will be further required, that they shall give proofs of their piety and voluntary submission; and they shall then partake of the like immunity.

"Those whose folly and obstinacy may slight this favourable warning, must take notice; that they are not to expect a continuance of that lenity, which their inveracity would now render blameable.

Royal Gaz, JI 7, 1779.

Wm. Smith says: "I suspect this Address to be the Composition of Cap't André one of the General's Aids de Camps who has probably been sometime at Work to frame a Substitute for that I drew for him before he went up the River & which he told Mr Tryon he did not like nor another that Mr Elliot had sent him."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI, under JI 3.

Congress passes a resolution "That Margaret Corbin, who was wounded and disabled in the attack on Fort Washington [see JI 16, 1776], whilst she heroically filled the post of her husband who was killed by her side serving a piece of artillery, do receive during her natural life, or the continuance of the said disability, the one half of the monthly pay drawn by a soldier in the service of these states; and that she now receive out of the public stores, one complete suit of clothes, or the value thereof in money."—Jour. of Cong. (Ford ed.), XIV: 805.

In 1903, the Mary Washington Colonial Chapter, Daughters of the Am. Revolution, erected a tablet to the honour of Margaret Corbin in Holyrood Protestant Episcopal Church at Fort Washington Ave. and 179th St.—Kelley, Hist. Guide to the City of N. Y. (1915), 161.

Robertson's Gazette, says Smith, "shows the acumen of the Loyalists ag' the popular Chiefs" in a poem entitled "The Times." July 6

The opening lines are:

"When faction brandishing her horrid sting
Infects the people, and insults the King;
When foul sedition skulks no more conceal'd,
But grasps the sword and rushes to the field;
When justice, truth, and law are in disgrace,
And treason, fraud, and murder fill their place;
Smearing beneath accumulated pain
Shall we be silent? Shall we not complain?
We will, we must; the mighty Laurens frown,
Or Hancock with his rabble hunt us down.
Should Atley summon to his savage bar,
To tremble at his nod be from us far.
Champions of virtue, brave & mild profusion
The guards of Washington, the lies of Payne,
And greatly brave without one anxious throb,
The wrath of Congress, or its Lords, the Mob."

—Royal Am. Gaz, JI 6, 1779; Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI, under JI 3.

There is a Composition [see Je 13] in a Philad. Paper of 30 June [error for Je 23] which [Rivington] has copied in his [issue of this Day that supposes Great Britain] to have yielded to the Independence & that France has advised to Peace but that a Party in Congress opposes it insisting on the exclusive Fishery.

"Can this be," says Smith, "an indirect Way of giving Credit to a Lie to animate the People!—It is artificial—There are Papers since calling the Author a Tory & defending those who will not agree to give up the Fishery. This strengthens the Delusion.

"Yet there is a Perhaps that the British Ministry have given Hints of their Readiness to yield the Independence to prevent France from sending Land Succours resolved at the same Time to improve this Summer in subduing the Colonies. They may have withheld the Reinforcements upon the same Principle to loll the Colonies aderup till it is too late to call upon France for Aid this Year."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

An order regulating the price and assize of bread, issued by order of the commandant from the office of police, requires that a loaf of bread shall weigh two pounds, shall be marked with the baker's initials, and shall be sold for 14 coppers; also that ship bred of the best quality shall be sold at £1:10 per hundred weight. Bread that is defective in quality or deficient in weight shall be forfeited to the alms-house.—Royal Gaz, JI 10, 1779. Cf. Ja 22.

New assizes were fixed on F 18, and Mr 15, 1790 (p. 8).

The British army marches from its Camp at Philipseborough. One division goes to Mamaroneck, the other towards White Plains.

—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

Sir Henry Clinton, with a division of the British army (see Ja 8), reconnoitres "the Old Camp the Rebels had in 1776 on the White Plains," and then goes on to Byram River. Robertson says: "saw Geo. Tryon's Fleet in the Sound, The Intention of our move I believe was to move Washington Accross the North River— & to set him in Motion."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.).

A writer signing himself "A loyal American," addresses a very lengthy printed paper "To the Dis-United Inhabitants of the Dis-United States (so called) of America." It is a pro-British appeal, closing with: "Fear God, Honor the King," and may you be approved before Heaven worthy of those blessings that Great Britain is devoutly wishing you, 'as Freemen,' to Enjoy." One of these broadsides (4-page folio), taken from a bound volume of the Royal Gaz. for 1779, where it follows the number for July 10, is in the N. Y. P. L.

Smith writes: "The present menaces at Connecticut take off from the Suspicion that the Publication by Tryon & Sir George Collier [see Je 4] were too vaunting to compel to Submission. I thought such a trifling Force as I had at first heard of (1200) would raise Contempt & barely irritate."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

"Tryon recommends to Clinton the establishment of an "Office of Enquiry" headed by two "Intendants." This office would be authorized "to examine all persons coming into the British lines, of every rank and class," and to make inquiries at large. He recommends as "Intendants" William Smith, "Councillor of this Province," and Lewis De Rosette, "Councillor of North Carolina," whom he characterizes as "Gentlemen of the first abilities & every way qualified for so laborious a task."—N. "Rivington prints an account of the "Proceedings of a Detachment of the Royal Army under the command of Major General Tryon" (see Jl 14). This detachment was divided into two divisions, one under Gen. Garth, the other under Tryon. They repulsed the Americans at New Haven, Fairfield, and Norwalk.—Royal Gaz., Jl 31, 1779.

"Commenting on this, Smith says: "Mr. Tryon can think of no other Objection Sir Henry can have to his Report, but his Dread of its discovering a zeal for the Interest of the Nation & the Conclusion of the War & that its crossing his private Politics, by which he had not been brought for what he would wish to do he has enough upon Tryon's System to end the War. In Rivington's Paper of yesterdays: is the greatest Part of his Report to the Gen'l but his Reasons for Desolating out left—it came from the Gen'l but Rivington had Orders not to shew the Extract to any Person."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI, under Ag 1.

"Speaking of Tryon's expedition, James says: "It was not a mere busyness in conciliating the dissident. It occasioned rancor and inveteracy, and instead of conciliating, it widened the breach. Whether the General exceeded his orders, or not, or some other motives occasioned it, he was upon his return to New York received at head quarters with the utmost coldness. And he adds in a footnote: "William Smith’s influence with Clinton, it was said, occasioned this coldness." He further characterizes Smith "as a spy for the rebels" (see JA 13, 1776).—Jones, Hist. of N. T. during Rev. War, I: 315.

The following report is sent by private letter from Orange Co., N. J., dated Aug. 2: "Lord Cornwallis, who is arrived at New-York, we hear surpasses Sir Henry Clinton. To was Cornwallis, we are told, who first proposed and strongly recommended, deposition, burning, and the utmost horrors of war, as the plan of proceeding against America."—N. T. Jour., Aug 9, 1779. A letter from Philadelphia, dated Aug. 11, stated: "By accounts from New York, it is said Lord Cornwallis took the command in chief on the first inst. and Clinton, Tryon, Vaughan and Gray, are to return home."—Ibid., Ag, 30, 1779.

"Mr Tryon visits us this morning," says Smith, "& asks us to dine with him and a number of officers, from which I excused myself. He thinks André went down yesterday to put his Report on Board of the Packet, tho’ the Genl had told him Friday that he should not send it home on account of the Justification in it of the burning Fairfield & Norwalk."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Peter Dubois, magistrate of the police, is "with us at Tea," written in Smith’s Diary, Aug 3. On Aug 27th it turns to "the ill regulated State of the Town as dangerous to Health," he (Dubois) "plants at Mr. Mathews the Mayor." Later, when it is hinted that St. John, who is still a prisoner, is "the Sport of the Vindictive Rage of the Refugees, he desired me to walk towards the Gate with him & then told me what follows.

"That a Paper was put into his Hands that came from the Country person—that St JJohn had acted the Part of a Loyal Subject and was at Length confined—that a General Stevens got him released & after that he was less frank.—Then when D’Entagne arrived he talk’d favorably on the Issue of the Rebellion & reconciled some loyalists who had been as averse from it himself—That he was 6 Weeks in the Rebel camp with La Fayette.—That he & other French officers were at his House. That he corresponded with Gerard.—That he was promised a Place of Consequence at the End of the Troubles—That he was now here with the Consent of the Whiggs as a Resident.

"Dubois says he knows the Handwriting & it comes from a Person of Character & one who has access to the Rebel Chiefs but is a Loyalist.—That it was given to him open 3 Months ago & he del’d it to the General.—That he observed to the General that St John was brought before him & the Letter Consisted of Hearsay & not the Informers own Knowledge.—That the General did not think fit to order St John to be taken up for a Long Time. when he had got in to Trouble about his own Letter to his Wife.—That 2 Days before Nich. Ogden came to Town he was questioned concerning what he had done with this Letter three in one Day on a Letter from Nich. Ogden. That when Nich Ogden came to Town more was said of it and Govr Franklin interposed and got St John Committed.—The first Hope was to find that the Information had been sunk (?) by Dubois, who told Nich Ogden that he had given it to the General & hinted the Propriety of not exposing himself to St John’s Resentment & the Danger of listening to loose Scandal.

"He followed this with Censures upon Nicholas & Isaac Ogden as revengeful & Mathews as a Man without Principle & devoted toavarice & one of the worst of Men.—That he had lately sent in a List of suspected Persons naming all with whom he had differed to the present Commmd General Patton. That he spoke slightly even of Mr Elliot as a Rebel & Mr Elliot let him alone as supported by Govr Tryon.

"This is a Lesson for the Erection of Civil Government & to me shows the Necessity of my accepting the Office of Ch: Justice for Protection & that I must at the same time incur the Wrath of the Refugees under Mathews Influence to whom Civil Govr must be the Loss of Power & Gain. [Inasmuch as no “Erection of Civil Government” came about during the British occupation, Smith, who was appointed on May 4 (q.v.), never actually functioned in this office."

"This Information from Dubois confirms the Propriety of Mr Colsen’s Conduct & mine in declining to be Bait for St John till we could know what the Charge was—Dubois does not know that the Letter from the Country is founded upon Intelligence from Mr Wickham but says a Person intimate with the Ogdens said so & he believes he got it from them. This may be Colden. I kept my Promise to Isaac Ogden & was silent only observing that Wickham & St John were sworn Friends & Wickham Friends here were still Friends to John. I mentioned Judge Ludlow & This year Duncan his Brother in Law had spoken of St John’s Confinements last Friday with Anxiety.

"I perceive also a Confirmation of my Suspicions that Elliot was desirous to bring in Colden & myself for Ball to gratify his Resentment against Mathews & the Ogdens who speak ill of him, but if Mr Elliot knew the Evidence of St John he ought not to have declined of his advice when I asked him if he considered this a Part of the Agreement before Genl Patterson but to have allowed rather my present Enquiry into the Cause of the Commitment as well to avoid the Suspicions of Govr Franklin & the Refugees as out of Deference to St John.

"At such Times & thus surrounded the greatest Circumpection is necessary and one should keep but little Company & of the best Sort."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), V.

The St. John referred to by Smith was Michel Guillaume St. Jean de Crèvecoeur, author of Lettres d’un Cultivateur Américain. Though he was a naturalized New Yorker (see D 23, 1765), the appearance of a French fleet in the harbour caused him to be suspected as a spy, and he was imprisoned for three months.—Letters from an American Farmer (1904), Introduction. For his description of New York, see 1766.

"I found the Town very despondent last Night on Reports from the West Indies that La Mott Piquet had joined D Estigny with 7 Ships & 15 Frigates & 90 Transports & taken St Vincents & the Grenades while Byron was convoying the Island Trade to Windward & that the two Fleets had engaged off the Grenades & that we kept the Ships but lost 1000 Men. That there had been a fresh, partial resistance by the Greyhound of Piquet sailing 1 May & return damaged by a Storm. I cant reconcile this with the Saturday news from St Eustatia—the 18 & 22 Ships in distinct Divisions is too much for the French or English Fleets and if the 18 were English and endeavouring to escape why so far to the North & to the Leeward of our Windward Islands instead of directly before the Wind to Jamaica?—We have no West India Papers. Tin said Sir George Collier stop’d them there at the Hook on Sunday. Strange that he has loitered so. It was thought he was not out yesterday the Wind being at N. E.—It is yet from that Quarter—He is spoken of in Terms of the utmost Freedom as a negligent Officer, devoted only to Gain."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

The commandant requests the chamber of commerce "to lay before him a Table of such Duties as you think ought to be allowed to Cartmen in this City," for "Those now established were first by the Gentlemen of the Old Insurance Office, at a time when Provision was higher, but Forage lower than at present."—Col. Rec. of N. T. Chamber of Commerce, 1768-1784, 210. The suggestions of the chamber were embodied in the orders of Sept. 16 (q.v.).

Having debated the question since Feb. 23 (p. v.), congress finally formulates the conditions of a peace with Great Britain. They include the acknowledgment by Great Britain of the independence of the United States, the acceptance by her of certain specified boundaries of the United States, and the evacuation of all American posts by British troops. Also, "the common right of fishing" is not to be relinquished by the states.—Jour. Cont. Cong. 1778, 1779, XIV: 928-945. See S. 77.

"My appointment to the Chief Justices Place [see my 1q] is in every Mouth."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith writes: "I fear a general War in Europe. If Spain interferes Russia & Prussia may also ingage—L J. Cornwallis understood that these Powers had entered into Treaty with Great Britain & that a catarogical answer was demanded from Spain—a Report that Russia offered us 10 Ships & 20,000 Men for 3 Years for Minorca. Should this be true & Spain declare agst us America will be pardly neglected or may find Russians amongst them & at the End of the War be divided.—Our Calamities are then only commencing."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Spain had declared war on England, June 16 (p. v.), but the news did not reach New York until Sept. 1 (p. v.).

Smith writes: "The Measures of the Town Meetings in the
The regulation of prices checks the depreciation of money—but it ought to alarm the congress. Its natural tendency is to produce a general scarcity. Julian the Emperor put it to Experiment and brought it to Rome, & so would Philip the Handsome with his dependents among their own partizans—Every Murrumcer becomes a Tory; and Miserly lessening the Party, the populace will regain their authority to the subversion of the new frames contrived for supporting the usurpation. Everything in this country predisposes to a union but the foreign war retards the operations for improving them. Wrought on a frame at Albany & so would Philip the Handsome.

A set of gentlemen propose playing a cricket match this day, and every Monday during the summer season, "on the cricket ground near Brooklyn ferry." The company of "any gentleman to join in the set in the exercise" is invited. "A large booth is erected for the accommodation of spectators."—N. Y. Merc., Aug. 9, 1779.

A private letter from New York states: "I have nothing to write home to you from this place, for my health is not so good as it was before. I am with privateers, Stony-point fort on the North River stormed by the rebels, since retaken...if anything material is done this season, I believe it will be to the southward."—N. Y. Jour. (Poughkeepsie), S 20, 1779.

News reaches Trenton that "the enemy [British] are very busy, throwing up works and fortifying on New-York Island, at or near Hooe's Hook, within several miles of the city, from river to river; that they have lately sent out of New-York, a number of whig families; impressed all the carmen and other persons to the number of about 700, and put them on board armed vessels; and that they have drawn a line of ships across the Narrows; in consequence, it is said, of their fearful apprehensions of the arrival of a French fleet in that harbour, which has thrown the city into much confusion and consternation."—Penn. Packet, Aug 21, 1779; N. J. Gaz., Aug 11, 1779.

Speaking of Gen. Patterson, Smith says: "There is now set up by this very commandant music every evening at the church walls [see Aug 19] what a medley assembly there! A horrible contrast!—Ladies in the walk—The mobb in the street & funerals crossing the company to the church yard. The parson there ordering the whole to leave.

"It would appear as if he were turning the war merely into a defence—all the troops except the garisons at the highlands are called in to this island...Isaac low hints that there is a talk of cutting a passage across this island from river to river & that Gates is at Byram with 4000 men. Tryon knows nothing of it. M. G. took back 12 pages yesterday from him to Philadelphia to Saratoga—Some look for an attempt to burn this town. Others for an attack at Staten island—Some for a French fleet. Lord stirlings division is come down to pompton out of the clowve."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"How scandalous," says Smith, "is the conduct of administration & the naval officers under them—The privatering business languished & the owners are selling out at the rate of 6 vessels in a week—Their prizes are taken off of the hook & sometimes the privaters. The rebels make this their cruising ground & send several armed vessels in concert—There is a want of naval strength here. When the frigates are in these seas they are too often & too long in the port—We have taken no french vessels for several months past—it would seem as if the French merchants were tired of this commerce."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

This morning the powder-magazine at fort kniphaasen was torn down and the wood-work used on forsed hill [forest hill, on which fort tryon stood—see L. M. R. K., III: 965]. Likewise the wood-work of fort independence & King's bridge, which was transported in wagons.—Penn. Jour., 90. Sept 21. 1779.

In the early morning of this day, Major Lee and about 400 of the troops under orders from Gen. Sterling execute a surprise attack upon the garrison at powles hook, and capture about 160 prisoners; they send these to Philadelphia.—N. Y. Jour., Ag 23; N. J. Gaz, 1, 1779. See also Winsor, VI: 559. Robertson gives the date as August 18.—Robertson's Jour. Campaigns 1777 & 1780 (MS.). See also Kemble's Jour., 182-83.

Smith says of the incident: "...We had lost 40 men carried off...are killed in a man from an ox at 20 yards. Sir Henry is going down Hill in point of reputation."—Dr. Baily says the firing began an hour before day.—No troops went over till an hour after sunrise..."—2 ships arrive from Quebec—all well there 16 July—Many troops gone to the western forts.

How shamefully he acts in not dispatching the fleet earlier! What mischiefs from the want of naval strength on the coast.—We hear constantly too that nothing can be done on the land side till the reinforcements arrive.—This is the plea for every blunder & for an infamous inactivity. The contrarion of our lines is laughed at even in the army. It is pertinent as'd why a party could not have crossed from King's bridge to execute what a muskirk from this place at almost blood & fire from the Post of Poultis Hook? The boys in the army hint their contempt of the general, & the common soldiery murmurs. They begin to despair of the fulfillment of the promises of land, made in 1775 at Boston.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

The diary of the Moravian congregation states: "...Recently the walk by the ruins of Trinity Church and its grave yards, has been rained through several times in the night, so that they have been cut down & crossed by the negroes. This has been done because they painted so many lamps found in the trees, for gentlemen and ladies to walk and sit there in the evening. A band plays [see Ag 1] while the commander is present, and a siren is placed there, that none of the common people may intrude..."—Penn. Mag., X: 427.

Admiral Arbuthnot and his fleet arrive from England this 25 morning. Smith says: "...They are said to be 76 vessels—only 2 yards are battle ships.—No ships are lying at anchor, none has been bought nor received with the defiance to Quebec—some to Newfoundland with another ship of the line—they are to rendezvous here..."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI; see also Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Kemble states that "the troops in general are unhealthy; between 4 and 5 thousand."—Kemble's Jour., 183.

"Up to date we have had a surprisingly large number of sick, which increases daily."—Penn. Jour., 92. A similar entry appears under Sept. 2.— Ibid. See S 8.

"At a meeting of the loyal refugees of the province of New York, at the house of Mr. Amory in the fields...for the purpose of electing a committee, to unite with the committees selected by the loyal refugees of the other provinces, for the purpose of corresponding with each other, and transmitting some other business, as they should conceive conducive to the interest of the whole," it is agreed that no one shall be elected or appointed a member of a committee of correspondence who at any time or in any way has taken active part with the "rebellious americans."—Royal Gaz., Ag 19, 1780. Gov. Tryon issues a proclamation of Spain's declaration of war against great Britain (see Je 16). The proclamation reads in part: "Authorities are arrived for granting Letters of Marque, and until the same are obtained, I have it in command to signify the royal assurance to the owners of all ships hearing Letters of Marque against the French king, and his subjects, that his Majesty will consider them as shipped under an Oxford share of all ships and property which they may make Prize of."—N. Y. Merc., S 6, 1779. Under date of Sept. 8, Smith wrote: "Mr Tryon published last Monday in Gaine's Paper the proclamation I drew for him last Friday."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI.

That there is lack of harmony among the British officers, is revealed by Smith in his diary: "Sir Henry [Clinton] is thought little of in the Army There are Dissentions in his [official] Family. He has quarreled with Lord Rawdon his Adjutant General & Major Drummond whom he sent Home to get a Regt of Horse & the Paym of £5000 sterling of an old Debt to his Father—Yet he reproaches Drummond with doing nothing for him. Neither of them go near him. Collo Stewart 'tis said is to succeed Lord Rawdon—he has made 2 new Aids de Camp [,] one his cousin Lord Thomas Pelham Clinton the Duke of Newcastle's 2d Son the other a Mr. St George an Ensign of £1000 per annum. He has not a sense of the honor & respect due to him about. I have all this from Capt. David Scott of the Artillery. So speak Sir Henry Clinton & I believe the Sentiments of Genl Patterson with whom he is intimate & from whom I stand aloof. Scott faults the Commander in Chief for calling in the Troops all Summer to this Island—Thinks they might have saved dry Forage by laying on the other Side of the Hudson—that Tryon should have gone out stronger in July & not have been recalled so soon; Scott is intimate with Mr Tryon."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Von Krafie records in his journal under this date: "On account of the large number of fever cases . . . we could not spare more than 20 men per regiment for work. In the future, "before Condemnation of any dutiable Prize Goods," the agents shall "make a Return to the Superintendent's Office of all such dutiable Prize Goods, that the same may be regularly weighed and gauged." Sir Geo. Collier returns to New York (see Jl 28) from Penobscot, and from him Kemble obtains and records the following account of the events in that section: He reached Penobscot on Aug. 14, "with one 64 and 4 Frigates, and the Rebels that very day burnt all their Arms & munition of a high value at Pitttown of S. Champlain with his Gun Ship; their Frigate Warren burnt with about 28 Sack of Transports; the Crews from the whole Landed, and made their way thro' the Woods in a sad plight to Boston. They landed on the 28th. July, about 14,400 Troops besides Marines, from which time to the 14th. August they had besieged Brig. Gen. McLean, who was entrenched on an Advantageous ground with about 800 Men; Several Shrimps were landed and are going to erect a strong work, and the General, with his Troops, must have fallen in the end, if not relieved."—Kemble's Jour., 184-85.

Smith writes in his diary: "'Tis said Washington has but 4000 Effectives & the Army so scant as to have but a Weeks Provisions a Head—They have so exhausted this Province that the very Forage comes from Connecticut and all Bread is brought from Pennsylvania.—A Sorty of the British Army would much Embarrass the Continental Troops—It would be worth the Experiment to push with a Fortnight's Provisions to New Windsor thro' the Clove."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"Peter Dubois speaks of David Mattaus the Mayor as a Prodi- gate & Villain, making Money by various unjustifiable Means." That he has set up what he calls a Recording Office held by one Child, to take the Proof of lost Papers—That a Guinea is paid for the Mayorality Seal to a Certificate which the People are taught to have a legal Substitute & Child is going mad besides.

"That he sends out Parties into the Country to plunder & he has a Share of it.

A resolution is passed by the assembly requesting the governour to issue a proclamation, "Strictly forbidding all Persons whosoever to plunder the inhabitants of Long-Island, or any other Place in the Power or Possession of the Enemy, within this State . . . ."—Assemb. Jour. (London ed.), 47.

Orders are issued by the commandant of the city for all the male inhabitants of a proper age to assist in throwing up works on Governors Island. The number of inhabitants it was imagined amounted to 4000, half of whom were to go on fatigue one day, and the other half on the ensuing day, Sundays not excepted.—N. Y. Jour., O 29, 1779. "In a Jersey Paper of 22d Sept I saw an Address from the Congress to the People at large of 1st Sept stating their Paper Issues &c and animating them to a Prosecution of the War. It is a Proof of great Celerity & yet discovers Fear and a Dread of their Dis- cords."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"This Country may be said to induce a Pestilence—It can't be called a very Mortal Season but I never knew so prevalent a Sickness [see S 23]—Agues and Intermittents are the common Affliction—In some Instances the Fever is malignant carrying the Patient off in a few Days.—The aged drop off under the Ague—Some lie long under nervous or remitting Fevers & die when they are putrid.—While I am writing three of my Children are down and my Brother's Son Abraham,—Ivy the Coachman has had the Ague but is recovered.—We are a Hospital at this House—Mr. Stuyv- ens Family is generally disposed—We have had eleven or 12 sick at a Time—Scarce Hands enough well to attend the Diseased.—This is not the Case only within the British Lines but all along the Sea Coast of New England and in Jersey & Pennsylvania. Would it to God that the common Affliction Might incline both Parties to Peace & quieten the Period of our Deliverence from the Calamities of a destructive War.

"The Season of Winter advances & the Town is destitute of Fuel severel causes,—(1) The diseased State of the People in the Country—(2) the Lack of Captive in the Sound—Several Wood Boats lately taken the armed Vessels drawn to the Hook. (3) The General totally negligent of this Matter—Had he posted 2000 Men on Bergen Neck after his retiring in July from West Chester the Citizens & army might have been supplied in 10 or 14 Days for the Year—But what is worse Management the Horse have been Oct. ever since upon dry Forage and how they are to be supplied thro' the Winter seems to be no Part of his concern, but it fills the Loyals with concern—They in general grow despondent.—Of the Military Government all are impatient & regret the Delay of General Robertson Nothing can be more injurious to the King's Interest than the negligent andunterende conduct of the Army—In the Despair arising from unfavorable Prospects as to the Issue of the Struggle every Disguist works Disaffection—General James Pattison of the Artillery has been for some Time Commandier—He is warm rain & warm Saturday Evening a drunken Soldier of the Guards forced himself into a Cart driven by a Negro in the Bowery Lane. Dr Baily who saw him thrown off & thinks the wheel ran over his Breast, stop'd his Chais & led him to a House & sent certain passing Soldiers to notify his Condition at the Hospital—The Prevost Marshal called the next Day & took Baily to the Jail, where he remained till 10 at Night—He was not carried to the Commandier—This Man is injured & told me to Day he would demand Satisfaction or Leave to go Home or Leave to quit the British Lines, averse to continuing any longer under Military Governm.—In short a Day scarcely happens that Multitudes are not offended. I foresaw this and spoke and wrote freely on the Subject to Lord Carlisle & M^ Edn. Tryon will do nothing. Sir H Clinton has frowned too much upon his Office as Governm. Nothing more interpose. Can the Necessity of the Council I recommended—and as Lord Geo: Germaine according to M^ Patterson's Letters was in the Opinion of erecting the Civil Authority Last Winter he must deserve much Censure for not sending out the New Governor earlier. Can it be that he dreads to offend Sir H Clinton & lose his Services—That very Timidity shows him incompetent for all of a Job. To the same distant & the Spirit I impite his letter of the 5th June to the General to act at Discretion & his flattering applause of the March thro' Jersey Last Year—"—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Maj.-Gen. Patterson orders that some of the convalescents from the general hospital "be lodged for a time in the Barracks near the Provost Goal."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 277.

Gen. Tyrone, the New York state pass containing a request to "Counsellors, Solicitors or Attorneys at Law" before April 31, 1777, and providing for the issuance of new licenses to any qualified person who "has conducted himself as a good and zealous Friend to the American Cause, since the Commencement of Hostilities by the King of Great-Britain." This law was passed because many heretofore licensed lawyers had "gone over to, and put themselves under the Protection of the Arms of the Enemy, and conducted themselves in such a neutral or equivocal Manner, as has justly rendered them suspected of disaffection to the Freedom and Independence of this State."—Laws of N. Y., 7d sess., chap. 12.

"Head Quarters removed to New York [meaning, Clinton's reture]. Lord Cornwallis's Corps ordered to be in readiness to Embark, suppose for Stony point."—Kemble's Jour., 186.

"A manuscript writes to London Town, requesting an attack upon New York by D'Estaing's fleet (see O 4). He says: "We have been indefatigable in making every Point of Defence as Strong as Time will permit, in raising a Battery at the Light House, lining the Heights of Staten Island & Long Island at the Narrows with Cannon, repairing all the Batteries at New York & planting the heavy Guns lately arrived, upon them, as likewise repairing the ruined Fortifications & Batteries, erected by the Rebels on Govern- or's Island. But the Difficulty was to find Hands to perform this last Work, owing to the very Sickly State of the Army and the great number of Troops already employed in carrying on extensive works of Defence, in the different parts of this Island—and on the opposite side at Brooklyn. I therefore called a Meeting of the principal Inhabitants of the City, and stated to them the Expe- diency of the Citizens taking up the Spade & Pick-axe, to defend & secure their own Property, against a Foreign Enemy. They most readily & obligingly met my Wishes, and the next Morning five hundred Citizens were at Work throwing up Earth, &c &c on Gov- ernor's Island—they still continue their Labour with great good Will and Cheerfulness, and are now formed there into a regular En- campment—A great many of the most Capital Merchants & Shop keepers pique themselves upon working with the rest, & will receive no Pay or Reward.—The Lower Class are paid at the Expanse of the City at the Rate of Ten Shillings Currency per Day, and their Rations of Provisions from Government."—N. Y. H. S. Collections

11 Kemble records: "Sir Henry Clinton went up the North river, leaving the 7th, 23d, 33d, and Volunteers of Ireland Embarked, to proceed to Stony Point, under Lord Cornwallis, should they be wanted."—Kemble's Jour., 187.

15 David Sproat, a Loyalist of Philadelphia, having joined the British troops at New York, is appointed commissary-general of naval prisoners. He continued in this capacity until the end of the war. See J 11. "Upon his appointment he at once set to work to release the naval prisoners then at New York and by the following year had exchanged 15,000 and had a balance of 600 due."—David Sproat and Naval Prisoners in the War of the Rev., by James Lenox Bangs (1909), 4-5, 42.

17 The legislature of the "State of New York" passes "An Act providing to prevent Robberies within this State." This requires people who have been robbed to make an oath before a justice of the peace concerning the circumstances of the robbery. The justice must then "cause Hue and Cry," and all able-bodied men in the district must answer and help in the pursuit of the robbers. If the property is not recovered by these means, the justice is to call a meeting of the other justices in the district, the supervisor, assessors, and collector, and assault the robbers on the "Persons in the said Town, Manor, Precinct or District, who have not manifested themselves attached to the Liberty and Independence of America."—Laws of N. Y., 3rd sess., chap. 19 (printed by Holt, 1782).

18 The trend of British affairs is significantly told by Kemble in the following record: "Received Accounts by a Privateer of an English two decker being taken on the 27th, September off Tybee, by twelve Sall of the Line, French; the English Ship had been dismasted; supposed to be Sir James Wallace, from every Circumstance."

19 "Sir James carried upwards of $30,000 for the use of the Troops in Georgia. A Rebel Paper, also received this day, says that the French fleet had taken two S. Calle's, besides the Brigant, &c., making the total, and twenty-five hundred Men, supposed to be the Troops at Beaufort, under the Command of Lieut. Col. Maitland."

20 "How must our Commander in Chief feel with all these blows, added to his own Conduct, despised and detested by the Army, his unheard of Prerogation in the first Departments of Boys not three Years in the Service, his neglect of old Officers, and his wavering, strange, mad Behaviour."

21 "If Government does not remove him soon, our Affairs in this Country will be totally undone."—Kemble's Jour., 188.

22 "All the Rebel Papers," says Smith, "show that the French Fleet is expected. If not fine Stratagems are concerted to lead us to believe it—Gaine's Paper intimates the Collecting of 50,000 Barrels of Flour for it—The Philis' Paper has a Preamble to an Act purporting that much Bread will be wanted—Reported that Washington has called Sullivan's Troops & L4 Stirlings to him & a Part of Artillery from Connecticut for some great Enterprise."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

23 Buildings in New York are appropriated for the use of the British forces, for which purpose a printed circular demanding possession is issued by W. Collier (1785), 280, 282, 387-88.

24 The diary of the Moravian congregation states: "Of late we are under some apprehension that our chapel might be taken for a hospital. The old Dutch Church, the only one in use for the Dutch, has been desired, and at the end of this week will be taken for that purpose."—Penn. Mag., X: 428. See O 29.

25 "The troops are all in high spirits at New York, wishing for nothing so much as a second visit from d'E ста г i о this winter, which they were very well prepared to receive."—London Chron., Oct 16-19, 1779.

26 "Great Offence is given by Gen'l Patterson to the Physicians and Surgeons for not providing Barracks for the Sick who are numerous & in Tents near Greenwich—Yesterday he determined to put them into the new Dutch Church, that has neither Floor nor a Close Window.—To Day he devoted the old Dutch Church to this use to the Distress and the Howl of the Poor People who have a shipp'd in it. The Hospital desire the New Brick Meeting formerly taken from them by Gen'l Daniel Jones but Pattison will not find other Stores for the Artillery Articles there deposited by Commisary Grant. The Commandant becomes odious—Tis said his Emoluments amount to 500 sterling a Day, and that he shews intolerable Partialities to oblige & gratify the Officers of the Train at which they [the people] riot for General Robertson's Arrival."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

27 The British evacuate Stony Point. "The Rebels came upon it instantly after it was left & fired at the Ships from the Western Shore down to Tappan Bay."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI, under date of Oct 25. See O 26.

28 New York State passes "An Act for the Forfeiture and Sale of the Estates of Persons who have adhered to the Enemies of this State, and for declaring the Sovereignty of the People of this State, in Respect to all Property within the same." This act of attaint declares that the estates, both real and personal, of 59 specifically named loyalists, including many well-known residents of New York City, are forfeited to the state, and that they themselves are forever banished from the jurisdiction. It also makes the act of monthly indictment and trial of all persons found within the state after the passage of the act, who are suspected of loyalist tendencies, their death (as in all cases of felony), and the confiscation of their property, on conviction. It vests all crown lands in the people of the state, and authorizes the appointment of commissioners, for the sale of all confiscated estates, their powers and proceedings being defined.—Laws of N. Y., 3rd sess., chap. 25 (printed by Holt, 1782); J Gleenleaf, 341. Vass Tyne, The Loyalists (1902), 195, 249; Gerard, Treatise (1872), 3. See Mr 10, 1780. 29 Kemble records: "Heard the Garrison of Stony Point were Embarked."—Kemble's Jour., 188. On Oct. 23, he continued: "That they were Down to Spilling Devil Creek, and that the Troops were Embarking heavy Artillery at Rhode Island."—Ibid.

30 The legislature passes an act "to provide for the temporary Government of the Southern Parts of this State, whenever the Enemy shall abandon or be dispossessed of the same, and until the Legislature be convened." It applies to the counties of New York, Suffolk, Queen's, King's, and Richmond. It provides that the person administering the government of the state, the president of the senate, chancellor, judges of the supreme court, senators, assemblymen, secretary of state, treasurer, lieutenant governor, and any seven of them, of whom the person administering the government shall always be one, shall be a Council," with power to make ordinances for certain purposes. These purposes are: preserving peace and good order; preventing a monopoly of any of the necessary commodities of life, or of any goods, wares or merchandise within the state; prohibiting their exportation beyond this district; billeting troops; seizing and impressing fuel, forage, vessels, horses, teams, carriages, and drivers; supplying the markets within this district with provisions, and regulating their prices; holding and regulating elections for senate and assembly, and city and town offices (particularly "to prevent Persons charged with, or suspected of Disaffection to the Freedom and Independence of this State, from being elected, or being elected, at such time or in such office, and to confine anyone charged with treason or other offence. The powers of this council shall cease" on the sixtieth Day after the first Day on which they shall meet, or on the first Day after a Quorum of both Houses of the Legislature shall be convened, after the Enemy shall be driven, or be disabled of the Southern District of this State, whichever shall first happen."—Laws of N. Y. (1779), chap. 28.

The act was printed in No. 1 of Holt's Ind. N. Y. Gaz., on Nov. 22, 1783, with a supplementary act of March 27, 1783 (q. v.); and in subsequent issues Holt published the later supplementary acts of Nov. 28, 1783 (q. v.), Dec. 15, 1783 (date of publication, 5th), Dec. 17, 1783 (q. v.).

"The Mail of last Saturday" (O 23), recorded Smith on Oct. 25, "threw the Town into Consternation by alarming Letters of a menaced Invasion & certain Intelligence of the Superiority of the Combined Fleet in the Channel. It increases the Rage ag' the General for the Inactivity here.

A Vending for Rhode Island with an Account that the Troops will be here to Morrow, & that the Countermand was not sent there before the Evacuation. Arbuthnot with the Troops for Halifax still at the Hook—No Confirmation yet of the Landing French Troops in Georgia or of the Loss of the experiment with Sir James Wallace—Conjectured that the French Fleet has met with a Storm and that he pass'd disabled Vessels. A Vessel from St. Kitts in 12 Days, says that D Estavazo was on the Georgia Coast & that Parker's Fleet had left Barbadoes In Pursuit of the French."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Kemble records: "this day my Resignation [of O 15] was accepted by the Commander in Chief, and Captain André, 54th, declared in orders as my Successor."

Orders to evacuate Rhode Island (see O 23) are countersigned by Clinton. Smith notes that those orders came "after all were gone, and the Word dismanted the Gardens cut up & miserable dietu much Forage burnt for want of Vessels to bring it off[th] our Harbour is Crowded with unemployed Ships. We shall now by crowding these Islands increase the Miseries & Disagts of the Farmers.—Another Ill Effect of the Neglect of the Scheme of Policy I have so repeatedly urged in my Letters to Ld Carlisle & Mr Eden."

Robert Biddulph, in a letter from New York concerning the progress of the war, says: "We have evacuated Stony Point & Rhode Island. I imagine the Object is to keep Halifax & this Place, which by the Dillgence and Perseverance of the Scottish Merchants is become very valuable. New York in itself seems as little worth consideration as any Place of an equal Number of Heads can possibly be defended by a force for such a Bye which can only be pass'd at certain Times of Tide—the Ice in the winter either Cuts them to Pieces or makes them entirely useless. . . ."—Mag. of Hist. (1915), XX: 122–23.

"The Garrison of Rhode Island came to N. York that Island was evacuated."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Kemble records its arrival under Oct. 29—Kemble's Jour., 189.

As shooting with bowling-pieces near the high roads has caused fatal accidents, the commandant publishes a notice that he "judges it necessary for the public safety, to prohibit all such Bowling near the environs of the city, or within half a mile of any high road or public frequented foot path . . ."—Royal Gaz., O 27, 1779. It was necessary to repeat the order in the following year (Royal Gaz., O 28, 1780), and again on Oct. 25, 1782 (ibid., O 26, 1782).

"This Morning, about 2 o'Clock, Lieut. Col. Simcoe, with about 100 Cavalry, landed at Amboy, and proceeded to Bound Brook, where they destroyed 18 flat Boats and some Stores; they then continued their route to Somerset Court House, released the Loyalists confined, set fire to it, and destroyed a large quantity of Forage and Stores collected for Mr. Washington's Army. On their return South Side, near two Miles of Brunswick, they were fired upon by a large body of Rebels in Ambush, whom they Charged and dispersed, but Colonel Simcoe, having his Horse Shot or falling under him, was taken Prisoner; one Man was Killed and four taken."

—Kemble's Jour., 189.

The Vestry of Trinity Church resolves to present the following communication to the congregation of the Dutch Church: "It being represented to this Corporation by one of its members, that the Old Dutch Church in this City is at Present used as an Hospital for His Majesty's Troops. The Board Impressed with a Gratitude Remembrance of the former kindness of the members of that Ancient Church in permitting the use of their Church to the Members of the Church of England when they had no proper Edifice of their own for that purpose Offer to the Members of the Antient Dutch Church the use of St George's Chappell for Celebrating their Worship on Sundays and such other Times as they shall Choose to perform Divine Service. They hope from nine to Eleven o'Clock in the Morning and from one to three o'Clock in the Afternoon will be convenient to the Members of the Dutch Church. If these hours should be very inconvenient to the Members, they will Endeavour to meet their Wishes as far as they can consistent, with the Duty they owe to their own Congregation."—Trin. Min. (MS.). Rev. Mr. Inglis wrote to the secretary of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, on Nov. 26, 1779, explaining the relations between the Dutch and Episcopal churches. "The loyal Dutch," he says, "contined in the City on sufferance by the Dutch Troops, & a loyal Minister officiated for them."—Extract from the Society's documents, London, made by Rev. F. C. Hawks, filed with Hawks MSS. in Church Mission House, N. Y. City. St. George's Chapel was relinquished by the Dutch congregation in April, 1780 (q. v.).

Baroness Riedesel, wife of Gen. Riedesel, while staying at the house of Gov. Tryon (the site later of the Bank of New York), wired: "I have no idea whether it is possible for your Troops, & a loyal Minister officiated for them."—Extract from the Society's documents, London, made by Rev. F. C. Hawks, filed with Hawks MSS. in Church Mission House, N. Y. City.

Another residence of General Clinton [the Beekman mansion] where we went, was an hour's ride from the city. The ground was beautiful, as was also the house but the latter was arranged more for a summer residence, and, as we had come there in the month of December, we suffered much from the cold.

During the night, however, we had such a terrible storm that we believed the whole house would be overturned. As it was, an entire balustrade actually fell down with a dreadful crash; and, on getting up the next morning, we saw that on account of snow having fallen during the night four or five feet on the level, and eight to ten in drifts, it would be utterly impossible to venture forth without sledges."—Baroness Riedesel continues with an interesting account of her new dwelling in town being fitted up throughout with mahogany furniture, the cost of which is to be defrayed by Gov. Tryon; and of her acting as queen of the ball on the celebration of the birthday of the Queen of England. See Jan 18, 1780.

She describes the suffering caused by the cold and the scarcity of firewood, which cost £10 a cord. "I have paid myself one piaster (which is a crown with us) for a single stick. The poor were obliged to burn fat, in order to warm themselves and cook their meals." One Major Brown, to relieve the needs of Madam Riedesel, gave an order "to cut down some of the trees in the great avenue in front of the city; and when this proceeding was objected to on the ground that it would make considerable damage, he replied, that it was much better to spare a few trees than to have a family, who had served the king with so much zeal, suffer from want." They also "broke to pieces an old and worthless ship" in order to furnish fuel.—Baroness Riedesel's Letters and Journals (trans. by Stone, 1864), 168–69.

It was doubtless this battalion which on Nov. 3, was ordered to be "to be Cantonned at a place called Bowery Lane in the Vicinity of this City," while the "Barracks intended for them are fitting up." The barracks office was in Maiden Lane.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1872), 201.

Gen. Patterson orders that the "Provincial Stores" be "removed from Lippennards Brewery," and that workmen fit it up as "Barracks for the Troops."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 290.

Judge Thomas Jones is captured by a party of Whigs (under command of Capt. Daniel Hawley, of Newfield, now Bridgeport, Conn.), at his country-seat on Long Island, and taken to Connecticut as a prisoner of war. May, 1776, for Gen. Silliman and his son.—Sabine, Loyalists of the Am. Rev., I, 590.

Gen. Patterson informs Rev. Mr. Hourial that "there is no intention at present of处置-giving" him "of the Seeders Meeting House" (the Scotch Presbyterian—see L. M. R. K., III, 932), and that "nothing but the most urgent necessity can ever prevail on him to appropriate any Place of Public Worship."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 293.

The public is warned against "Gamblers," in an advertisement which reads: "The Market People and others, are cautioned against being enticed into Public Houses, or other Places by Strangers pretending Business with them, as there is a most infamous set of Gamblers in this City, who have lately defrauded sundry Persons frequently of a great Sum of Money, after inviting them into Taverns, under pretence of wanting to buy Country Produce."—N. Y. Merc., N. 8, 1779.

"I find every Day a prevailing Opinion in the Army of the Strength and Obedience of the Rebelion & the Impracticability of reducing it. They judge from the Opposition they meet with & are totally inattentive to the Deblity of the Independents, the Number of the Loyalists, & the Difficulties of the Continent. General Patterson heard me with surprise & what is worse with Pain. General Stirling wondered at my contempt of the Rebel Army as but 800 & would consider the whole Militia as Soldiers. I asserted[,] but it was not grateful to them[,] that the Rebels were a minority who governed by the army & that this reduced the Loyalists would overturn the usurpation. . . . Can it be wondered that the General in hale Prayon who is of my Sentiments while they have a Defect of public Spirit are sailing with Impatience for a Return to Europe & the Rejoyning of the Plesures of London &c."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

The following advertisement appears under the heading "Theatre Royal: "Such Ladies as are duly qualified, and inclined to perform on the stage during the course of the ensuing winter, will please to communicate their intentions to the Managers, to be left at Mr. Rivington's."—N. Y. Merc., N. 15, 1779.

To keep the wharves as clear of vessels as possible during the winter, for the safety of the city and the preservation of the shipping, Maj.-Gen. Patterson issues a proclamation ordering that, after Dec. 15, no vessel shall be allowed to lie at or near any wharf without permission of the superintendent of the port. Private ships of war and trading vessels may have permits for not over 15 days for repairing, fitting out, loading, and unloading. Captured vessels are to have permits, good for not over 15 days from the date of their condemnation, to dispose of their cargoes. Merchants, owners, and masters of such vessels as are not employed, and are not in the service of the government, but intend to winter at New York, are ordered to remove their vessels to Newtown Creek by Dec. 15.—Royal Gaz., N. 27, 1779. A similar order was issued in Nov. or Dec., in 1780, 1781, and 1782.

"Rivington's Paper of this Day contains an Address from the Citizens to Genl. Patterson of which I had not any previous Information—It offers Military Service to enable Sir Henry Clinton to extend his operations. This is a Prompter which I fancy the Genl.'s friends in this City would have given him, but the Complainse of the Commandant I like less. I know not what intitles him to the least Applause. There must be great Serenity in the Town if it is true as reported that on Parson Inglis's Objection to St. George's Chappel for a Hospital & urging his appropriating the Play House for that use, he declared his Refusal to part with it & ordered the Scotch Seceding Church for a Hessian Hospital.—Tis certain the Pews were taken out of it yesterday to the Disgust of the Lutherans & Presbyterians who worship in it as the Low Dutch & English Episcopalians have done in St. George's Chappel ever since the old Dutch Church has been a Hospital by the Commandants Direction a few Weeks ago.—Neither of their measures yield to Prejudices friendly to the Royal Interest."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"The Rosebud private arrived [at New York] from St. Augustine, w^ a late acct of the French & Rebels being beat at Savannah in Georgia, w^ they attempted to take by Storm the 9th Oct. This is to the effect that D'Estaing at the Head of 10 or 12000 French & Americans had been repulsed in an assault upon Savannah 9 Octl with the loss of 3000 men & not more on our Side than 40 odd. That D Estaing received a Shot in the arm & Polaski in the Grijn. That the French & Americans were at Strife for an indiscriminate Plunder by the former in the latter & for the French to their Ships & the Americans to Charles Town that 8 Ships were gone to Europe 12 to the West Indies & 2 of the Line with some Frigates were gone to the Chesapeak for Supplies—that the whole Fleet had been crippled in the great Storm of the 11th Sept but we had lost the Experiment the Ariel & Fowey.

"How shameful that we should be uninformed before this late Day respecting the Situation in the South Country! and that we have been so inactive here, while the Enemy were busy there. Had Lord Cornwallis sailed as was said to be intended to Jamaica had not the news of the French Fleet prevented (vid 27 Sept) we should have commited a horrible Blunder—What advantages might now be expected from Reinforcement to Georgia?"—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. See also Kembel's Jour., 189. This British victory was celebrated on the 19th (q. e.)

"This evening, after sundown, there was loud siring to express the joy felt at some great advantages which the English were reported to have gained over French and Rebels in South Carolina."—Vol. Kaffir's Jour., 98. Capt. Robertson says: "A Feu de joie was fired by all our Army at N. York for the Success over the French." (See N. 18.)—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

British garrison orders of this date at New York state that the Commandant had received "many and frequent complaints of the inhabitants being ill treated by officers and servants quarter'd upon their houses;": that "good discipline and the duty he owes to the citizens under his protection cannot permit him to suffer any act of oppression or irregularity to be practis'd in this garrison, & that all officers will pay due observance to the barracks regulations lately established for the more just allotment of quarters" (see O 18).

"Some Officers having likewise taken upon themselves to commit citizens to the Main-Guard, contrary to an order given by Lieut. Gen. Jones, late Commandant; Major General Patterson now finds it necessary to confirm the said order and to direct, that no citizen or person, except by authority of the General, or by an Officer, or an Order sign'd by a Magistrate of Police, unless in case of some violent breach of the peace." Redress is promised to officers who receive ill-treatment from citizens.—Royal Gaz., N. 27, 1779.

J. Mervin Nooth writes from New York to Viscount Grinston: "Since our arrival nothing has happened sufficiently important to deserve your attention; and, (entre nous,) we expect nothing enduring under our present commander [Clinton]. Nothing, surely, can be more shameful than our perfect inactivity during the whole summer and autumn . . . For God's sake let us have a man of resolution or abilities."—Trevlyn, The Am. Revolution, Part III, 397 (footnote), citing the original letter preserved among the manuscripts of the Earl of Verulam at Gorbahmury.

Rivington's paper, says: "Mr. Shoemaker contains an Address from a Committee of Refugees from each Colony except N York to Sir Henry Clinton. New York Mt. Shoemaker tells me he had refused to join in it & protested at associating with any who had ever been of popular Committees—I suppose it is the Fruit of my Refusal to be of a Committee for Reasons explained to Mr. Shoemaker sometime ago as well as to Samuel Mabbet John Keane John Kelly & others.—I look forward to a Body that will give Council with Authority when General Robertson arrives. The address proposes no Project of Tendering advice pro re nata. If it did it would probably have been slighted. Shoemaker had also refused to Meet this Body."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Sir Henry Clinton issues a proclamation which states that "the approaching season [which proved to be one of the coldest winters on record—side infra] requires every exertion to obtain immediately a quantity of Fuel for the use of this city, as also to secure a daily supply of that article to those, whose circumstances will not admit of laying in sufficient quantities for the wants of the winter. He has orders that persons who have cut wood by permission on Long Island and Staten Island shall immediately bring it to New York. "Such as have not the means of cutting it themselves to the towns, are ordered immediately to apply to the Colonels of the Militia of the District, who have instructions to employ the neighbouring farmers in that service, and to settle the rates of cutting for the same.

"The price allowed forfordwood at this market [see N. 38, 1758], cuts off every pretext from the well disposed proprietors of Woodlands for delaying cutting of their woods." — Royal Gaz., N. 24, 1779. The allowance of fuel to the soldiers was reduced and the indigent were in much distress on account of the scarcity.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 302, 304, 306. See D 22.

Martin Doyle notified the public that he has opened a "Purl House," at the sign of the Faithful Irishman and Jolly Sailors, in King-street, next door to the Queen’s Head Tavern, where may be had at any minute in the morning, if you please, a glass of excellent Purl piping hot." — Royal Gaz., N. 24, 1779. This "Queen’s Head Tavern" was also called the Queen’s Head Tavern and Indian Chop House. It stood on Brown-John’s Wharf. "Purl," a popular drink of this period, was a kind of medicated malt liquor, in which wormwood and "aromatics" were used.—Sheridan’s Dictionary, 1796.

Marshall and Stanford advertise "accommodation for Gentle- men" at the "Shakespeare Tavern, Opposite the Theatre Royal, John-Street," where they can "depend on being furnished with the best provision, liquors, &c. this city can afford."—N. T. Merc., N. 30, 1779. So well known, this is the first mention of a tavern in New York by this name. Before 1806, the sign of the Shakespeare Tavern was changed to "next door to Park Theatre," that is, on Park Row, between Broadway and Nassau St.—N. Y. Com. Ada., O 22, 1806. By 1809, it had been removed to the corner of Fair ( Fulton) St. and Nassau.—See Ap 5, 1809.

On Dec. 30, Lodge No. 210 of the "Ancient York Masons" cele- brated the anniversary of their Patron St. John the Evangelist" at this tavern.—N. T. Merc., Jl 3, 1780. On July 10, 1780, it was the appointed meeting-place of the Marine Soc.—Ibid., Ji 10, 1780.

"We are told that General Washington is to canton his Army this Winter in the County of Morris, in New-Jersey, between the Town of Morris and that of Mendem."—N. T. Merc., N. 29, 1779.

Smith justifies his statement that Clinton and Arbuthnot are "bullies" by the following narration: "Sir Henry gives the Feast of St. Andrew this Day at his Own House himself in a Dress of Plaid presented to him by Major Small—He tried it on two or three Days ago & being called down to Lord Cornwallis replied no not for the Lord God Almighty—A Heroic Speech of the Nature of Arbuthnots who when requested to restore a Man impressed said not if Jesus Christ will not help him. These Talkes so current that few can help believing them to be true."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (M.S.), VI.

Robert Biddulph, in a letter from New York, says: "... the origin of every Report is at a place called Rivington’s Corner—which is at the Bottom of this [Wall] Street. Before the door of that most facetious Printer you always see a Crowd of Red Coats, who as naturally repair there after Breakfast, as the Ox to his crib before breakfast, to hear and assist in the circulation of anything that may be stirring. Within is the Venerable Rivington himself, cloathed in a long gown, & may very properly be called The Priest of the Temple of Falsehood.

In all New York papers you must read a great Deal of the Coffee House Bridge, which is within 5 yards of M’R’s. This is appropriated to the Merchants, who meet upon this miserable Scaffold, for many good purposes, among the rest to endeavour to lower the Exchange. They may be called the Scotch Invasion. This must be very entertaining to you, but I assure you it is an exact picture of this city.

"We have as yet no public places, but are to have plays in a short time, by the Officers of the Army & Navy. They very much want Actresses, or otherwise will not be inferior to Jersey. It is an old Family and several Families in several agreeable people of the Army; nobody is more Subject to change their opinion than myself, at present, I like this place very much, & would not leave it without much regret. ..."—Mag. of Hist. (1915), XX: 124.

Kemble embarks on board the ship "Echo" at Staten Island for Jamaica.—Kemble’s Jour., 190.

"The Tory writers had now given up, for the most part, any attempt to convince the Whigs of their error. The die had been cast by the action of the sea—news of the battle in the sea, no more, nothing but news of the battle in the sea. It was pointed out in the Tory press that Whigism never had been anything more than the privi- leged of every fixed principle in politics. The Whigs of Charles I’s time were ‘regicides and republicans,’ and in Cromwell’s they were ‘levellers,’ and in the time of Charles II., Puritans. Now, if the Whigs establisht their republic, they ‘will reduce all men into a state of nature,’ and perhaps the next step would be to cut off the legs of the tallest, that no man might look over the head of his neighbors."—Van Tyne, The Loyalists (1902), 255-54, citing Royal Gaz., D 1, 1779; Ja 12, 1782.

Gen. Pattison writes to the board of ordnance that the "De- mand for 12 P’ Iron Guns, for the New fortified Lines near Fort Kusshausen, from the North, they ‘will reduce all men into a state of nature,’ and perhaps the next step would be to cut off the legs of the tallest, that no man might look over the head of his neighbors."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 143.

Gen. Pattison orders "that the necessary Repair, wanting in those parts of the City Hall, at present made use of and occupied by the Military, be immediately begun and carried on by the Barr- rick Office." These repairs are included "all the Rooms in the East Wing, and the Stair Case leading to them, likewise the Room allotted for General Courts Martial, with the small ones adjoining to it, two pair of Stairs in the East Wing, as also the Stair-Case leading to those Rooms." The fire-place "in the Room allotted for the Non Commissioned Officers and Privates of the Main Guard" is to be given first attention.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 305.

It seems to gain Daily Credit," notes Smith in his diary, "that the Congress are at their Wits End and have sent Overtures for Peace. About the Time Jay with John Adams with Gerard left the Capes of Delaware 3 Weeks since Samuel Adams sailed from Boston.—There is no stopping the Depreciation of the Paper Money. Reed laments the State of public Credit in plain Terms that he falsely calculates him. These Talkes are so current that few can help believing them to be true."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (M.S.), VI.

One of the taverns of the period is the "Chequer Tavern and London Porter House," in Cherry St.—Royal Gaz., D 4, 1779.

Col. John Laurens, aide-de-camp to Washington, writes to his father, Henry Laurens, president of the congress: "Confidential accounts from New York informs us—that a considerable detachment of [British] troops are ready for sea—one division is said to be destined for the W. Indies—and a more considerable one for Geor- gia or South Carolina—but these as well as a fleet of Victuallers bound to Cork—it is imagined are detained by the possession of the French Squadron in Chesapeak." The British naval force at New York, he says, "by the best intelligence," consists of the "Russed (74 guns)," "Robo D’dray (74 guns)," "Europa," "Princes," and "Galerie" (each of 64 guns), "Renown" (56 guns), "Roebuck" (44 guns), "Romulus," and "two other frigates names unknown." Their army "may be about 1800."—From MS. letter preserved in L. I. Hist. Soc.

A "Congress Bill of 70 Dollars" is auctioned off at the Coffee House. The first bidder offers "Three Shillings New York currency" for it. It is sold for "Eight Shillings and Three Pence Half Penny."—Royal Gaz., D 24, 1779.

King's College is still being used as a hospital.—N. Y. H. S.
Collections (1875), 309, 395. The building was thus used by the Americans before the British occupation.—See Ap 6, 1776.

Gen. Patterson writes that there is danger of "the Garrison being left destitute of Fuel."—N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1875), 314. On the 11th of Dec., a school was distressed for fuel. "They consume 600 Cords of Wood per Week. Yesterday they seized the private Supplies of Sugar & Still Houses & Breweries & got but 70 Cord.—Carts are pressed to go out to morrow & cut in this Island & orders issued to General Smith at Bruecklin to implo 300 Axes in the Woods nearest to the Landings. Several are upon private Property greatly offended, and General the other Police and the Barrack Master. The Commandant talks of taking from the private Stocks of the Citizens in general."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

von Krafft enters in his journal the disposition of various regiments in New York. His own regiment, which had just returned from King Island, "went into barracks on the large square not far from the fresh water [near the new Schell]."—Von Krafft's Jour., 101. The "Schell" is evidently the phonetic spelling of jail, and refers to the bridewell.

The "Loyal Refugees"—American subjects of Great Britain who have taken refuge in New York—adopt and sign an address of devotion to the king, pledgeing their help. They state that,"rather than lose their duty," they "have abandoned their estates, and cheerfully submitted to all the miseries of penury and exile;" and that others, "after long confinement in dungeons and in chains, have suffered death by the hands of the executioner." This address, and the king's answer were printed in Royal Gaz., Jl 29, 1778.

A British fleet of about 150 sail leaves Sandy Hook "for England, Scotland and Ireland, &c."—N. Y. Tr, M., D 27, 1779; Robertson's Prize Jour. Camp. and 1780 (MS.); Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II, 73. Cf. Penn. Packet, D 30, 1779. Another fleet left for the south on Dec. 26 (p. v.).

In his diary, Smith observes that "the Obstinance of the Rebellion was not a Distrust of the Crown's Clemency nor the Nation's Liberty but the Wrath of their own Countrymen, who feared would ruin them by private Actions for Compensations and that Nothing would save them but an Act of Oblivion—
That I knew by the Comm24 this was not to be expected from Parliam & could only be had from the Colony Legislature. I confessed it difficult to frame a Law that should on the one hand give Compensations & on the other oblige the Loyalists to make Sacrifices in Part for the Crown's Interest and the General Tranquility of the Country."—Smith's Diary (MS.), Vol. I.

In a letter to Clinton, who has appointed him to the council, Smith expresses "grateful Sentiments for that Mark of your Attention communicated yesterday by Mr. Elliot."

"If we are so happy as to see Your Excellency in the Spring for a final Blow to the Rebellion in this Quarter of the Continent, I hope the Station you have assigned me will enable me to Manifest a Zeal for the King's Service in some Degree answerable to your Expectations—The best Return I can Make for the very great Obligations I am laid under by your Politeness & Bounty."—

Sir Henry Clinton, Lord Cornwallis, and Gen. Patterson embar-
"on a board a sloop to go to the Hook, in order to sail with the Fleet on the present Expedition."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 74; Wm. Smith's Diary, VI; Robertson's Jour. (MS.). Von Krafft, after recording Clinton's departure, says: "In the meantime Lient. John Lane, in a note written in his Diary that the garrison, and the English Major General Paterson [Pattison] of the Artilery, Commandant."—Von Krafft's Jour., 102. The fleet sailed from Sandy Hook on Dec. 26 (p. v.).

The British fleet, with Sir Henry Clinton aboard, is off for Charleston. Smith says: "This Harbour in which we have but a single Frigate the Thames is now perfectly without Defence on the Water, except by the sea which runs plentifully. The Bay and River are both full of floating Cakes—Near the Narrows they reach from Side to Side. In short Sir Henry tarried till the last Day of passing down to the Hook with Safety—He took a Falmouth Packet Boat with him and it is generally believed means to go from Charlestown to England and that Lord Cornwallis is to succeed in the command of the Army. If any Thing abates the Joy of St Henry's Departure it is a Doubt some entertain of Lord Cornwallis's capacity & others of his Zeal for the War.—Mr. Tyrrel after some both think him a Man of Honor and sincere in his Friendships & that he has got over his Opposition Scruples. . . . He has an unfavorable Physiognomy—Heavy in his Make and Gait with a Cast in his Eye. Some People call him a Blockhead & say he so everates the Power of this Country as to suppose it impossible to crush the Rebellion. . . ."

The New-York Pocket Almanack, for the Year 1776, is just the same year likewise, will be ready in due Time."—N. Y. Merc.,

"Some lotteries which were held in New York during the Revolutionary War must be classed as private lotteries, since they were not authorized by legislative enactment, but organized by authority of the commandant of the city. One was held in 1778 to raise money to buy fire-buckets for the city; another was held in 1781 to raise money for the relief of "poor refugees." The refugees were the loyalists who sought protection in New York. The overseers of the poor were made trustees of the fund of $2700 to be raised by the of Hist., V, 1205; Royal Gaz., F 25, 1778. See also My 15, 1782.

In this year, the British fortifications on Laurel Hill (see 1776, Autumn, and Ap 26, 1779) were much extended and called Fort 453. Later, the works were completed and strengthened and received the name of Fort George.—Ibid., 451. See 1781; L. M. R.

A "List of Farms on New York Island 1780" is the title of a small note-book kept by Evert Bancker, surveyor, which forms part of the Bancker Collection in the N. Y. Hist. Soc. The list shows owners' names, acreage, and in some cases the nearest milestone. The farms are grouped by localities, as follows: "West side of Bowery lane and Blooming Dale Road;" "West side Bowery lane—Northward;" "East side Bloomingdale Rd Southward in returning;" "Great Kills & Greenwich along the North River southward;" "East side Bowery lane & along the East river Northward;"
"East side Bowery Lane &c & Harlem bounds;" "Harlem Bounds Continu.;" "Near Kings Bridge;" and "East from the road back interesting of Bancker's surveys, in the Bancker Cell, in the

A water colour drawing, showing the ruins of Trinity Church, and its immediate surroundings, perhaps by Lord Rawdon, and drawn at about this time, is reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pl. 49. A similar view, probably made a year or two later, is reproduced and described in Vol. III, A. Pl. 8, from a lithograph, made probably about 1840, reproducing a contemporary sketch belonging to Trinity Corporation.

Smith writes in his diary: "This is the trying Day in the Rebel-ion. Several Deserter's of Yesterday (3 or 4) say there will be a general Tumult—The 3 years men will not riot—Those for 3 years or during the War insist also on leaving the Army.—A new Coat is to be offered to every Soldier & Furloughs to 1 April to those whose Times expired to Day. They have agreed to refuse the Present as insidious and to oppose Force to Force."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

On account of the "many Evils" which "daily arise from the unlimited Number of Taverns and Publick Houses within this City 1880 and its Precincts," Maj.-Gen. Pattison issues a proclamation restricting the number of licenses to 200, and directing that these be granted to such House Keepers only, whose Characters are sufficiently vouched and approved by the Magistrates of Police.” Perso, ners retailing spirituous liquors in quantities less than five garpons—may apply to the Police Office for a Special License for that Purpose—provided the same be not drunk within their own Houses, or sold in a less Quantity than a Quart.” Any person violating this proclamation after Jan. 10 will have his or her Liquors forfeited for the Benefit of the Alms House, suffer imprisonment, and be brought to Trial before a Garrison Court Martial for a Breach of Orders. Licences will be immediately withdrawn “from such as shall be known harbour or tolerate any riotous or disorderly Companies.” Two officers are assigned to the duty of seeing that the proclamation is enforced, under orders from the magistrates of police.—Royal Gaz., Ja 1, 1780. For the orders of the commis-ioners of police on this subject, see N. T. Merc., Ja 3, 1780.

3 It appears from Rivington’s paper of yesterday, says Smith,
”that Russia is exerting herself to draw several Powers into the Support of Great Britain if France & Spain do not listen to Overtures of Peace. The House of Borbon seems to be elated & D Estaine’s ineffectual Campaign may save Great Britain from desperate Consequences. The Check at Savannah may have saved the Empire.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Deserters come in Daily from the Enemy, and many . . . are very active in spreading the Reports to the Contrary. Very Cold indeed.”—Jour. of Hugh Gaines, II: 75.

Smith writes: “We hear of Persons frozen to Death on both Rivers contending with the Ice and of multitudes who suffer in various Parts of the Town. No Wood can come from the other Side of the Water and tis said this Island will be totally disforested in a Week. While all pray for a releasing Thaw, Thousands exercise the Barrack Master (J. Cad. Clarke) and many speak with great Freedom of Sir Henry Clinton.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

6 “I cannot be satisfied that it is even yet prudent to publish the Paper I have long had by me under the Title of the Candid Retrospect as it exposes the Writer to the violence of both Parties. I have only let off those Principles to such as can hear it & almost always with Success, for both are ignorant of what has past into a conciliatory Nature. As it may hurt my usefulness I suspend the Publication till the Civil Governors’ takes Place & perhaps it will come best from the New Governor.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI. For the content of The Candid Retrospect, see Ja 30, 1781.

6 Refugees from Connecticut are requested to meet on this day at “the Queen’s Head Tavern [Smith’s] in Cherry Street.”—Royal Gaz., Ja 5, 1780. There were two Queen’s Head Taverns in New York at this time, the other being that of James Strachan, on Brown-john’s Wharf.—See My 12, 1779.

Smith writes: “The Ikc freezes in my Pen—The River fast to Poulsou Hook. I sit before a large Coal Fire & within two feet of the Graft & yet am not comfortably warm. My Ink Stand is on the Corner of the Graft. God have mercy on the Poor—Many reputaable People lay abed in these Days for Want of Fuel.

‘Desertions still continue from the Continental Army. If an alarm comes from the South & the Southern Interest procures a Resolution to send Washington down to that Country what Miseries must the Soldiers endure in the March at this Season—The Extreme of the Weather may be favorable to the British Interest.”— Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

5 Tryon is distressed, says Smith, “by the Scarcity of Fuel—has but a Load himself—orders old Hulks to be cut up. There are 3000 Cords at the opposite Landings but we can’t have it till there is a Thaw to open the access to the Shores.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

5 A Winter from Tappan tells Wm. Smith that “on the Road he met many of Washington’s Soldiers going Home because their Times are out. Thinks at least 2000. They would not rejoin to go Southward. Heard nevertheless that some new Recruits are got for high Bounties & the Promise of Store at which they may buy necessaries at the Prices of 1776.

It is reported from Staten Island that 24 Deserters came there yesterday across the Ice which join the Island to the Jersey Shore and that 17 Ships were seen [in] the Offing—supposed to be the Cork Fleet.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Gentlemen’s Houses” shall be cut down.—N. Y. H. S. Collections Jan.

14 “In the evening there was great alarm to the effect that the Rebels were approaching,”—Fon Krafft’s Jour., 104. For the British preparations for such an attack, see Ja 19 and 23.

Smith writes that the weather has been down tho’ all impressed down, bringing in a sufficient Supply. We often hear of the Deaths of the Poor frozen in their Houses. Deserters come in nevertheless at Staten Island King’s Bridge and Poulsou Hook—Unfortunately and improvidently the Garrison at Staten Island was scant of Provisions & Yesterday supplied with Difficulty by Boats. Major Lumm who Commands at Poulsou Hook expects Washingtons Whole Army & is in a forlorn Hope. If the Garrison is lost we may have Shot from thence into this Town. The severity of the Weather is perhaps our Protection for the Moment.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary
(MS.), VI.

“The Town alarmed,” says Smith. “A note from General Stirling to Mr Tryon that 4000 Rebels were on Staten Island. A De-tachm’ consisting of the 42 & several Corps of the German Troops proceeded to go to the Islands to put down the Island. I hope that the loose Ice will fall down. Now it is fast from the Battery to Poulsou Hook. Yesterday the East River was crossed on the Ice by Many & the Paper of this Day says by a Horse & Slav.
I saw Men at 3 this Afternoon nearly over to Poulsou Hook & then returning. It appears smoother on that Shore than this & I suppose it was disturbed the. I believe it is firm—There arose a great Smoke on the North East Shore of the Afternoon, when there has been a Flag up there all the Morning, whether as a Signal of Vessels in the ofning or of the Descent I know not.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

The Americans took post “upon the Heights near the Redouls, constructed at the North End of the Islands.”—N. T. Merc., Ja 24, 1780. Gen. Knox phaused this Staten Island episode in a report to Germain on Mar. 27 (p. 9).

16 I find Tryon “run upon by Persons about Carts Boats &c to get Reinforcements over to Staten Island but the anxiety abates, the Flag being down which was the Signal to denote the Retiring of the Rebels—I left the Gov’t at 12 & returned at 3 & tarried till near 8 at Night—no Message from the Island. . .

“if the Ice grows stronger & a Snow Storm rises Washington may find us open to Surprise on every Side.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

15 I had not seen the Pamphlet censuring the Opposition & impeted to Gibbons one of the Lords of Trade till last Friday. It is well written but by involving so many in the Charge of plotting ag-their Country may excite to a Civil War in England. If the main Body adopt their Sentiments the Party will be ruined & the Nation sake. It seems to me to be Time for the Leaders to consult the Safety by an open Conversation or by Flight. Heaven prevent their coming here, with Land Forces from France in the Spring. The condition of Great Britain is perilous under every Point of View.
The Suppression of the Opposition may endanger the Liberties of the People unless the Prince is Virtue itself.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

17 “Rebels went off Staten Island yesterday morning 2
O’clock with 300 Sloys loaded with plunder—Salted Provisions Clothing Blankets & Household Furniture. The Male Inhabitants fled to the Fortresses. The Party 3000 led by Green Stirling & Maxwel. 6 Deserters & 17 Prisoners brought in.—We lost only 2 or 3 Dragons intercepted coming in to the Forts.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary
(MS.), VI.

The queen’s birthday is celebrated “with uncommon Splendor and Magnificence.” It is thus described: At noon, ”a Royal Salute was fired from Fort George, and repeated by his Majesty’s Ships of War at one o’Clock. The Public Rooms were on this Occasion entirely new painted and decorated in a Stile which reflects Honour on the Taste of the Managers. A Doric Pediment was erected over the principal Entrance, enclosing a transparent Painting of their Majesties at full Length, in their Royal Robes over which was an emblematic Piece, encircled with the Motto of, BRITONS STRIKE HOME. The Whole illuminated with a beautiful Variety of different coloured Lamps. In the Evening, a most splendid Ball was given by the General, Field, and Staff Officers of the Army, to the Garrison and principal Ladies and Gentlemen of the City. The Ball was opened at eight o'clock, by The Baroness De Riedesel, and Major-General Pattison, Commandant of the City and Garrison. Country Dances commenced at half past Nine, and at Twelve, the Company adjourned to Supper, prepared in the two Long Rooms. The Tables exhibited a most delightful Appearance, being ornamented with Parterres and Arbours, displaying an elegant Assemblage of natural and artificial Flowers, China Images, &c. The Company retired about three in the Morning.

Part of the celebration consisted of a "public dinner" given by General Tryon "to his Excellency General Knyphausen, Major-General De Riedesel, and all his officers, as a public token of the esteem and respect with which his Majesty has been pleased to visit his favourite city." The dinner was attended by all the officers of the garrison; many public toasts were drank, and the day (celebrated as the nativity of her Majesty the Queen, the most amiable exemplary and beloved Princess upon earth) was passed with the most perfect hilarity. The evening events were described as "the most truly elegant ball and entertainment ever known on this side the Atlantic."

A "supper at Mr. Hicks's," is also mentioned in this account, and is evidently the same as the dinner referred to above. It "consisted of three hundred and eighty dishes, besides the ornamental appendages."—Ibid.

Baroness Riedesel thus describes the ball: "As the birthday of the queen of England was approaching (which indeed really comes in summer, but as the king's birthday also comes in that season, is celebrated in winter, to give more custom to the trades people, as every one upon those days appears at court in gala-dress) they wished to celebrate the day with a great feast; and as it was the general wish—partly to please General Phillips, and partly to make my forgotten own sufferings—to confer on me a distinguished honour, they desired me to be queen of the ball. When at length the great day arrived, all the ladies assembled at Governor Tryon's, where they received me with all ceremony."

"At six o'clock in the afternoon I was obliged to seat myself in a carriage with Generals Tryon and Patterson to be driven to the ball, where we were received with kettle-drums and trumpets."

"I was obliged to open the ball with one of the generals by a formal minuet. . . . I danced several English dances."

"At supper, I was obliged, as I represented the queen, to sit under a canopy, and drink the first toast. I was certainly much touched at all the marks of friendship I received, although extremely tired; still, in order to show my gratitude, I cheerfully stayed as long as possible, and remained until two o'clock in the morning."

Regarding this "splendid & numerous Ball" at Hicks's Tavern, to which "near 400 Guineas" was subscribed by the Army," Smith wrote next day: "[the money would have been better laid out in Fuel for the Poor or in General Charity to the Poorly Inhabited of Staten Island]."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

Judge David Ogden of New Jersey, in his New-York, writes to Gen. Tryon an outline of the present critical situation in which the city stands, particularly by reason of the frozen rivers. He advises that troops be ordered from Long Island, and the citizens put under the command of proper officers for the City's defence. He offers a plan whereby the "shameful want of firewood" may be remedied.—N. Y. Col.Descrips., 1780.

"The passage of the North River over the ice to Paulus Hook is practicable for the largest Canoes; an Event unknown in the Memory of Man." It is "strongly reported that General Washington was meditating a great Stroke upon New York, with his whole Force, by different Attacks." Careful plans for defence are executed, by raising volunteer companies, and posting sailors on board their ships being fast in the ice.—From Gen. Patterson's letter to Lord Germoyn, Feb. 22, in N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 152-57.

Lieut.-Gen. Knyphausen having ordered that certain signals be used between King's Bridge and Mc Gowan's Pass, Gen. Patterson establishes the following one's to be used between Mc Gowan's Pass and the City: "Upon the Firing of one, two, or three Guns at Mc Gowan's Pass, the same Number are to be repeated in succession from the Cantonment of the 37th Reg't, near the 5 Mile Stone, formerly known by the name of the Dove Tavern, Murray's House on the Heights of Inidenberg, Bunker's Hill and Fort George." 1

And in case the Enemy should appear in force & attempt to cross in the Rear of the Line of Mc Gowen's Pass, either by the North or East River, the following Signals to be made: Viz: ThreeRounds to be fired from the Cannon posted at Major Bayard's House at Bloomingdale, or from the Alarm Gun, nearest to where the Enemy may attempt to pass, and repeated in succession to Greenwich the Star Redoubt near the Foundery and Fort George.

"If by the East River, five Rounds to be fired from the Cannon posted at the Dove Tavern, or the nearest Alarm Gun, and repeated in succession from Murray's House and Bunker's Hill to Fort George.

"Upon the Firing of either four or five Alarm Guns at Fort George, all Troops of the Garrison are Instantly to put themselves under arms—The Royal Artillery at the lower Battery—The Brigade of Losberg immediately will march and form near the Provost Camp.—The 42nd Regiment in Front of St. Paul's Church.—The 47th and the two Battalions of Anspach Brandenberg on their Regimental Parades, when each Corps respectively will wait for further orders.

"The City Companies will upon the same Alarm assemble in Queen Street, with their Right at Walton's House and their Left extending towards the Fly Market. The Loyal Commissariat Company and the Officers of the said Company also to assemble at Arms near the Provision Stores in Water Street.

"If Kings Bridge is attacked in Front, one Gun to be fired from Fort Knyphausen, & (if at Night) one Rocket from Morris House to be added to the Signal.

"If Kingsbridge is attacked by the North River, two Guns to be Fired from Fort Knyphausen & (if at Night) two Rockets from Morris House.

"If Kingsbridge is attacked by Harlem Creek, three Guns to be Fired from Fort Knyphausen, & (if at Night) three Rockets from Morris House to be added to the Signal."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 46-47.

"The oldest man in this Country," writes Smith, "does not remember such a long continuance of very severe cold. —Since yesterday afternoon it has been intensely so. We cross the Hudson in all Places and in Numerous Bodies but not without wet Feet at high Water. The Ice sinking at Ebb & Letting in the Flood on the hen Places for 6 or 7 Inches.—Its Firmness under the Duration of the Frost leaves us so open on the West that the 42 was ordered in yesterday & another Regiment is on the Way from Long Island. We have 4000 here on the hither Side of Fort Knyphausen—The Inhabitants are ordered to render themselves under the Officers of their own Election & Arms are to be delivered out to them to Morrow."

Maj.-Gen. Patterson issues a proclamation calling for the enrollment of every male inhabitant from the age of 17 to 60 years. "Any Person within the Age above mentioned, who shall at any time fail to obey the Orders he may receive from his Captain, will be subject to imprisonment or banishment from the City." Firemen and Quakers are "expected to exert themselves in any Cases of Emergency."—Royal Gen., Ja 22, 1780; Man. Com., Coun. (1867), 689-90. See Ja 22 and F. 9. On Sept. 9th, the order had not met with the desired response, and Gov. Robertson issued a notice that every man of the age specified who neglected or refused to enroll should be subject to imprisonment or banishment; and he instituted a set of rules to govern the militia companies raised by this means.—Royal Gen., S 9, 1780. See also his order of Je 22, 1782.—Ibid., Je 26, 1782. Regarding the effect of such military despotism upon the Loyalists in New York, see Van Tyne's The Loyalists (1902), 250-51.

In consequence of the proclamation lately issued (see Ja 20) by the commandant, more than 4,000 men have enrolled themselves in the several companies formed in this city, exclusive of the "Volunteer" and "Independent" companies.—Royal Gaz., Ja 22, 1780.

23. Gen. Patton has ordered 12-pounders for the Circular Red-doubt near Jones's House, on the East River,—but there being no Platforms in that Work, and the Embrazures are so high, that the Guns on any Carriages can be of no Service, unless the Embrazures are walled up in the N Y State, the General prefers the latter. This Redoubt has been given in charge to the Royal Navy.—

time used as a place for storing munitions of war.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 352.

Lient-C. Bulkirk, with about 120 men from Staten Island, surprises the American post at Elizabettown, and takes two majors, three captains, and 47 privates as prisoners. On the same night, Maj. Lunn, with detachments from Poulsws-Concept, attacked Newark. The Continentals attempted a defence and 7 or 8 were killed and 34 taken prisoners.—Royal Gaz., Ja 29, 1780. Cf. Mr 27.

As there is no gun at "Mac Gowans's Pass" to repeat the established signals, Gen. Lee orders a four-pounder for that purpose.—

such as would enlist for the War as a Present from the Congress but those who refused were sent to the Guard House & Whipped.
They did not dare to practice this upon the N England 3 Years

Three sleighs and ten horses, taken on Jan. 30 from the "Rebels" near Elizabettown by a party of mounted refugees from Staten Island, are driven over the ice from Staten Island to New York, "an enterprise never yet attempted since the first settlement of this country."—Royal Gaz., F 2, 1780. The place of capture was that a body of about two hundred rebels had taken post there.

defeated the Americans, 40 or 50 of whom were killed and 97 taken prisoners. The loss to the British consisted of 5 killed and 18 wounded.—Royal Gaz., F 5, 1780. For Gen. Knyphausen's report of gone further if the Guards had permitted. I walked up Stream and came off Day's Street back of S't Pauls. The Ice is prodigiously firm—12 Slays came from Staten Island to Town this morning and a Troop gallop'd from the same Place on the River to Poulus Hook.

It is owing to these Bridges of Ice that we have so many Deser-minded to conquer North America, if they beggar the nation.

They talk of sending out 10,000 fresh troops in the Spring, but they necessary the reduction thereof is to her very existence. This

Gen. Patton publishes his thanks to the citizens of New York for the large enrollment in the militia during the last week, since issuing a proclamation asking for recruits (see Jan. 20). They were reviewed under arms on Feb. 5. He compliments the "Independent Volunteers" and "City companies" on their military appearance.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 358.

The Chamber of commerce passes a vote of thanks to Lieut. Walter for his care of the powder-ship in the Wallauo Bay during the winter. A committee is appointed to consider the advisability of fixing a conductor to secure her against lightning. —Col. Records of N. Y. Chamb. of Commerce, 224.

Major-General Patton writes to Maj.-Gen. Tryon: "The batteries in Fort George and the lower works, are now all put into repair and completed with guns."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 359.

A schedule of the armed forces in New York, exclusive of the king's troops of the garrison, is prepared by Maj.-Gen. Pattison. They include New York "Rangers," "Highlanders," "Volunteers," "Marine Artillery," and the new "Associated companies" of volunteers, for departmental service, such as commissary, ordnance, engineer, quarter-master, bawack, and dockyard duty. The total city militia numbers 2,662 men. There are 355 of the Royal Navy acting on shore. Seamen from the transports, and from navy "victuallers," small craft, New York pilots, and private ships, armed with pikes, number 1,259. There is also a troop of 60 light cavalry, "formed from the artillery horse department," armed with sabres and pistols, and clothed at their own expense; and the New York Marine Artillery, formed from the Marine Society, which was established by royal charter.—N. Y. Merc., II, 1, 1780. Cf. Royal Gaz., Je, 28, 1780. See also ibid., Ff, 9, 1780; and Man. Com. Coun. (1865), 691.

Gen. Patton, in a long detailed report to Sir Henry Clinton, recounts the measures adopted for strengthening the city's defences. The "Circular Redoubt, near Jones's House on the East River," was allotted to the charge of officers of the navy. "Platforms were immediately raised in it, the Guard House finished & supply'd with Stores, a Magazine provided & eight 12 Prs. Mounted, for the Embrasures & 9 Pr. plac'd to defend the Gate." This he christened the "Royal Navy Redoubt." Two companies of seamen manned guard house daily here. Other points of defence prepared were "Stevenson's House, on the Height above the Ship Yard," the wharves from the shipyard to the Lower Battery; positions between Col. Clark's house and the "Circular Redoubt;" the "Foundry Redoubt," the "New Star Fort" near it, etc.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 146-51.

"The Estate of Charles Ward Arthorp, Esq. at Bloomingdale, consisting of about 500 acres of choice rich land, chiefly meadow, in good order, with good buildings, stables, and orchard; but about this time our friendly relations began to grow short, nothing being offered for sale. The house is described as "an exceeding good house, elegantly finished commanding beautiful prospects of the East and North-Rivers, on the latter of which the estate is bounded.

"Also, a two story brick house, for an overseer and servants, Feb. a wash house, cyder house and mill, corn crib, a pidgeon house, well stocked, a very large barn, and hovels for cattle, large stables and coach houses, and every other convenience."

"About the dwelling-house is a very handsome pleasure garden, in the English taste, with good kitchen gardens, well furnished with excellent fruit trees, flowers, etc., and very well planted, now wanting to make it a most agreeable and profitable estate for a gentleman, having a good landing and wharf on the river, where may be advantageously built a distillery or brewery, as a sufficient supply of water runs to it. The whole of the buildings are almost new, and in good repair."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1785), 7, 21, 1780. See also L. R. R. K., III: 948.

"Last Night the Hospital Ship at the Wallabout got on Fire by accident and burnt to the Waters' Edge."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II, 81.

This severity of the weather having abated, Gen. Patton thanks Capt. Howe and the officers of the navy under his command for their services on shore, and orders "that the Guard of Seamen in the Royal Navy Redoubt be relieved . . . by an Officers Guard from the Troops now on Garrison."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 372-73.

An extract of a letter from New Jersey reads: "Nothing can equal the Tyranny we are under. The Property of the People is at the Mercy of Commisaries and other Agents for Congress. They give us Certificates instead of Money for our Goods. Though we are now under the most oppressive Taxes, not a Farthing can be got on the Certificates. Congress will not enable their Agents to take them up. I have hitherto laboured in vain for a Law to oblige the Tax-gatherers to receive the Certificates in Payment, on the old and new Maxims, that Discount is good Pay. If I don't succeed what follows, but that we are under the Government that will not, or cannot pay its Debts, and yet are daily exacting new Spills from the wretched Slaves they have made us! We must proceed to further Sales of our Property to satisfy the Collectors of Taxes, or be subject to ruinous Distresses.—Oh! the Folly of trusting to the delusive Promises, and Assurances, that the Expenditure of the War should be defrayed by the Slave Lands. We have saved at the Spiclet, but our Tyrants draw from us the Bung. We have strong Debates on this and other Subjects; you shall know the Issue of them in a few Days. If Congress will not pay their Debts, a Commission of Bankruptcy must go out against them. The Hour is at Hand . . . you see their Certificates are no better than Blank Notes . . . worse than their Paper Dollars."—N. Y. Merc., Mr. 6, 1780. See Mr. 5.

The ministers of the Dutch Church are thanked by Capt. A. P. Gen. Patton's aide-de-camp, for "the cheerfulness and good will" with which they "acquiesced in giving Comfort to the Sick and Wounded Soldier." These having now recovered or been removed, the church is returned to the ministers.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 173.

Sir Henry Clinton having gone south, has left Tryon in command of the British troops in this district. Tryon reports to Germin: Navigation "has been open only to the Hook, since the 21st Instant—the North River above the town is still impassable for vessels, being full of fixed ice on the banks, and floating ice in the channel."—N. Y. Col. Docs., VIII, 781.

Baroness Riedesel writes of this time and of the succeeding summer: "... the small-pox was raging violently in the city."

Mr. 5.

At the end of the winter General Tryon sailed for England, but just before his departure, he sent to my house, unknown to me, magnificent furniture, tapestry, carpets, and curtains, besides a set of silk hangings for an entire room . . . .
mellow, and the Hudson river running directly in front of the house. Clinton occupied the Beekman House on the East River. Everything was placed at our disposal, including fruits of the most delicious flavor; indeed, of this latter article we had more than we could eat. Our servants feasted on peaches even to satiety, and our horses, which roammed through the orchards, eagerly ate the fruit from the trees, disdaining that upon the ground, which every evening we had gathered up and given to the pigs to fatten them. It was almost incredible, but nevertheless it is true, that with nothing but this fruit we fattened six pigs, the flesh of which was capital, only the fat was somewhat soft. Peach, apricot, and other fruit-trees, are raised here, without espaliers, and have trunks as thick as those of ordinary trees.

"Not far from us were the Hell-gates, which are dangerous breakers for those ships that pass through them up the river. We often saw ships in danger, but only one was wrecked and went to pieces during our stay at this place.

"General Clinton came often to visit us, but in hunter's dress, accompanied by only one aide-de-camp. . . . The last time he came to see us, he had with him the unfortunate—as he afterwards became—Major André, who, the day afterward, set out upon the fatal expedition, in which he was captured by the Americans, and killed as a spy. It was very sad that this preeminently excellent young man should have fallen a victim to his zeal and his kind heart, which led him to undertake such a precocious errand instead of leaving it to older and known officers, to whom properly the duty belonged, but on whom on that very account (as they would be more exposed to danger), he wished to save.

"Much of our time was spent in agreeable place; but our contentment was broken in upon by a malignant fever [probably a virulent form of malaria], that prevailed in New-York and in which, in our family alone, twenty fell ill; eight dangerously. Among these eight were my husband and my daughter Gustava. . . .

every day persons would tell me of fifty or sixty fresh burials, which certainly did not tend to raise my spirits. The heat which the sick suffered was so intense that their pulse beat one hundred and thirty-five times in a minute. All our servants were sick. . . . At night I was often busied in making for my patients a lemonade of salts of wormwood mixed with lemon juice, sugar and water. By which means, as all the sick in the house had them, I used up in the space of two weeks, two full boxes of lemons, each box containing five hundred.

". . . The pastor, Mylius, and our trusty yager, Rocked, both of whom remained well, assisted me by turns watching at night. . . . At length all of our household who were sick were restored to health, and not one died, a result that abundantly paid me for all my trouble.

We remained the entire summer of 1780, upon this lovely estate, near Barreness Riedesel, Letters and Journals (trans. by Storr, 1867). 177-87.

2 Lieut. Von Krafft records in his journal: " . . . we were mustered by an Englishman in the old Engiesschen Church [Dutch Church on Nassau St.], in which horses or other animals were sometimes kept, on the square of Crown [Liberty] Street."—Krafft's Jour., 16b.

3 "Took the Examination of George Welding or rather George Plater the former being an assumed name for Disguize. He came from Philad: County last Saturday & arrived here on Tuesday. "His accounts agree with others respecting the want of Supplies for the American army & the Change of People's Minds since the Taxes.

"Sealed a Bill depending in the Assembly at Trenton to oblige Collectors of Taxes to accept Certificates of money [see F 25] due on Sales to Commissaries. If not carried he says a Bomb will burst.

"Congress seems studious to make an Artificial Scarcity of Paper Money to raise its Value, but this is only damping up the Current that must flow with double Fury, when they pay their Debts as they will be obliged to do or declare their Bankruptcy."—Smith's Diary (M. S.), VI.

4 Inhabitants of the city having complained that they were being improperly billeted upon by employees of the barracks department, the commandant orders that a board of inquiry meet at the city hall on March 9. No billet shall be issued, except in prescribed forms, signed by the barracks master or one of his assistants, and after examination of the house intended to be billeted upon.—N. Y. Merc., Mr 6, 1780.

5 According to David Sproat, the British commissary of prisoners, the American prisoners on board the "Good Hope," on this day (error for F 24, g.s.), "willfully, maliciously and wickedly hurst the best prison ship in the world." In vindication of British humanity, he adds, "The perpetrators of this horrid crime were not hanged but ordered to the provost.

"The prison ship at this time lay in the Wallaboue near to a number of transport ships; the people could behold the flames that, but two out of some hundreds were missing. That is what I suppose the Congress alludes to when they say that they 'were indiscriminately thrown into the holds of prison ships'—They were indeed without distinction put on board the nearest ship called the 'Woodlands' where they remained for a short time, until the ships 'Stormbolo' and 'Scorpion' were got ready for their reception; the latter was always admitted to parole on Long Island in that pleasant village Jamaica until the 10th of July last when many of them had broke their parole and otherways behaved so ill, that it was refused them.

"This alteration had not taken place above two months when the prisoners were all moved on board the ship 'Jersey' where there is a variety of apartments for officers and plenty of room between decks for the men."—From Sproat's letter to Skinner, dated Jan. 29, 1781, in Banks' David Sproat and Naval Prisoners in the War of the Rev. (1909), 43-44.

"The mutiny is a rise in their Confidence and begin to despise the Rebels as at their last Shifts. There is a general Sighing for the new garrison."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M. S.), VI.

The commissioners and governors of the "Royal Hospital for Seamen at Greenwich" (England) having empowered Supt.-Gen. Andrew Elliot at New York to receive forfeited and unclaimed shares of prize bounties in this province, according to various acts of parliament, Elliot publishes a notice that such bounty money is payable to him through the agents for the prizes condemned by the court of vice admiralty.—Royal Gna., Mr 11, 1780. See also *S. 10, 1779.

The state legislature passes an act authorizing the immediate sale of part of the forfeited estates (see O 22, 1779), in order that money may be raised "for providing the Troops of this State, in the Service of the United States, with Clothing and other Necessaries."—Laws of N. Y., 3rd sess., chap. 51 (printed by Holt, 1782). The act was amended on Oct. 7—1810, 4th sess., chap. 13.

A number of "Women belonging to the 57th Regiment," having taken possession of "a House near the Bowery Lane . . . known by the name of the Casina," Maj.-Gen. Patterson directed that they "be immediately removed by their respective female agents, N. Y. H. S. Collection (1875)."—Lieut.-Gen. Knyphausen, "Commanding his Majesty's Forces, upon New-York Island, Long-Island, Staten-Island, and Posts depending, &c.," issues a proclamation giving protection and encouragement to the possessors of farms and gardens, "for the Purpose of raising plentiful Supplies of Grain, Forage, and Vegetables." Persons damaging stock or produce, farm houses, orchards, gardens, fences, etc., will be punished with the Utmost Severity."—Royal Gna., Mr 11, 1780.

By order of the commandant, the officers of police issue a new regulation regarding the quality, weight, and price of bread. It requires that "all bread made of sweet flour, of the first quality, must be baked into long loaves of two pounds each, stamped with the initials of the Baker's name, and sold for Fourteen Coppers each loaf;" also that "all bread made of merchantable flour, of an inferior quality, must be baked into round loaves, weighing two pounds and one half each," similarly stamped, and sold at the same price. "Any Baker or retailer of bread, who shall be convicted of demanding or receiving any more or greater sum than Fourteen Coppers for each loaf . . . shall be fined Ten Pounds for every such offence." Jeronimo Altyne is appointed inspector of bread; he is required "constantly to visit the several bake houses in this city, and to make seizure of all such bread as he may find deficient;" this he shall send to the almshouse. The offender's name will be published; while, for a second offence, he will be fined £50, and, on the third offence, a stop will be put to his baking.—Royal Gna., Mr 18, 1780.

Maj.-Gen. Patterson has allotted the French Church in King St.
for the reception of ordnance stores.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), Mar. 1780, p. 379. This was the Église du St. Esprit (at the present 18-22 Pine St.). It was badly damaged, and remained out of use until 1796 (q.v.), when it was rebuilt.—Wittmeyer, Hist. Sketch of the Église Françoise; L. M. R. K., III: 932.

17 Maj.-Gen. James Robertson, the new governour, arrives. Tryon intends to avail itself of the king's permission to return to England. The British and provincial troops within the British lines come under the command of Gen. Robertson, who is the "Senior British Officer here." Lieut.-Gen. Kruphausen has ordered retreat until the next day, and is now under Lieutenant-Col. N. Col. Docs., VIII: 1875; Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. The new governour was commanding officer here at the time of the fire in 1776.—Ibid., 686.

18 Two detachments of British troops, one from Kingsbridge under Lieut.-Col. Howard, and the other from New York City under Lieut.-Col. Macpherson, cross over to Jersey to make a joint attack upon the " Rebel Caftonements" near Happer's Town. On the morning of the 23d, Howard and his men surprised between 200 and 300 Americans who, after making "a shew of defence," retreated "with precipitation." Macpherson did not arrive in time to give Howard much assistance, and all but 64 of the Continentals escaped.—Royal Gov., Mar. 29, 1780. Cf. Gen. Kruphausen's report of the incursion as rendered to General on Mar. 27 (q.v.).

19 Maj.-Gen. James Robinson produces his commission as governour, and Andrew Elliot as a lieutenant-governor. They take the usual oaths, and the council and deputy-secretary are sworn in. Gov Robertson publishes his commission at the city hall.—Col. Coun. Min., 358: N. Y. T. M., Mar. 27, 1780. Elliot had been suppt. gen. of police—bid., Apr. 3, 1780.

20 Wm. Smith's record of the event states: "We read the Commission [Robertson's] with Tryon's Consent in a Room opposite to his [Tryon's] Bedroom fearing it would be too much for him to hear it and then administered the Oaths in his Presence to the new Gov.—On which he delivered the Great Seal & a N of Papers—We then returned & took the Oaths ourselves. And afterwards proceeded to the Balcony of the City Hall from whence after Proclamation to keep Silence it was read again.—The Day concluded in a Dinner at General Tryon's which he could not attend."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

21 Lieut.-Gen. Kruphausen writes from New York to Lord George Germain: I have the honour to inform your Lordship, that this day is the departure from this place. On the 16th of December last, we have had the longest and most severe winter that ever was remembered. All was continent: and horses with heavy carriages could go over the ice into the Jerseys from one island to another; and it is only since the 20th of February that the Rivers and Straights have been navigable.

The rebels thought to avails themselves of this communication and threaten an attack upon Staten Island, where there were about 1500 men under the command of Brigadier General Stirling, who were pretty well intrenched. For this purpose General Washington, whose army was halted at Morris-Town, sent a detachment of 700 men, with six pieces of cannon, two mortars, and some horse, commanded by Lord Stirling, who arrived on the island early in the morning of the 17th of January [q.v.], our advanced posts having retired upon their approach. They formed the line; and having made some movements in the course of that day, withdrew in the night, after having burnt one house, pillaged some others, and carried off with them about 200 head of cattle. The day of their arrival on the island I Embarked 600 men to attempt a passage, and support General Stirling; but the floating ice prevented their success, and obliged them to return. I imagined that the appearance of these transports, with troops on board, which they could see towards the close of the day, induced them to make this sudden retreat, as they could not tell what success they might have. Some prisoners were made in their retreat.

Some days after [see Ja 23] an advanced post, which they had at Newark, consisting of one company, was surprised and taken by the Hessians, and from that time under the command of Major Lumm; and the same day General Stirling sent another detachment under Lieut. Col. Buskirk, who surprised the picquet guard at Elizabeth-Town, and made two Majors, two Captains, and 47 men prisoners of war. Both these enterprises were effected without any loss on our side. Some time after [see Feb 3] General Mathew sent a detachment of guards and provincial horse, under the command of Lieut. Col. Norton, to attack a post at John's house upon the White Plains. This did not succeed entirely in his wishes; but the rebels who were posted in this house had ever attacked and dissuaded, with the loss of 40 men killed and 97 made prisoners, among whom were 1 Lieut, Colonel, 1 Major, and 5 inferior officers. We had 3 killed and 15 wounded.

"In the night of the 22d of this month [p. 65] we partly surprised and took a rebel post in the Jerseys, consisting of 250 men, of whom we made only 69 prisoners, owing to two embarkations, one from the Hessians, and another from Kingsbridge under Lieut. Colonel Howard, not arriving at the appointed time. Our loss upon this occasion was very inconsiderable. Capt. Armstrong of the 42d regiment is wounded. By these little enterprises during the winter, as far as we can ascertain, we have made 320 prisoners, and killed about 65 of the enemy.

"By the best intelligence I have been able to get, General Washington's army at Morris-Town consists of about 5000 men, besides militia. There has been a great desertion among them. Tired of the war, and dissatisfied with the depreciated value of their money, a general discontent pervades the whole army."—N. Y. T. M., Jl 3, 1780.

"Fuel was so very scarce, that garden fences, old sheds, &c. were taken down to supply the want of cord-wood. Provisions were as scarce as fuel. Everybody, except the rich and the dissolute, was put upon short allowance. Potatoes were sold for a guinea per bushel while biscuits, made of oatmeal, as coarse, and containing as little nourishment, as ground straw, were served out to the [British] troops.

"Early in the spring the Cork Fleet arrived, and brought provisions in abundance. Fine meal-butter was sold immediately at 2l. 2s. 6d. per lb. and almost everybody was soon relieved and made comfortable."—From an account of the life of one Thomas Gardner, in pamphlet vol. No. 238, p. 58, N. Y. H. S.

De Voe states that probably the Old Slip Market was among the "old sheds" torn down for fire wood, as he finds no mention of it after this time.—Market Book, 109.

There is no record, on this month, of a "Return of each Province's proportion of the Specific Tax for the support of an Army of 50,000 men for 5 years; accord to a resolution of Congress pass'd in April 1780." New York furnished 1,100,000 lbs. of beef or pork, 13,999 bbls. of flour, 500 tons of hay or fodder, 68,538 gals. of rum, and 39,000 bbls. of corn.—From Ms. among the loose Robertson Papers, in N. Y. P. L.

"General Robertson writes to me for a Draft of the Instrument to declare a Part of this Province at the King's Peace with Draft of a Letter from him to Sir H. Clinton urging that act without delay. I send him both in a Letter before Dinner."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

The draft of the proclamation reads: "Whereas His Majesty hath been graciously pleased by his Letters Patent under the Great Seal of Great Britain . . . to appoint and authorize me to be his Commissioner among other Purposes therein mentioned to execute certain Powers to such Commissioner intrusted by a statute or Act of Parliament passed in the 16th Year of His Majesty's Reign intituled an Act to prohibit all Trade & Intercourse &c.

And whereas it appears to me that it will tend to encourage many well affected Persons to exert themselves in suppressing the present Rebellion to proceed to execute the said Commission in divers Parts of the Province or Colony of New York I do therefore in his Majesty's Name by this Proclamation declare the Island of New York Staten Island and the Island called Nassau or Long Island with the several Small Islands comprehended within the City and County of New York & within Kings County & Queen's County on Long Island & every Port District and Place within the aforementioned Limits to be at the Peace of his Majesty."—Wm. Smith MSS., folio 194, in N. Y. P. L.

In some "Notes upon the Enquiry, whether it is expedient to declare any Part of the Province of New York at the King's Peace, and to revive the civil Government," dated May 25, 1780, Smith wrote:

"All I can say upon the first Question is, that I do not at present perceive any Inconvenience, in leaving the Merchants of March," tells Smith that Geo. Robertson has not a "Scrape of a Penn" from Clinton and that "the only Rule (Tryon) has to the general

"the Americans refuse."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.). See My 12.

Robertson issues the following proclamation, which is written in a conciliatory vein: "The King having been graciously pleased to honor me with the Care of a Province, where, in a long Residence, I have contracted an Esteem for some, and an Affection for many of its Inhabitants, I proceed with great Pleasure to announce his benevolent Intentions.

"It is his Majesty's Wish, by the Revival of the Civil Authority to prove to all the Colonies and Provinces, that it is not his Design to govern America by Military Law, but that they are to enjoy all the Benefits of a local Legislation and their former Constitution.

"To this End I have brought out the Royal Appointments for forming the Council, and supplying the Places of Lieutenant Gover and Chief Justice. And in Concurrence with the Commander in Chief of the British Forces who is also his Majesty's Commis-server, I have ordered that the Orders of the Colonies, I shall, as speedily as the public Exigences will permit, give order for opening the Courts of Judiature, and convening the Assembly; and in general proceed to the Execution of the Powers reposed in me for the free Course and complete Re-Establishment, both of the Legislative and Executive Authority. . . . [The proclamation continues, at unusual length, to define the government's aims.]

"Until I meet you regularly in General Assembly, for the Restoration of mutual Confidence, a and the remedying of private as well as public Evils, I pledge myself to Men of all Classes, in every Part of the Province, that it is the compassionate Desire of your Sovereign, and of the Parent Country, to unite in Affection as in Interest, with the Colonies planted by her hand, and which have long flourished under her Care,—that the Suggestions of her Intention to impair their Rights and Privileges, are the Arts of Malice and Faction,—and that every Insinuation made by the domestic Enemies of Great-Britain, of her being disposed to abandon the Provinces to internal Anarchy, and the Mischiefs of their jarring Interests and Claims . . . is equally false and malicious . . . ."
it has been discovered that the governor secured Wm. Smith to draft this proclamation for him. Smith says in his diary that the proclamation was discussed, prior to its publication, at a meeting of the governor with his council; "it is almost verbatim what I see him in the 3d Draft."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI, under Apr 15, 1780. See Ap 18 and 21.

On July 31 Smith wrote: "Not Having seen the Gov's Proclam[15] of April 1 urge another over here [in] delivering me several Hundred Copies to be issued—I have frequently suggested the necessity of its being re-published."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

This proclamation resulted from instructions sent by Germain to Robertson, dated July 9, to revive the "Civil Constitution," and to exercise authority as "Civil Govt," under a new commission in the name of the public, which accompanied Germain's letter—N. Y. Col. Doc, VIII: 767.

Civil government was not restored, however, until after the British evacuation (see N. 25, 1783). For another attempt to bring it about, see Mr 21, 1782.

"Crowds are perusing the Proclamation [see Ap 15] afforded to Riverston Corner & Mr White tells me it goes down with the resentful like chopp'd Hay, Will Bayard & Ashfield rave at the liberality of Sir H Clinton's Proclamation [16] those who are in Rebel Houses dreading being dislodged by the Petence of the Proprietors."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith writes: "Eliott to Day & Axtel and White yesterday press me for the Draft of the proposed Address from the Council to Gov. Robertson. I accordingly carried it to White in Confidence this is to let him know what ought inform the vindictive rage of High Church & Refugees. Eliott is call for it to Morrow resolved if I alone join him to address the Governor."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. On April 21, he added: "M[15] Eliott calls here with another form of Address which he read. He has objections to mine which I am only left to suspect from the freeness of such as he ventures to express—that it is too long. That was not to expose ourselves to a Paper War—That he can never join in what I have said of the Taxing Claims. He always thought G. B. had done so much for her Colonies that they ought to be taxed.

I object to his that it was a mere Compliment of No Use to the Crown. It would do well enough if the Rebellion was broken down but contributed nothing to it—It would be laughed at Satisfied no Man nor afforded Conviction for making a single Pseudoelyte &c.

"He seemed much affrighted—paid compliments but must act for himself & be convinced."—I at length told him that I would agree to a Complimentary Address if nothing else was the Choice of the Majority & he catched at my words. I thought these should satisfy the Members & that we should then meet to compose a third.

"Eliott is either embarrased by old Declarations of his Principle for taxing America—or by his Belief that Ministers still mean it, or by his Cowardice.

I leave the Council to his Management & their own Course. In the Faith of Uprightness there is Safety—And as to myself am determined on a uniform & Systematic Conduct, bending to Occurrences only to facilitate it. The Draft he produced after having mine 24 Hours was not a single Sheet & of a contemptible Diction."—Ibid., under Ap 21. A draft of Smith's proposed address is among the unbound Wm. Smith MSS, folio 197. See Ap 24.

I find great Jealousies among the Refugees of me as the Author of the Governor's Proclamation [16]—Their Wrath recommends both me & the Measure to the Disaffected in Town & that may render both more pleasing to the Rebels beyond our Lines."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"Mr Wallace carried the two Drafts of the Address [see Ap 18] to De Lancey who would not join in either nor hear mine read. He said he would not address after having served in Council 12 years, April 15 another over his head.

"He went to Morris who chose no Address but said his present depend[15] Circumstances obliged him to join in a Complimentary one if the Rest insisted—He did not like neither the Compliments paid to Govr Tryon, who had never shown any regard for him nor would it please the People.

I am not very fond of this Business. I spoke my Mind freely.—That I should not quarrel if there was none— & would join either in a meer Compliment or another like my Draft—That the latter or something like it was our Duty & would answer many good Purposes & that I begged him to remember what I had said—Wallace is to report to Elliot . . .

"I have done my Duty—And perhaps shall find myself best served by the . . . Obstacles to the Address. Certainly so—if the Crown does not finally prevail."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. On the next day, Smith, Elliot, Wallace, and Axtel met at White's. "Wallace reported that Dr. E. would not come & that Morris was gone on a Party of Pleasure to the Hook but had said he would join in an Address that was merely Compliment.

"Of Course to gain Morris my Draft was given up & they (White only excepted) refused to say a Word of the Spanish or Irish News—We then resolved to adhere to Compliments in the Strain of Elliot's Draft which I take Home to Charles the Dictation at Elliot that I refused to do it there & I promised to send it to his office as I should alter it to be copied by Mr Seton.—I dropp'd that nothing was lost by Delay for if the Rebels supposed we disliked the Gov't Proclamation they would approve it the more, for they considered us as Tories."—Ibid., under Ap 15. See Ap 27.

The "sons of St. George" celebrate "the festivity of their tutelar Saint, at Mr Strachan's Queen's Head Tavern, where an elegant dinner was prepared for that purpose." Nineteen loyal toasts were drunk, and "the day spent with every social enjoyment."—My 1, 1780.

The governor thinks an attack from a French fleet is "not improbable" and "tells me," says Smith, "he is busy with the Commodore on the Project of sinking 20 Hulks in the Channel at the mouth of the River & that he would not be surprised if the Point be of much use—The Expense of the Hulks loaded with Stone about £1000—not to be sunk till the moment of the Enemy's approach."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith's revision of Elliot's draft of an address of welcome to Gen. Robertson (see Ap 24), is being circulated for the signatures of the council members.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. On April 28, Smith recorded: "The Gov't tells me Elliot was with him yesterday upon the Subject of an Address, but as he found it meekly complimentary & the Council not unanimous he rather declined the Receipt of it. Opposition would say the Minister had sent out a Man not agreeable to the People. I replied that every Evidence of our Refusal to express joy at his Arrival would be more reconcilable the People without the Lines to his appointment."—Ibid., VI, under Ap 28. He added, on April 29: "Eliott calls here with a Face of Concern—intimates that the Gov't disliked our Address as paying no Compliment to him & much to Tryon & that this was the true Objection—I told him what the Gov't had said yesterday. He then showed me one he [Robertson] would receive & asked my Hand to it—I altered a few Words & signed it tho' I really think the Complainants, VI, under Ap 28. See My 2, 1780.

The chamber of commerce, in an address bearing this date, May signed by Isaac Low, president, congratulates Gov. Robertson on his arrival.—Royal Gen., My 13, 1780.

Lord Germain writes from Whitehall to Gov. Robertson, expressing the king's approbation of the "spiritual Behavior" of the inhabitants of New York "in so cheerfully and unanimously taking up Arms and embodying [organizing] for the Defence of the Town," when the rivers were frozen up. The governor published this letter on June 28.—Royal Gen., Je 28, 1780.

Rivington prints the following address to Gov. Robertson from Andrew Elliot, Chas. W. Athorp, Wm. Smith, Hugh Wallace, Henry White, and Wm. Axtel, "appointed by the Royal Instructions to form the Council for the Province of New-York."

"Deeply impressed by sentiments of loyalty, and gratitude to our most gracious Sovereign, for his paternal affection and attention to the happiness and interests of his subjects in America, announced to us by your Excellency's Proclamation [see Ap 15], it is pleasing, with the highest satisfaction, to gratulate your Excellency, on your appointment, to the care of a province, of which, your long residence, has given you so competent a knowledge, and where, the inhabitants, are from experience, so sensible of the confidence they may repose in your abilities, inclination, and exertions to promote their happiness.

"The ambitious and self-interested promoters of rebellion, to support their unauthorized, and perilous combinations, withdesigns, pretensions, arbitrary powers, have, by concealing, and misrepresented, the many generous and humane offers made by Great Britain, for restoring public tranquillity, brought on the inhabitants of this once happy country, every evil they at first taught them to dread.

"Their personal estates are now wrested from them by taxation, their real ones sunk to the par of their paper dollars, their commerce annihilated, their civil rights and privileges trampled upon by Congress and Committee Men, and their persons liable to be dragged into the field at all seasons to perform the duties of a Soldier.

"In the sympathy we feel for our suffering country, nothing can be more grateful to us, than the benevolence of the Proclamations issued by his Majesty's Commissioner, and your Excellency, so amply affording to the inhabitants of America, the means for extricating themselves from their present distresses; and whereby they are assured that Great-Britain is still willing to restore to the colonies, the benefits of local legislation, with their former constitutions, a participation in her extensive commerce, and an exemption from all regulations not imposed by themselves.

"His Majesty's attention to the immediate happiness of this province, by empowering your Excellency to embrace the earliest opportunity, consistent with the public exigencies, to open the Courts of Judicature, convene an Assembly, and completely re-establish both the Legislative and Executive Authority, will, we are convinced, rouse, and bring forward, every aid requisite to enable your Excellency to fulfill his Majesty's most gracious intentions.

"We most cheerfully concur with your Excellency, in the applause so justly due to the merits of your predecessor, under whose administration this province, when connected with, and protected by Great-Britain experienced uninterrupted felicity.

"From the esteem principles of loyalty and personal confidence in your Excellency, you may be assured, of our co-operating in every measure conducive to the honour of the crown, and the common prosperity and interests of our fellow subjects."—Royal Gaz., My 3, 1780. An address very similar to this, endorsed "M' Elliot's Draft of an Address to Govr. Robertson," is among the unbound Wm. Smith MSS., folio 197. See also Ap 27.

Lieut.-Gen. Knyphausen plans to complete immediately "the interior Line of Works for the Defence of this City." Gen. Patterson calls together the captains of militia, and informs them that, "Among other Works it is proposed to erect some new Redoubts, and City Militia being now Regularly embodied for the express Purpose of Co-operating in every Defence of the city, it is very much my wish that they may have the Credit in Conjunction with His Majesty's Troops, of raising one of these intended Redoubts themselves, to hear, as a lasting monument of their Loyalty, the name of the Citizen's Redoubt."—N. Y. H. S. Col. (1853), 392-93.

"This Line of Defence" extended "from the North to the East River by Bunker's Hill" and demanded "a working Party daily . . . of 500 Men." The militia companies furnished "500 of that number," and Gen. Patterson, in another letter of May 29, said: "they have ever since labour'd very cheerfully, without talking Pay or Provisions & have now almost finished the work."—Ibid., 178-79.

The militia completed its part of the work about June 5.—Royal Gaz., Je 3, 1780.

13 Born as chief-justice at the governor's house.— Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. May, Am. Hist., Io, 1881, p. 429. He had been appointed exactly one year earlier (see My 4, 1779). Because military government never yielded to civil government under the British régime (see Mr 21, 1782), Smith never functioned in this office.

In an order to the barrack master, Maj.-Gen. Patterson directs that "Mr Samuel Bayard, Secretary of the Province, is to occupy the lower part of the House in which Mr. Bridgham now lives in Smith Street, and she is to remove into the upper part with her family."—N. "The Weather has been so cold that we have no Grass Feed yet. Most People imagine that to 10 Days would overturn the Upsurpation in Jersey. It begins to be surmized either that the British are tired or unwilling to terminate the War. But suppose we should conquer Jersey & on the arrival of the French leave it again? I think this a better Objection to the Excursion than the Want of Forage and the Danger to the Soldiers from the Dampness of the Ground,"— Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

At dinner yesterday, says Smith, "a Group of idle Generals who had been boast of their weekly Toast at Roubal's formerly De Lancy's House & now pleased themselves with the Prospect of Exhibitions at the Birth Day. British forces under Clinton capture Charleston (S. C.)— Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI., May 12; Robertson's Jour. (MS.). In his diary, under May 16, Smith writes: "We have heard nothing certain but its [Charleston's] Investiture about the 12 of April [May 12] since which we seem the Congress have had Nothing from that Town. This delay is very injurious to the King's Interest in this Quarter, especially as we have nearly lost an Opportunity for seizing the Highland Forts which the Rebel Army will probably soon think of moving to unless we throw a Body of Troops into Bergen County."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. Official Information of the surrender of Charleston did not reach New York until May 29 (p. 6).

The 37th and 45th Regiments are reviewed "in the vicinity of this city." All the general and other officers in town, both British and Hessian, and thousands of spectacles are present.—Royal Gaz., My 17, 1780.

Patients and convalescents in the general hospitals of the city "do daily purchase Spirituous Liquors from the License'd Public Houses, to the great detriment of their Health, and the subversion of good Order and Regularity." Such sales are now prohibited, by order of the commandant; and, "in order that no one shall be deceived, or plead the not knowing Convalescents from other Soldiers, all those who may be allowed to walk abroad as such in future, will wear the distinguishing mark of an H, made of blue Cloth, and sewed upon a conspicuous part of each Arm." Persons who induce patients to sell their clothing or the bedding and utensils of the hospitals will be amenable to court martial.—Royal Gaz., My 17, 1780.

From this time through the rest of the year, Washington considered campaign plans for attacking the enemy at New York—

Goods and merchandise have lately been brought clandestinely into the city in considerable quantities, in violation of the established regulations (see Jl 17, 1777). These regulations are therefore revived and reinforced by a proclamation prohibiting the practice.

The Guadaloupe a Frigate of 28 Guns arrived last Night in 4 Weeks from St. Kitts with 4 Prizes. A Report that the French Fleet has left Martinique for Georgia. Much anxiety for St. H Clifton from whom we hear nothing except by a Rebel Paper that the Place had not surrendered 17th April.—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Gen. Robertson pays tribute to Washington’s alertness when he says to Smith: “Washington can always have 48 Hours Notice of our moving & that is enough for him to get away.” Commenting on the failure of the British to make any attempt to occupy the “Highland Forts” (see My 12), Smith says: “If Great Britain recalled all her Generals & raised her Colonists her affairs would probably mend. Her principal officers are the Plants of Corruption. Her Distresses were before Merit for the Sake of the Day. The apology for our present Idleness is the Possibility of the French Fleets appearance here before that expected under Greene.—We are therefore fiddling in the Planting of Cannon on the Shores & at the same Time amusing ourselves with Toasts, Plays &c.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Gov. Robertson reports to Germain that “everything is preparing for a vigorous defence on both the land and sea sides. Bar- reries are made and guns placed on them where ever they can most effectually damage the enemy’s ships, but these can only annoy, etc.” He explains his plan of sinking vessels loaded with stones to obstruct the channel, if necessary. “A faceing work that can contain one hundred men” has been constructed around the light-house. “A large square fort is built at Brooklyn heights, the works at Paulus Hook are strengthened, and those at Fort Knyphausen put in order.—The towns people are employ’d in joining the redoubts near the town with lines.”—N. Y. Cal. Docs., VIII: 791-92.

A number of exchanged British naval prisoners arrive from Elizabeth-Town. “In lieu of Fat Beef, the poor fellows have had thirteen dried Claws per day, for a considerable time.”—Royal Gaz., My 20, 1780.

A New Yorker writes from Sandy Hook to a friend in Edin- burgh: “The army has not yet taken the field. The rebels in this quarter seldom molest us; and when they do appear, their numbers are so inconsiderable, that they retreat at the approach of any detachment. The Guadaloupe [see My 18] arrived here yesterday from the West Indies. In her way she took a Spanish ship of 22 guns in an Action of near 2 hours, and the enemy was driven away in safety. She also brought an account that Admiral Parker had engaged the French Fleet, and had taken and destroyed five sail of the line.”—Lloyd’s Eve. Post, Je 30-Jl 3, 1780.

Another letter from New York states: “Every person from New-Jersey and Pennsylvania who has lately come to this City, gives us a horrid description of the distress and oppression of the Rebels. And I am well informed, that Washington’s Continental Army, now near Morris-Town, when they were lately reviewed by their Chief and the French Ambassador, did not exceed 3000 effective men, exclusive of those dispatched to the southward, and those under General De Calb. . . . We also hear, that the Indians have commenced hostilities on the Frontiers of this Province and New-Jersey; in consequence of which, Governors Living- ston and Clinton detached a party of Militia to oppose them; but the party was obliged to return for want of provisions.”—Lloyd’s Eve. Post, Je 30-Jl 3, 1780.

Smith reports the presence in the city of “30 Farmers from Bergen County who had been drafted & must go into the Cont1 army or bear 100 Lashes. They say that being forced to be soldiers the People in New Jersey will elect the King’s Whigs, Governors Living- ston and Clinton detached a party of Militia to oppose them; but the party was obliged to return for want of provisions.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Washington’s army, writes Smith, is reported “distressed for Provisions—in a mutinious Temper.” Eleven regiments, of 2,200 men, make up the “Pennsylvan Line,” and the old army numbers

“but 3600.” The “Line” is disaffected and “speak daringly & May defy the Rest. Say openly they will join the British and deliver up the army. Papers daily scattered thro’ the Camp in such Language. The People in general of the like Mind—Friends say if the British now enter the Province the Soldiery will not suffer Washington to run away.” The Country will join—Fayette promises nothing but Help if the British are defeated in the West Indies. No Accounts from Charles Town later than 17 April.—It was then completely invested.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Rivington publishes in his paper of this date a long anonymous letter addressed to himself. It has been discovered in the researches connected with this work that Chief-Juice Wm. Smith was the author.

He begins by declaring that France and Spain do not wish the colonies to gain their independence. They merely intend “to feed the flames of contention,” to exhaust, if possible, “the strength both of Great Britain and her Colonies,” and then “to pour in foreign forces, for the compleat subjegation of the Colonies to their merciless dominion.” After this, he continues: “That they [France and Spain] should at present study to conceal this inquituous intention, except from those who, for their assistance, are made interested in the plot is naturally to be supposed; but whether Monsieur la Luzerne, who has lately visited the Rebel camp, and the Marquis De la Fayette, who is come out from France to deep into the weakness of the country, . . . may not find America prepar’d to receive the avowal and an avowal and a vast and ambitious views of the House of Bourbon, is certainly worth the attention of a people long abused by false confidences, and indeed of every friend to humanity and the protestant Religion. Should these Popish emissaries in addition to that state of the country already sent home by Gerard, represent the Congress to be what they are, without credit abroad, or influence at home, that their boasted army in the mountains of Morris-Town, consis of less than 4000 men, without pay, ill-clad, and reduced to eat dog’s flesh for subsistence, and so nearly a mutinous dissolution, that the Pennsylvania line is nightly disarmed and guarded, and that all the rest of their force (except the besieged in Charlestown) is short of 2000 men, scattered in the Highlands, at Fort Stanwix, and in Virginia: What effectual service can these insignificant troops perform daily by desertsions, and the expirations of their terms, and that the Congress want the means, to find volunteers to replenish a camp that has nearly as many huts as men: Such representations, I say, might induce the courts of Versailles and Madrid, to throw away the mask of their affected love to mankind . . . .

“T may afford some conformation of the suspicion we ought to entertain, of the crafty design of the British name and nation, to peruse certain passages from the new work of a celebrated Frenchman, I mean ‘the political and philosophical speculations’ of Mons. Linguet late of the Parliament of Paris.” Smith summarizes Linguet’s remarks on America as follows: “The fate of the American colonies being now submitted to the decision of armies, it will be to the maintenance of the independence of their claims to independence. But I could wish to inquire of politicians in either hemisphere, whether they have seriously reflected on all the effects which such an independency may be expected to produce.

“In the first place, will not the success of the Americans be an endless source of divisions amongst themselves? From what we know of the human mind, ambition and a love of power will soon begin to actuate the operations of the Congress and the provincial assemblies . . . the example of seven little provinces near the Zulderzee, which have preserved unity after success, and freedom notwithstanding their wealth, is by no means applicable to the vast, and almost boundless extent of the American colonies. Nor have the Americans the same motive to a revolt that formerly influenced the Dutch, who were grazing under the most oppressive tyranny . . . .

“In the next place, the first manoeuvre of the Americans as independent states, will be to open an asylum to Europeans . . . . The crowd of active and restless minds, whom the hopes of a better fortune, and the dawn of liberty in a rising state, may attract to the western hemisphere, will not fail to multiply the seeds of disorder there . . . .

“Supposing however these speculations to be ill founded . . . still it must be acknowledged, that America when well pleased, will no longer have any occasion for the productions or assistance of
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

May 1780. Europe... Its inhabitants, surrounded by seas which abound with fish; masters of the richest mines; in the neighborhood of the sugar, indigo, delicious fruits, spices, precious stones, and fine linen... will soon become the masters of our destiny.

"It will then be from the necessity of things, that we shall depend on them, more than ever they depended upon us..."

But their abounding with gold and diamonds will be far from constituting the whole of their superlativity over us; they will add to these, all the powers which states, as well as individuals, derive from the vigour of youth and a consciousness of prosperity.

"Then, they will soon aim at crushing the languid powers of Europe..."

The time of such a revolution is uncertain; but it will be inevitable. Many of America shall become flourishing and independent."

"Royal Gaz., My 24, 1780.

Smith's authorship is revealed by entries in his diary. On May 23, he wrote: "I sent Rivington yesterday a few Lines to introduce a Passage or two from a late French Publication by Linquet late of the Parliament of Paris... I have aimed to prevent its being mischievous but chiefly to publish Washington's Weakness, without giving umbrage to the Army here." He added, on May 25, "I was happy to find the Representation respecting the Rebel Army which I inserted in Rivington's Paper this Day so well & so early confirmed."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"The Drought is really alarming," writes Smith. "No rain since 4 April—It is scarce possible by the Coldness & Dryness of the Spring for Cattle to subsist upon grazing—Complaints come also of an Insect that devours the Buds of the Fruit Trees like the house that last Fall consumed the Breads of Wheat."—Wm. Gen. Robertson sent for me early this morning, writes Smith, "to receive the accounts by the Iris Frigate that left Charles Town 17th Inst.—Fort Sullivan surrendered S. & Charles Town the 12 Inst. I have heard, writes Smith, that the Erection of an Orchestra on the N. Side of Chancel of Trinity Church for the Music and this sharpened still more by the Commandants Orders to widen the walk towards which occasioned the removing of some Tomb Stones flattening certain Graves & Covering a Vault's Mouth.

General Tryon told me last Night the Rector had consented. I should have heard at it & spoke of the Tenderness of Mankind respecting the Rites of Sepulture by Smith, that the Erection of this Orchestra, as it might be thought by the Army would perhaps be spoke of in the House of Commons next Winter as a Breach of Decorum & an Injury to the King's Interest—It may cool & wean some warm Church men—at least it affords a Triumph to the Whig Interest in Town—The only good Effect it can have is that far from being intended if to recede to the Erection of the Civil Authority."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. See also Je 5.

Mayor Mathews, "attended by a most respectable body of our principalCitizens," presents an address to Gov. Robertson. Hope is expressed for the "speedy Suppression of this present unnatural Rebellion, and of the Re-establishment of Peace." A desire for the restoration, in the meantime, of civil government; although a word of commendation is spoken for the "just and equitable Military Establishment, whereby the internal Order and Police of this City have been wisely regulated and conducted." In the course of a brief answer to this address, the governor said: "Your Behaviour affords a better Proof than Words that a Spirit of Loyalty to the King and an Affection to the Parent State, exist, and may easily be called forth in America."

In further celebration of the anniversary of the king's birthday (see Je 4), a "very elegant entertainment" is given by Gov. Robertson "to all the British and German Generals, with their suites, the Lieut. Governor, Chief Justice, and the rest of his Majesty's Council."—N. Y. Merc., Je 12, 1780. At night, fireworks were exhibited on Long Island, and "here they had festivities. But previous thereto, the walk at Trinity Church had been increased in width, so that the posts had to be sunk into the graves. The orchestra from the Play House, seated against the Church, and another place for the musicians erected just opposite the Church, gave great offense and uneasiness to all serious and still more to all godly men, and caused many reflections not only on the irreligious turn of the Commandant, but also on the Rector, whom it is said had given his consent to it. Ephraim Smith, from London, "Who formerly kept Smith's Tavern in this City and Philadelphia," announces that he has "assumed his former situation, No. 936, in Water-Street." Believing that a "Steak & Chop House In the London Style" is much wanted in the city, he has laid out the lower part of his house on this plan, "and the upper part for detached companies." He will endeavour to keep the "best of wines, punch and draft porter, with steaks, chops and cutlets, every day, from one o'clock till four."—N. Y. Merc., Je 6, 1780.

Richard Watton had first opened this tavern on Ja 12, 1778 (p. 518).

There appears, of this date, an Extraordinary Gazette from Rivington's press recounting the capture of Charleston (see My 12). The copy for this issue was prepared by Wm. Smith, a fact revealed in print for the first time in this Chronology. On the receipt of the official reports of Charleston's capture in New York (see My 29), "Gen'l Robertson very wisely suggests to me," writes

Gen. Sir Henry Clinton thanks Maj.-Gen. Patton for his “great Attention” to the good Discipline of the Garrison, and to the Safety and Welfare of the City,” during Gen. Clinton’s “Absence on Expedition.” He also praises the zeal of the inhabitants “to oppose the Enemy.”—Royal Gaz., Jl 1, 1780.

Clinton, having “information that Washington w'd all two Brigades of his Army had moved in Divisions . . . to pass the Clove . . . to West Point,” orders “all the Troops on Staten Island that came from the southward to reembark on Board their Sev'l Transports w't Intention to Land at or Near Nack [Nyack] & to Endeavour to cut part of the Rebels on their march.”—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Smith, in his diary, cenures Clinton's inactivity: “He should have gone instantly to the Highland Fords . . . near a week is already wasted [see Je 17].”

“I am most inclined to believe he will make the apprehension of a French Fleet an Excuse for total Inactivity, & recline on the Pillow of the Reputation acquired by the Charles Town Success. . . .”

These 5 Days lost since his Arrival might have terminated the War. I think it probable that the Rebels would have deserted the Forts above on his Approach—The wind almost constantly favourable. We find the Garrison above horribly alarmed on the Return of the Fleet—300 drawn instantly from the White Plains—Some of the stores at West Point hurried away to Fish Kill—Agreed Garrisons are weak there. A New Yorker writes: “A very considerable alteration, with regard to freedom of speech, is discoverable in the people in most parts of America. Those who, either from policy or from principles, were privately well-wishers to Government, fear not now to declare their real sentiments. They foresee, or flatter themselves they foresee, the approaching downfall of Congress, and therefore think themselves secure in welcoming the cheerful prospect.”—Lloyd's Enr Post, Aug 7-8, 1780.

Smith writes that 30 ships with 3,000 to 4,000 soldiers on board have passed up the river this afternoon. “General Lesly commands—they are to land at Tappan—if they got a Head of Washington & Knuyphausen who is following with 6000 comes up with him he must light or leave all his Heavy Baggage & fly over the Western Mountains on this Side of Sussex Court House.”—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

“The Surprise intended by going into Jersey miscarry'd by the Sloveness of the Germans in advancing.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

“Tryon was very active yesterday & in much Danger as I learn from others. He is modest himself—did not slip a Syllable of that Nature.—Spoke of the Rebels as unable to stand the Kings Troops—They constantly retire—Nothing like their ever facing a Bayonet. —Fly to Eminences with their Field Pieces & scull to get a Fire & then run.—undoubtedly the Pensilvania Line is disaffected. All the Deserters are uniform in their Reports of it. They are lately promised hard money. Washington may have 3000 Continentals. His leaving Jersey a Proof of his Weakness.”—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

At this time, “Mount Pleasant” (see L. M. R. K., III: 981), kept by one Corby, was the scene of the anniversary celebration of “St. John the Baptist” by Lodge No. 210 of the “Ancient York Masons.”—N. T. Merc., Je 26, 1780. Cf. N. J., 24, 1779.

“The conduct in Jersey is much confused.—It is provoked by the Tarleton party who represented the Rebellion as expiring.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith writes of a long interview with Gov. Robertson, who tells of the difficulties under which he labours because Clinton and Arbuthnot “draw different ways.” He calls them both “Fools,” the former being “excessively jealous & crude & unsteady.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Maj.-Gen. Patterson notifies John Marston that his house has been assigned to Maj.-Gen. Reidesel, hoping that “the Inconvenience of removing” will be lessened by General Tryon’s leaving Marston’s house in town.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 204.

Smith writes concerning Clinton: “What an Opportunity has he lost since the 17th of June. Tis possible the Militia may crumble away & the Forts grow weak to favor a Surprize but I believe the Summer is lost. The Army is reenforced as gathering Strawberries by making Hay by others & this Day the Secretary’s Notice in Rivington of a Play to be acted by Officers on the 3d Inst as by particular Desire.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

It is reported that Ethan Allen is in New York “from the Rebel Lines.”—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 92.

Gen. Patterson writes to Joshua Loring that: “The Fence round the North Church Prison is in every respect insufficient for the Security of the Prisoners.” He directs him “to procure a Quantity of Stockades, and fence it round.”—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 213.

Thomas McMullin announces that he has opened a large and convenient house “close to the Fresh Water Pump for a Tavern, distinguished by a sign representing his present Majesty, King George the Third, where gentlemen may depend on being served with different Wines, London Porter, &c. all of the first quality, and he being so very contiguous to the cool spring as to have his water the moment when he wats, he flatters himself that his mixed liquors will give entire satisfaction.”—Royal Gen., Jl 1, 1780.

Later, McMullin advertised the opening of an “Oyster House” here.—N. T. Merc., O 2, 1780. McMullin not only offered liquid entertainment to Britshish soldiers, but also arranged bull-balls, games of “common,” and other diversions (ibid, Ag 20, 1780; Ag 29, 1781; Mr 16, 1782). John Cochran had become proprietor of the tavern before Febr 3, 1783 (p. iv), when the house, described as No. 110 Water St., was advertised to let on May 1. Simeon King took the house in the spring of 1784, removing the Royalist sign and substituting more democratic one of the “Indian King.”—N. T. Gazetteer & Cen. Jour., Jl 5, 1784. This sign had formerly hung from a tavern at 69 Cherry St. (see S 17, 1781).

A coming auction at the Coffee House is advertised, for the sale of the “Remains of the Prison Hospital Ship Kitty, as they now lay in the Wallalbough, with the Launch, Anchors, Cables, etc.”—N. T. Merc., Jl 3, 1780.

4 Writers were appointed to the board of ordnance that: “a Building which has, since the King’s Troops took Possession of New York, been appropriated for the tole Use of Keeping all said Ammu- nation at a Safe and convenient Distance from the City is judged necessary to be pulled down, on Account of interrupting the Line of Defence, that is carried from the North to the East River. It is besides in a very bad State, and reported upon a Survey I ordered to be made to be too far decayed both Walls and Roof to admit of being repaired.”—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 188.

5 The New York chamber of commerce passes a vote of thanks to Charles Newman, commander of the packet “Carteret,” who, when attacked by four “rebels” privateers off Long Island, preserved the mails. It also votes him a piece of plate, with an approbatory description—Royal Gen., Jl 5, 1780.

Smith writes in his diary: “The Tale of Simon Stevens [is] mysterious. He went to the Com” in Chief, who sent B Robinson with him to see Allen. He was not there—Stevens confesses he foraged the Letters in Allen’s Name but says he saw Levi & not July Ethan Allen. Stevens is thrown into the Prevost this Morning. Robinson on search for Ethan Allen who is believed to he hard by.—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

“The elegant plate, household & kitchen furniture” (which are inventoried) belonging to Maj.-Gen. Tryon, are advertised to be sold on July 7 at his house in Wall St.—Royal Gen., Jl 5, 1780.

Smith writes that he suspects Clinton and Arbuthnot quarrelled at Charleston “about the Division of Plunder,” and thinks they are “irreconcilable.” He learned yesterday “that Cap’l George who is an Aid de Camp of Clintons & now lodges in the James House had 5 large Cases brought into his Room, some very heavy which he brought from Charles Town. His Servants may many new Pieces of new Linen came out of casks of them & the Rest were probably Plate.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Clinton said yesterday, writes Smith, that “it was his Opinion the Rebellion would terminate in a Crash.—He spoke of it with Elation.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith says: “Simon Stevens [see Jl 4] was out of the Prevost yesterday. The Mistery is unravelled!—The Com” in Chief has seen Ethan Allen.—He was exasperated that General Robertson & I knew of his arrival—To cast a Blind he (Stevens) was sent to the Prevost—He reveals this Joke to Griffith to Day who reports it to me—What astonishing Jealousy! Griffith says it must not be known or Stevens will suffer

“I saw the Governor immediately after this Information the he has been here while Griffith was waiting an Opportunity to give it.”

“He had a hearty Laugh on the Aspect of Allen’s Interview as favorable to the Public & the Folly of Sir H C & above all the Serrility of Col’ Robertson. It was he that brought the Information that Stevens was imprisoned as a Cheat and hear he that had confessed he forged the Letter he showed General Robertson—That he brought it to a Jury to copy & then himself signed Ethan Allen’s name & that he said it was Levi Allen he had seen

“Sir Henry himself told the Gov’t that Stevens was a bad Fellow whom he had once before thrown into Jail. He owned that he had it in Design to practise upon the Vermonters & that he had written to Haldimand to promise them a separate Governor but that Haldimand said they were Villains & would not suffer any of them to come into his Government.

“Robertson had also told the Governor that he believed notwithstanding all that Ethan or Levi Allen was still with our Lines concealed.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI.

The cruiser “Sir George Rodney,” of 14 guns, commanded by Capt. Daniel Moore, returns to this harbour, “after a fierce and continued engagement with the brig HOLLER.” Many were killed on both sides; the Holler escaped pursuit.—Royal Gen., Jl 12, 1780.

The “Sign of the Happy Man,” near Dr. Brownjohn’s wharf, mentioned in an advertisement of a house for rent, is one of the street-signs typical of this period.—N. T. Merc., Jl 19, 1780.

A London news item reads: “The following is said to be the situation of affairs at New York when the Carteret came away (on this day). General Clinton was there, but went occasionally to visit the army, which was encamped at Phillipsburgh, about 16 miles from that town, under the command of Col. Polson. Knyp- hausen was returned from his expedition to the Jerseys, after having had a few skirmishes with the advanced posts of Washington’s army which lay encamped near the Port of Philadelphia. Clinton commanded the port, with the following ships, viz. the Europe, Robuste, and Raisable, of 64 guns each; Renown of 70; Roebuck and Iris of 44; Pearl and Blonde of 32; and Triton and Guadalupe of 28. Besides these there were the Vulcan sloop, and several smaller vessels.”—Lloyd’s Eve. Post (London), Aug 25-28, 1780.

Rochambeau arrives at Newport from France with transports carrying 4000 men and a convoy of seven ships of the line.—Winston, VI: 495, 496.

To relieve “the many loyal subjects who have been driven from their possessions by the Rebels,” Gov. Robertson, with Clinton’s approval, publishes a notice “that the houses and lands belonging to persons in rebellion, or being amongst the Rebels, will be divided (excepting such as are wanted for the King’s service) and small lots assigned to the Morris-Rufence family that these may be proportioned to the number and wants of the claimants.” Such claimants “are desired to leave their petitions for this pur-

Pope with Philip J. Livingston, at his house near Hell-Gate, on Long-Island, or at the Provincial Secretary's Office, in Broad-Street, New-York. . .—"Royal Gaz., Jl 19, 1780. In a later order (O 5), Robertson provided that persons "drove from their property by the rebel, or fled on account of their loyalty, being unprovided for, and in distressed circumstances are desirous of locations in Suffolk County," were to apply likewise.—N. Y. Mere., O 9, 1780.

Gov. Robertson appoints George Duncan Ludlow "Master of the Rolls for the province and Superintendent of the Police on Long-Island, with powers on principles of equity, to hear and determine controversies, and maintain peace and good order, and regulate the Police through the same, until civil government in all its forms can take place; and all Officers of the Island are required to aid the said Magistrate and his Assistant, in their Office, and obey such orders as they shall from time to time receive for the effectual execution of their decrees."—Royal Gaz., Jl 19, 1780. A week later, Ludlow published an announcement of the opening, at Jamaica, of "The Office for regulating the Police, on Long Island."—Ibid., Jl 26, 1780.

Admiral Greaves arrives "off the Hook with 6 sail of the line."—Robertson's Jour. (M.S.). Writing at 4 p. m., Smith says: "Adm. Greaves below with 6 of his Fleet—the 4th in Sight—This by an Officer of the Romanus to the General Office. An Express is going up to the Town to meet the Chief who went yesterday to Philipsburg." Writing again at sunset, he says: "There are now but 6 ships at the Hook. & Arbuthnot orders all over the Bar out to them Great & small about 20 Sail—of the Line the 50—three 44. They will go out on the Search for the French Fleet. Walthingham must now have joined Rodney with 7. He wrote to Arbuthnot for 5 ships wanting no more. "Our Scene is now changed. And if we providentially intercept the French Fleet a sudden Peace may ensue."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

It was reported in London in September that, as soon as Admiral Greaves arrived at New York, "the inhabitants, to a man, able to bear arms, as well on Long Island and Staten Island, as in the city, offered their services to supply the places of the Military, in guarding the towns and forts contiguous."—Lloyd's Eve. Post (London), S 13-15, 1780.

The provost-marshal is ordered by Gen. Patterson "to cause to be apprehended William Brathwaite, late Broker to the New Insurance Office, that he may be forthcoming before the Chamber of Commerce," to answer charges by "the Company of Underwriters belonging to the said Company."—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1873), 408-409. Whig sites: "If Arbuthnot can retain 6 to 8 ships he cannot keep Rhode Island; & if he does he must raise the Land Forces. Tin said the greater number of the Transports are still on this side Hellgate. "As we had the first News of the French arrival, 18 Ins surely, the Winds that brought the Adm1 to Rhode Island might have blown the Transports to White Stone—It blew S. W & S 18-19, 20-21—Yesterday & to Day N E & N. Some of the Transports did come down the River yesterday. Sir Henry is in Town & daily takes his Rides out & his Evening Walks. The Town grows—and I dare say the Adm1 will thunder."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

The "Blond" man-of-war "on the Rocks" near Corlazer's Hook through carelessness, says Smith. Clinton was "to have sailed to Rhode Island" in her. Gen. Robertson believes Arbuthnot must be "treading on Rags," for the troops had not "imarked" at Whitestone last Night, and the "43rd Regt (Ld Colr March) did not move from Breucklin till 6 o'clock yesterday."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

"No Tidings yet whether Washington is moving across the North River. If he does the recasting of the Salt Provisions and Bread at this Instant of high Harvest [it] must infinitely distress the Farmers. Many Farmers & their Sons daily fly to us from the Tyranny in the Upper Country—Horrid monthly Taxes & Fines wean the People from the Congressional Extravagances. Last Saturday 36 from Dutchess County."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VI.

"The Sugar House, with all the Utensils and out-houses, belong- ing to the estate of the late Henry Cuyler, deceased, situate in the North Ward of this city," is advertised to be sold at "public Vendue" on Aug. 14.—Royal Gaz., Jl 26, 1780. The date of sale was postponed to Aug. 17.—N. Y. Mere., Ag 14, 1780. 1780
It is reported that Clinton and the ships that started for Rhode Island & Newport called at Huntingdon," writes Smith; "the Genl. Smith doubting whether Washington might not attack in his Absence & the Expediency of his going on." Writing on the next day, Smith adds: "What an infectious Conduct is he exhibiting! He holds the Adm. & will not contribute to his Credit or he is a Coward. Time will detect the Principle that actuates to his Delays. I consider this Halting as more affective to waste Time than a real Train of consequences may ensue."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

In his journal, under this date, Capt. Archibald Robertson writes: "The State of the English & French Fleets. The English have 12 men-of-war, 9 frigates, 2 sloops, and 1 fireship; the French have 7 men-of-war, 5 frigates, and 2 armed ships. Admiral Arbuthnot, with the English vessels is at Block Island, and Admiral Ternay with the French is in the Harbour of Rhode Island."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.), VI.

Smith writes: "Ralph Izard came over in Ternay's Fleet—Explains ag^l Franklin & Deane—they say they have agreed to give the Fishery to France & the Floridas to Spain—He is gone to tell Congress the Country is sold to Foreigners—Ternay's Squadron miss a vessel with all their medicines—so Izard said who damned their management—The French land forces by 2,000.——Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"To my astonishment," writes Smith, "I perceive Sir H [Clinton] walking by the Window—He has had a N E wind just sufficient to bring him here [from Huntington]." Continuing on the next day, Smith says, "I walked down to the Exchange last evening—In Every Countenance there is Miserly and many are otherwise particularly asking Questions concerning the Cause of the Return of the Fleet——imply Censure on the General. Some who hope the best of him are terrified at a Suspicion of our Danger. Not one Man guesses the true Motive. All are discontented & the Fire will soon burst forth after they hear the Liberties that will be countenanced by the Adm. Joseph Bull I find by Jauney lets off part of what he told me—His coming is unfavorable to the General. Oliver De Lancey told Jauney Washington could not raise a Volunteer in N England & that the Drafted Men came to Long Island. He had himself seen a hundred of them—Jn^l Thurnan was on Board the Fleet often at Fogg's Neck. An Officer told him secretly it would never see Rhode Island because the general hatred the Adm—I thank God that I have cautioned both ag^l suffering their Differences to hurt the Service & become public."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Aug. 29. The British "Camp Equipage" is "brought from King's Bridge & ferried across to Long Island from Fogg's Neck."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

"Remarks on the Conduct of the Campaign, 1780" is the caption under this entry, in William Smith's handwriting. It seems to be preserved in the N. Y. Pub. Library. It starts thus: "That it was in the Power of the British Army to have broken down the Rebellion in this County before the Arrival of Ternay's Fleet is doubted only by those who are unacquainted with the low and unbounded Condition of the Party adhering to the Congress & to the Means by which it might have been completely reduced. . . . The uses of a Com^l of the Hudson are so obvious as to make the Neglect of it not only our Astonishment but the Subject of inauspicious Speculation . . . There is a Season in every Year in which the Highland Fleets may be attacked without the Hope of Succour from the Country—This continues from the Opening of Spring in March to the Ister End of May——Why did Mr. Knyphausen hold 11 Thousand Men in a State of perfect Inactivity to the close of that Month?"—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

"The whole Rebel Force was at this Time despicable——The Main Body in Jersey was between three & four Thousand & the Highland Garrison, under 500—They had no other Men in Arms except 200 at Fort Stanwix . . . 600 more . . in Virginia . . ."

The Detachments of the Rebel Force were known to be disaffected, and many desirous to desert. . . .

"The Congress were trembling at the daily change of the Temper of the People who under the Pressure of their Calamities lent a willing Ear to General Robertsons Proclamation of the 15 April [i.e.] and to the Addresses it excited . . ."

"What an Opportunity & how strong the Inducements to some Activity on that Part if not to strike a decisive Blow yet for such Arms and Descents as might prepare the Way for it by compelling the Enemy to Movements exposing their Army to Descriptions, their Militia to a Consumption of their private Stores, & Usurpers every where to the Contempt & odium of a great Country . . ."

"Can there be an Apology for this Negligence that is not, at best a Shift of Blame from one Shoulder to another. It is that we waited for green Forage. What was it wanted in a Water Passage of 20 Miles up the Hudson or in short Descents or Menaces on the Coast. For more than a week, there has been worn down the Militia & such Measures were achievable by us without either Risk or Expenditure . . ."

"The Sally of the 7 June to Connecticut Farms only 3 Miles behind Elizabeth Town being conducted with an unaccountable Sloveness plundering & conflagration and followed with a secret Retreat in the Dead of Night & a Thunder Storm under all the Symptoms of Fear deserting & quitting Fortresses, might have worn down the Militia & such Measures were achievable by us without either Risk or Expenditure . . ."

"The only Hope was that the Commd in Chief would on his arrival with Reinforcements of 5 or 6000 wipe off the Disgrace we had contracted, but Alas! the Squad affords too much Ground to conjecture that he would have been better pleased to have found the Northern Army still in Winter Quarters . . ."

"... no Man chose to say what he thought—and this express Silence continues while I am writing."—Wm. Smith Mss., folio Diary (MS.).

"A news item, published in London on this day, states: "When the last letters left New-York, they were building three ships of war for the King's service; one of 44, one of 32, and one of 24 guns; the largest of which was expected to be ready to launch this year."—Lloyd's Eve Post, Jl 31—Aug 2, 1780."

"Some of the British troops are encamped at Flushing. On Aug 3, the remainder "landed & encamped at Whitestone." After noting this, Robertson says: "All ordered to be ready to cross to Frog's Neck at a moments Warning—as Genl Washington with the Rebel Army were at Verplank's Point at 1 Yesterday [Aug 2] Afternoon prepared to march at 3 towards Kingsbridge, Point thickens."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Information comes to Smith through a female servant at Clinton's headquarters that "an Aid de Camp of Washington's came there the Night before last & was invisible All Day yesterday confided to the General's Room—that they lodged together in it last Night—She knows not his Name—He is a young Man. The Genl was with him all Day yesterday except while on Board of some Vessel, & that this morning all the Family is on the move."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. For the writer's interpretation of this incident, see S 26.

"General Robertson receives Intelligence," says Smith, "while I was standing with him at Rivington's Corner that Washington recrossed the Hudson on Saturday [Ag 5] & was this morning at Tappan. Has Boats & is 8 or 9000 strong."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

At this time, Lafayette endeavoured to persuade Rochambeau to attempt a movement against New York, which he deemed "the pivot on which turn the operations of the enemy." Rochambeau, however, said that its success would be impossible unless the French possessed a decided superiority on the sea. This they did not have; and the forces under him, even if united with the small army under Washington, he regarded unequal to the proposed capture of New York. Mrs. Perkins, in her account of the Am. Revolution, citing Doniol's La Participation de la France à l'Establissement des Etats Unis d'Amérique, V: 565; and Lafayette, Mémoires, etc. (1837 ed.), II: 125. See also Tower, The Marquis de Lafayette in the Am. Revolution (1895), II: 143. passim.

"Washington proceeded from Tappan to Paramus but our Troops continue at Whitestone and Flushing. Sir Henry came to Town the 8th in the Evening. The Transports come back daily to prepare as said for England. Panton's went out Yesterday to Kings Bridge—the Generals Inactivity is a Mistery. He seems to be perfectly on the Defensive. Why no Man can say. His Conduct therefore not only affords but creates Suspicions of an expected foreign Force—This damps the Loyalists & animates the Rebels."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Gen. Patterson, having been given by the commander-in-chief permission to return to England, writes Andrew Elliot, superintendent general, and the magistrates of police, acknowledging the assistance he has had from them.—N. Y. H. S. Collections (1875), 426-27.

"The Galates arrived from the Adm[1] [Arbutnot]. His Lieut.
Rogers was sent to Newport in a Flag & asserts that No Lands Works are raised. That all their Ordinance was in the ship Isle de France that got into Boston & is now drawing across the Land—That the French had been in vast Consternation but had dismissed 5000 Militia for want of Provisions—Rogers is sent here to tell the Story to the General and that the Fleet waits for him at Gardiner's Island

"Certainly the Rebels find Bread with Difficulty. They draw in Dutchess Sheaves from the Stack of the last Harvest to Mill for the use of the army.

"I believe the Adm[2]'s Importunity will avail Nothing. Reported that 400 Rebels were yesterday opposite to us & with in a Mile or two of Paulus Hook and drove off many Horses. If it is true the greater our Shame. Why is not our army rather at Tappen the Whitestone & Flushing, where the Soldiers Injure themselves by paddling in the Mud & Water for Clams."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

15. Sir Henry [Clinton] leaves the Town for the army on Long Island. I think he has lost his opportunity for the Descent on Rhode Island. . . . If 8000 go to Rhode Island our Force will be 7000 strong—These will all be wanted for the defence of the three Islands. If Washington approaches Poole's Hook this Town may be indisposed tho' we may muster a Militia of 3 or 4000. Long Island must not be trusted solely to the Militia on Account of the Disaffection of Many in Suffolk & visits from Connecticut—The Jersey Militia & Washington may hear us at Poole Hook & Staten Island and from Connecticut & in Queen's County & at King's Bridge—The Jersey Militia are Notified in the Chatham Papers of last Week to hold themselves in Readiness

"We should have attacked Rhode Island before Washington was reinforced & when the Fleet went there in Harvest. He is now stronger & will always be most numerous in Autumn when the Militia can be less spared from Home."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Clinton has fortified New York "so compleatly, that he declares he will defend it against all the force, which the French and Americans can jointly bring against it; but that he will now act wholly upon the defensive, and never more attempt any offensive, until he is reinforced with ten thousand men."—Lloyd's Eve, Post, O 6.

17. Capt. Richard Grinnell makes his escape from the prison-ship
The day he left New York, "there was the hottest press ever known there, they pressed about 700 men that day, and the press still continued, that they not only took seamen, but all the refugees, labourers and merchant's Clerks they came across." On the "Scorpin" and "Strambille" were about 500 prisoners.—Penn. Packet, Aug 22, 1780.

18. A British officer, in a letter to Rivington, refers to "the Mall" as "the chief resort for company of an evening," and observes that "there is seldom a seat in that agreeable walk that is not taken up by the gentlemen," to the exclusion of "the fair sex."—Royal Gaz., Ag 16, 1780. For the location of the "Mall," see Jl 27, 1789.

19. An American officer in the garrison at New York presents an address of gratitude to Maj.-Gen. Pattison on his retirement from command and departure for England.—Royal Gaz., Ag 30, 1780.

20. The "rebels" visit the estate of Col. William Bayard at "Wee-hawks," where they destroy his houses and burn "his farms." They then set fire to his "elegant house" at "Hookuck," and "one of the finest barns ever constructed." These and other improvements are burned to the ground. For two days the "raging flames" burned the grass and "one of the most valuable orchards existing."—Royal Gaz., Ag 30, 1780. Writing in his diary, under the same date, Smith says: "Depredations committing on the Jersey Shore—
Bayards House & Barn in Flames light up this morning near noon.
Description to say 5 Divisions of which yesterday of 6 Brigades 4 Regts each under 1000 in all—This Hall the Rebel army."—Wm.
Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Rivington prints the following statement concerning the "real

SUBSCRIBER, or to Charles Thompson, Esq; Secretary to the Continental Congress, where the said Army is, so that they may be recovered and rallied again, shall be entitled to demand from the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of Three Millions of Paper Dollars as soon as they can be spared from the Public Funds, and Another Million, for apprehending the Person principally concerned in taking the said Army off. Proper passag[e] will be granted by the President of the Congress to such persons as incline to go in search of the said Army.—And as a further encouragement, no dediction will be made from the above reward on account of any of the Militia, (who composed part of the said Army) not being to be found or heard of, as no dependence can be placed on their services, and nothing but the most speedy flight can ever save their Commander.

Horatio Gates, M. G. And late Commander in Chief of the Southern Army. Philadelphia, August 30, 1780." 1780 state of the Rebel Army, the Congress, their Finances, &c. &c."
for the information of the British people:

"No man will now part with any thing for paper money, old or new.—The rebel Commissaries have not credit for a farthing, in any part of the Continent; in every place they take what they want from the farmers, ... and leave a certificate to be paid at Boston's Day.

"The most horrible oppressions are at the same time, used to force the militia to join them in their career to destruction. All their bands are made up of men and boys drafted from an unwilling militia, except the Continentals who had been early beguiled to enlist in the continental, and whose times are not yet out ... who at the opening of the present campaign were about 3 or 4000 in Jersey, and another 1000 in the Highlands, and Fort Stanwick.—They rely for augmentations entirely upon a militia, everywhere a majority abhorring the French, &c. against the protection of the rebellion ...

"The loyalists increase hourly, scarce a day passes without fugitives to this place, from the barbarities perpetrated by the usurpers.

"Resolutions are forming in divers colonies, to resist the freedoms taken with private property to support what the rebels call their army ...

"—Royal Gaz., Ag 26, 1780.

27 Col. Angell, commander of the Second Rhode Island continental regiment, records that he went from Jersey "in Company with a number of the Gentlemen Officers across the woods to north Riter to a place called Spite Devils Creek against king bridge, from thence Down the river to burdeetis ferry at fort Lee. We had a grand prospect of all the Enemies Incampments on York Island."—Field, Diary of Col. Israel Angell, 1778-1781, 109.

28 The Marine Society, and the inhabitants of the city, present addresses of gratitude and esteem to Maj.-Gen. Pattison, on his departure for England, and he makes replies.—Royal Gaz., Ag 29, 1780.

"Members of the "Board of Refuges" are requested to meet on this day "on particular Business, at Mr. Hales, as usual."—N. Y. Merc., S 4, 1780. This was the "Tally-Ho" tavern at the corner of Nassau and King St., run by John Hales.—See Ja 16, 1779.

Gov. Robertson issues a proclamation ordering all male inhabitants between the ages of 17 and 60 to enroll themselves in the militia. Those who refuse to comply with this order shall be subject to imprisonment or banishment. He also issues rules for the "better government of the militia."—N. Y. Merc., S 11, 1780.

Admiral Rodney arrives at Sandy Hook "with 10 Sail of the Line." Being ill, he delayed coming to the City, although "the Guard was turned out to receive him, and many of the Inhabitants were longing to see the brave Rodney."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 99; Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. This was Sir George Bridge's vessel, Rear Admiral of Gt. Britain.—Royal Gaz., S 10, 1780. Robertson gives the date of his arrival "off the Hook" as Sept. 14.—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Rivington publishes a notice offering a reward of 10 guineas for the conviction of the "Forger and Incendiary" who posted his alleged handwriting "in the Church Walk," and sent threatening letters to his house. He adds: "The law of England punishes Forgery with Death."—Royal Gaz., S 16, 1780.

"The Gentlemen who supped at the late Widow de la Montagne's on the 17th of September [error for Oct. 28, q. v.], 1776, (after taking down the Liberty Pole) are informed in this public manner that their bid [bill] for the supper and liquor still remains unpaid; if the iron that has been about the Pole is not now purchased the subscriber will recommend a purchaser, and if the bill is not paid very soon, the subscriber will be under the necessity of publishing the names of the gentlemen that supped on that occasion. "Sir G Bonney comes to Town. A Vessel from Charles Town this Evening with Authentic Dispatches of the Success on the 16 [MS.], Aug. 16—Gates is taken at 9000 ammunitions lost all Cannon Baggage &c.—and were pursued 20 odd miles by the Horse."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI; Fon Krot's Jour. 119.

Col. Williams, of the 80th Regiment, which is billeted at the bouwerie of Jacobus Kip, gives a dinner to Commander-in-Chief Sir Henry Clinton and his staff, as a parting compliment to Major John André, who is about to go north to confer with the American general, Benedict Arnold, in a plot to secure the capitulation of West Point, which Arnold commands.—Life and Career of Major John André, by Winthrop Sargent (1861), 268. An account of the affair was told afterwards by the owner of the house, Jacobus Kip, who was present.—Hist. Notes of the Family of Kip, by Rt. Rev. William I. Kip.

Clinton and André had been, on this evening, prior to this event, at the Beekman house. "From its doors, gracefully bidding adieu to the beautiful Baroness [Riedesel], rode Clinton and André to attend the farewell dinner given that very evening by his brother officers to the latter before he started on his ill-starred expedition, at the old Kip House at Kip's Bay. ... They knew he was to leave on a matter of military importance, but that was all, and little could they gather from the remarkable toast given by Sir Henry Clinton at that brilliant table, "The health of Major André who leaves us to-morrow to return Sir John André."—"Memoir of James William Beekman, by Edward F. De Laney (pub. by the St. Nicholas Soc., N. Y., 1877), 115; Letters and Journals of Mrs. General Riedesel, trans. by Wm. L. Stone (Albany, 1867), 179.

It should be noted that Ford's British Officers in the Am. Rev. mentions no colonel by the name of Williams, but states that Sir William Erskine was colonel of the 80th Regiment. See also Gaine's Universal Register (1781) for the names of officers of the British Army.

According to a statement made by Major André on Sept. 24, 16 he left New York on the 20th "to get on board the Vulture," in order (as he thought) "to meet General Arnold there in the night." He remained on board until the night of the 21st.—Sargent, Life of André, 349.

Robertson says: "At Night Maj' André landed from the Vulture to meet G' A—d at Haverstraw—went to his O79 opposite West Point."—Robertson's Jour. (MS.).

Benedict Arnold and Major André have their interview at the house of Joshua Hett Smith, a square two-storied stone house on the Haverstraw Road, two and a half miles below Stony Point, regarding the proposed attack upon West Point and capitulation.—Sargent, Life of André, 289, 291-92. A facsimile of the pass given by Arnold to André is in the Emmet Collection (No. 8175) of the N. Y. P. L.

Britain's treason was "in some respects the most dramatic and tragic event of the Revolution." Early in February, 1779, while at Washington's camp on the Raritan, he heard that the executive council of Pennsylvania had sent to congress eight charges against him for mal-administration while commanding at Philadelphia.—Penn. Packet, F 15, 1779. Soon after this, there were re-published 11 articles of impeachment exhibited against him on Dec. 1, 1776.—Ibid., F 27, 1779. On Jan. 12, 1780, he was sentenced to be repri- manded, and, in retaliation, he opened the secret treasonable correspondence with Major André.—Avery, Hist. of the U. S., VI: 248.

At a conference at Hartford, Washington, Rochambeau, and De Ternay agree that, of all the operations which can be undertaken, the most important is the reduction of New York, "the center and focus of all the British forces." They also agree that even with a superior naval force to blockade the harbour, it would by Hendeks, Phila., for July 1, 1792, describing the original order-book. It is publicly reported in New York that "Major André who went out to confer with General Arnold" has been "taken by General Washington and 'is supposed will be ill used.'—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 100.

"Sir M Clinton sends for me," says Smith,—"an Hour with him—He opened with his anxiety for André & concluded with telling me for the consolation I had given him in the Opinion that he [André] was no Spy which he said agreed with all the others who had been consulted.

"He told him he had corresponded for a considerable Time with Arnold—that he gave him the Intelligence the French were coming to Rhode Island. That it was his wish to receive it before they arrived but Arbuthnot would not believe his Information —that afterwards he proposed his landing 6000 Men at Scennnet & this the Admiral disapproved & so hid after that another Proposition of landing up the Narraganset. He believed Arbuthnot an honorable Man but he was old and had some bad advisors. Thus he said he had lost his Advantages of rousing the French—

"He lamented the last Disappointment—blamed Arnold for not sending Andre back by Water—Their Interview was at Stoney point & Andre seized on this side Croton by 3 Militia Men & carried to the Light Horse—that he had every Thing ready for seizing the Highlands & putting an End he owned to the War for he had Boats of all Draughts for proceeding to Albany. That the Interview with Arnold was absolutely necessery to ascertain whether he had really been corresponding with Arnold—Arnold was desirous to favor the Capture but he had insisted upon his being an Agent in it & he was to have paid a great Price for the Acquisition. He regretted this Disappointment as the Loss [of] his Hope of an instantaneous Termination of the War—said he should have had both Washington & Rochambeau Prisoners for they were both there now.

"He should have seized the Forts with 6000 & had 5000 more ready, for he thought the Militia sufficient to take Care of this Place
I guess there was Design in this Enumeration

"He said he had revealed his Secret only to Sir G. Rodney of whom he spoke favorably and of the Force he brought with him—intimated Doubts of the Arrival of the other Division of the Fleet, but said he would stay with the 20 Ships of the Line now here for some time—He boasted of his masking the Enterprise up the River by giving out a Design on the Chesapeake—that he should go there yet—Washington had not sent a Man to the Southward since Gates's affair—He could not—He thought Virginia a weak Country from its being cut to Peices by steep Waters & the Number of the Slaves. He did not care whether Washington knew of this Design on the Chesapeake or not

"I said little for he spoke much—Except what related to Andre
I inlarged upon the Idea he now had of the Importance of the Hudson & the Acquisition of it as the End of the War—I lamented his late Disappointment at Rhode Island wondering who could be Arbuthnot's Advisors—but I encouraged him to hope that Virginia recovered all would be over—he spoke with Confidence of his reducing that Country immediately now he was so well supported by Sea—Rodney he said cared nothing for Money—Valued no Prizes.

"I almost suspect that he still has Designs upon the Hudson
There are other Generals like minded with Arnold—On my assen-ting to it as probable he questioned me as to the Person—I mentioned Bob Howe—He would not countenance nor gainay my Suspicious but asserted that he knew of others."—Win. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

André presented a written confession of his conduct in detail during his expedition from New York. The board reported to Gen. Washington that André "ought to be considered as a Spy from the enemy," and he was taken the next day. Washington approved the opinion, and ordered the execution to take place on Oct. 1st.—Sargent, Life of André, 356-56. See also the now scarce report of the hearing, entitled: Proceedings of a Board of General Officers, held by order of H. Excellency General Washington, Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States of America. Respecting Major John André, Adjutant General of the British Army, Sept. 20, 1780. (Philadelphia Printed—New York Reprinted By James Rivington [1780].) From copy in N. Y. P. L. (Evans, No. 17044). These proceedings and a number of letters to and from Washington on André’s case are printed in N. Y. Me/a, N 6, 1780.

Major André writes from Tappan, with Washington’s permission, a farewell letter to Sir Henry Clinton, who is at New York, stating that his going within the enemy’s post, and also his changing his dress, were contrary to his own intentions and contrary to Sir Henry’s orders; also that the circuitous route which he took was imposed upon him without alternative.—Conn. Gaz. (New London), N 14, 1780.

Smith writes that he is requested “to attend at Head Quarters,” where he finds "a number of General Officers & others assembled." With them he visited the Greyhound Capt. Smyth’s, relating to Major André, caused the Letters upon this Subject to be read viz: that from Arnold to himself. Another from himself to Washington inclosing Arnold’s of 16 inst—Washington’s of 30th that Day with one from André taking Leave. At the reading of which last he was much affected.

“A good many Questions were asked, & some by Franklin and Kempe which as supposing Doubts whether André ought not to be considered as a Spy distrest him more and he called out to me for my opinion—I declared it & opened the Reasons, and the whole Company concurred except Franklin & Kempe who seemed to change their Votes."

"After various Suggestions respecting a Letter to be sent in Ans to Washington’s Sir Henry retired & after some Time came in with Dr. Rush & his Secretary Capt Smyth relating to Major André..."

"It was in general approved except as to a Compl on Washington’s Humanity—General Robertson made a Proposition for a shorter & more peremptory Letter & with the General’s Leave went out to frame it & it was approved. It intimated that Washington & his Board of General Officers were misinformed that L: General Robertson was sent with two other Gentlemen to state the Facts as they truly were; and to declare the General’s Sentiments and Resolutions."

"He had said that they wished to consult the French and Hessian Generals."

"That he expected André tho’ no Spy in Return for his exchanging one Robinson Commander of one of their Frigates who was certain a Spy."

"That he had many others in his Power and would avenge this."

"This Draft being approved Dr: Justice Smyth whispered to me that he ought to accompany General Robertson who was to go out in the Morning to Dobbs’s Ferry & the Letter this Night by Washington’s Flag from Paulus Hook by Land."

Soon after General Robertson wished me to be one of the Person’s who was to assist him & upon my approaching the General he asked me. I replied that I had no other objection that as the Question and Business was important it seemed fit to employ Persons of the highest Rank in it—He replied that he could nominate none of more and exceptional Character—I thanked him & declared my Readiness to obey his Commands.

"The Seer” was now gone to copy the letter & we had orders to direct a PS that the two Assistants were Mr Elliot & myself—the Company broke up & we agreed to breakfast with the Govr & go off in the Greyhound in the morning by 7 or 8 o’Clock."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI, under date of O 3.

Gen. Sir Henry Clinton writes from New York to Gen. Washington that he is sending the governor, Lieut.-Gen. Robertson, also Lieut.-Gov. Andrew Elliott, and Chief-Justice Wm. Smith, to Dobbs’s Ferry to present additional facts regarding Major Andre’s business with Arnold, in order to avert if possible André’s execution.—Sargent, Life of André, 372. A stay of execution is ordered until Oct. 2, possibly in the hope that Clinton may yield up Benedict Arnold.—Hib. 375. See also Hist. of the Am. War, by Charles Stedman (1794), I: 251. The copy of the last-named work in the N. Y. P. L. contains the following memorandum in the handwriting of Sir Henry Clinton: "Ignorance of Whole transaction—too tender a subject to explain upon paper C."

The current rumour in town that an attack had been intended against West Point is now known with certainty; also it is believed to have been given up.—Jour. of Hugh Gaines, II: 101.

The Candid Retrospect is first published in Charleston, S. C. Smith thinks it must have “a good Effect upon Sober but deluded Minds.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VI, under N 17, 1780.

*Jottings in the diary under earlier dates (see Ja 6 and JI 20) have revealed William Smith as the author of this pamphlet (see Ja 30, 1781, at which time it was republished in New York). The search for a copy of this original South Carolina edition has been vain."

"that Sir André is reported in New York "that Mayor André and Mr. [Joshua Heti] Smith are both to be executed. In consequence of which general Robertson, Mr. Elliott, Hon. Wm. Smith etc. etc. are gone up the River to see what can be done with Washington."—Jour. of Hugh Gaines, II: 101.

The headquarters orderly-book, for the campaign in the "Southern Department" under Maj.-Gen. Greene, contains the following entry of this date: I: 22*: "The Colonel in the Case of Major Andrews [André] Adj. Genl. to the British Army ought to be considered as a Spy from the enemy and that agreeable to the laws and Usages of Nations it is the Duty of this House to order that he ought to suffer Death, the Commander in Chief Directs the Execution of the above Condemnation in usual Way this afternoon at five o’clock precisely."—From printed catalogue of Henkels, Phila., for July 1, 1920, at which time the original orderly-book was sold at auction. A similar entry appears in the orderly-book sold by Henkels on July 15, 1918—See its catalogue No. 1217, Item No. 1.

"Arnold had prepared a Letter to Washington," says Smith, "taking all Blame upon himself respecting André—and threat[en]ing Retaliation if the Rights of the Flag were violated, which we were to withhold or deliver as we saw fit. [See Sargent’s Life of André, 383.]"

"At 3 P M we moored off Corbet’s Point and the General sent Major his Aid de Camp on Shore to know whether there was any Messenger from Washington whose Army was 4 Miles behind at Tappan."

"The officer informed him that Washington’s Messenger had not returned above 2 Hours from Paulus Hook, but that General Green was coming & wished to receive General Robertson alone so that only he and his Aid de Camp went on Shore."

"A long Conference ensued on shore while Murray walked elsewhere with Hamilton Washington [sic] Aid de Camp & two other Rebel officers."

"Greene said Mr Washington considered the Right of Enquiry & Decision as theirs & that he only met Genl Robertson as a Gentleman—General Robertson supposed they wished to know the Truth & that it was immaterial if carried to Washington in what Light he was considered."

"General Robertson let off every Thing in Design and tendered Col Robertson & the Officers of the Vulture to prove André coming under the Cover of Arnold’s Flag—He showed Greene also Arnold’s Letter to Washington."

"Greene produced a Letter from André to Washington in which he faulted his own disguises in the Transaction with Arnold & confesses he had no Flag upon now."

"General Robertson observed properly that André[s] wrong Idea of his Securities were Belli were of no avail—Greene said Arnold was a Rascal & André a Man of Honor whom he believed & they would consent to no Conferences on additional Evidence."

"Greene hinted that André might be safe if Arnold was given To the Hon. the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, & City of New York.

Gentlemen,

Receive your address, and the freedom of the City with which you have been pleased to present me in a golden box with the liberty and constitude which, with due respect, at honors have a claim to. — The flattering expression of both stamps value on the act, or call for proper language than I am master of to convey my sense of the obligation in adequate terms.

To have had the good fortune amidst the exigencies of a long and arduous contest "never to have been a moment afraid," "not now broken the confidence and esteem of my Country," — And that my conduct should have met the approbation and obtained the affecting record of the State of New York (where difficulties were numerous and perplexed) may be ascribed more to the spirit of due wisdom which had dispelled the minds of the people, harrassed in advance to make allowances for the embarrassments of my situation, while, with the utmost of patience they sustained the loss of their Capitol and a valuable part of their territory — and...
liberal sentiments, and great esteem of her virtuous citizens, than to any merit of mine. —

The reflection of these things, how after the many hours of arduous solicitude which all of us have had, is as pleasing to our embattled at the moment, we encountered the brave dispositions, we must control us for past sufferings of perplexities. —

May that Heaven may be for its choice to shew you all your city — That the devastation of war, in which we found it, may soon be without a trace — That a replaced

reproved and respected Commerce may ever return among your Citizens. — And that your State (at present the seat of the Empire) may set such an example of wisdom and liberality, as that have a tendency to strengthen it give peace honor to the Union at home — and concur in respectability to it abroad. —

The accomplishment of these I do not know, which is the primary object of all my desires

2 A letter comes from Greene," writes Smith, "intimating that as far as his Memory had served he had given a Report of what way taid—Genl Robertson on that wrote to Washington the Substance of what he had said to Greene.

"That he had offered Col Robinson & the Officers of the Virtue to prove Andre came with Arnold's Flagg & conducted as he had directed. That he was no Spy—That Rochambeau & General Ganyphausen would not say he was, [whom] he wished to be convinced—That Sir H Clinton had exchanged one Robinson a true Spy—Libbie Washington & he would give any Person for Andre. That he had Spies whom he had forbore to execute, from a Desire to Spare the Horrors of War. And this Letter inclosed Arnold to Washington averring that what Andre had done was all by his order & approbation—That he would retaliate if he suffered—That Sir H had 50 Spies who would also die if Andre was executed and he called Heaven & Earth to Witness that the Injustice would lay at Washington Door—"It was twelve o'Clock when Murray had delivered this Letter on Shore and as soon as he returned we weighed Anchor & came away. Smith writes of his preparations, at the request of Gen. Arnold, of a draft of an "Address to the Public" (see O 9), and a letter to Lord George Germain (see O 5). On the following day he added: "He [Arnold] calls alters the first & shews new Draft of the last—Copies the former & throws Draft into the Fire with his Notes of it—Begins to copy my Alterations or Additions to the Intelligence."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI, under O 4 and 5.

"Gen. Arnold, working now for the British cause, sends to Lord George Germain "The present State of the American Rebel Navy & Finances." It reads: "Mr Washington at a Council of General officers on the 6th of Sept stated his operating Force under his own Command to consist of . . . 10400 Men . . ."—"There is a Battalion at Rhode Island of Con't Troops . . . 500. Two Connecticut Regts of Militia at New London . . . in the Colony of New York . . . 500 . . .

"The Whole . . . 11400." About a Half of these Troops are Militia & their Times of Service will expire on the 1st Jan next—"The Rest under 6 Thousand are engaged for the War and the Europeans probably in the Proportion of [blank] have lost their Attachments & desires to desert. Mr Gates has some other Troops in the South Country that may amount to 8 Hundred or a Thousand and among these I include about 350 Horse. All these Troops are ill clad, badly subsisted and worse paid. There are Arrears due to the Army in general of two & three Years standing. Many of the best officers have resigned And others through Disgrace Necessity & under a Conviction that the Independence is yet understood must be [blank] preparing to follow their Example. The Congress & Civil Authority & the Army are not upon the best Terms—Mutual Jealousies subsist between them—The army conceive themselves ill treated by their Exclusion from [blank] appointments of Honour or Profit—The common soldiery are extremely out of Temper—All efforts to recruit the Army other than by temporary Drafts of the Militia have proved ineffectual.

"The Congress & their General made united Demands upon the Provinces last Spring for complying an Army of 35 Thousand Men—No Arguments to Excite to such an Exertion were unfered. The most flattering one that conjoined with the promised French Aid the War would be terminated by the Expulsion of the British from New York—. They could not however succeed. Tho' the unconquerable Backwardness of the People who are tired of the War no Volunteers offered & not a third Part of the drafted Militia have appeared, in the Field With the increasing general Distresses of the People the Difficulties of recruiting keep pace & in another Year the Army probably would be totally Depopulated. As to the American Navy it is reduced to three Frigates and a few small armed Vessels that are generally in Port for Want of Mariners.

In Point of Finances the Congress is to the last Degree Imbarrassed—Their Debt in Paper Money Loan Office Certificates & unsatisfied Claims for the Army Pay & to Commissaries & Quartermasters amounts to upwards of four hundred Millions of Paper Dollars.

They have therefore lost all Confidence & Credit with the People whom they have repeatedly duped & defrauded—No Regard is had by the Multitude to their Promises and they are every where execrated in [and] out of the Army—The Separate States or Colonies are as little trusted or respected . . . And scarcely can it be said that any Colony has a Credit, or . . .

As the Result of these Distresses the Eyes of the People are in general opened. The'l[y] feel their Error & look back with Remorse to their once happy Condition and most ardently wish for a Reconciliation in Terms safe & honorable to both Countries . . .

"It would serve very good uses if the Con't have Authority for it to signify that the Colonies upon returning to their obedience shall be instantly restored to their Ancient Condition with Respect to their Charters Rights and Privileges Civil & Religious free from British Taxation And to invite to Negotiations for general Regulations it will increase the Number of the Advocates for the Reunion.

"But the surest Way is to rest Commissioners with decisive Powers on such Settlement as Great Britain may be willing to establish—There will always be jealousies here while a Power is resorted to G R to approve or disapprove what the Commissioners have done.

5 "With Power in a Set of Commissioners to bind the Nation as firmly as she could bind herself by further Acts of Parliament I think a Pacification would immediately take Place. But nothing so as to Provide but that the Army is ill-fed.—This is not to be ascribed entirely to a Scarcity of Food but to the Weakness of the Surplus in every Colony—Without Money or Credit Supplies must be collected [sic] by Force & Terror Where the Army is it takes without opposition but this Force acts ag' st it's own by creating internal Enemies. —Wm. Arnold had sought assistance from William Smith in the preparation of this address (see O 4). It was entitled: "To the Inhabitants of America." Arnold discusses the motives which have induced him to join the king's forces. He says: "When I quitted domestic happiness for the perils of the field, I conceived the rights of my country in danger, and that duty and honour called me to her defence. A redress of grievances was my only object and aim; however I acquiesced in a step which I thought precipitate, the declaration of independence: To justify this measure many plausible reasons were urged, which could no longer exist when Great-Britain, with the open arms of a parent, offered to embrace us as children and grant the wished for redress..."

7 "I anticipate your question, Was not the war a defensive one until the French joined in the combination? I answer, that I thought so. You will add. Was it not afterwards necessary till the separation of the British empire was complete? By no means; in contending for the welfare of my country I am free to declare my opinion, but more with. At all times, I should have ceased to act..."—Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

10 "I lamented therefore the impolicy, tyranny and injustice, which, with a sovereign contempt of the people of America, studiously neglected to take their collective sentiments of the British proposals of peace and to negotiate, under a suspension of arms, for an adjustment of differences..."—Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Washington writes to Nathaniel Greene, from headquarters near Passaic, an important letter describing the critical condition of the army, and urging abandonment of short-term enlistments. An order is issued from the office of police that vendue makers and auctioneers shall no longer place goods on the Coffee-House bridge, without permit from that office, and then only goods "sold for the benefit of the Insurmount." Benedict Arnold, now a brigadier-general in the British service (see Royal Gaz., O 21), publishes a proclamation "To the officers and soldiers of the continental army who have the real interest of their country at heart, and who are determined to be no longer the tools and dupes of Congress or of France." It is an invitation to join "a corps of cavalry and infantry, who are to be clothed, subsisted, and provided for at the expense of the nation," open to any non-commissioned officer and private a "Bounty of Three Guineas" is offered. The privilege having been granted him "to nominate the officers" of the corps, Arnold says: "I shall with infinite satisfaction embrace the opportunity of advancing men whose valor I have witnessed, and whose principles are favourable to an union with Britain, and true American Liberty." The rank they obtain in the king's service, he adds, "will bear a proportion to their former rank, and the number of men they bring with them. . . . I wish to lead a chosen band of Americans to the attainment of peace, liberty, and safety, (the first objects in taking the field) and with them to share in the glory of rescuing our native country from the grasping hand of France, as well as from the ambitious and interest-driven adventurers who form a separate party among ourselves, who, in listening to French overtures, do nothing for Great-Britain but bring the colonies to the very brink of destruction. . . . Happy for you that you may still become the fellow subjects of Great Britain, if you nobly disdain to be the vassals of France . . . As to you who have been soldiers in the continental army, can you at this day want evidence that the funds of your country are exhausted, or that the officers have applied them to their own private uses. In either case you barely can no longer continue in their service with honour or advantage; yet you have hitherto been their supporters in that cruelty, which with an equal indifference to your's, as well as to the labour and blood of others, is devouring a country, that, from the moment you quit their colours, will be redeemed from their tyranny.

The address closes with a promise of the "most affectionate welcome and attention to all who are disposed to join with me in the measures necessary to close the scene of our afflictions," and with a reminder that the parent country offers "the immediate restoration of our ancient privileges, civil and sacred, and a perpetual exemption from all taxes, but such as we shall think fit to impose on ourselves."—Royal Gaz., O 25, 1780. The address is reproduced in Avery's Hist. of the U. S., VII: 254. The diary (MS.) of Chief-Justice Smith reveals the fact, hitherto unpublished, that the chief-justice wrote this letter for Arnold. Under Oct. 14, we find:

"I sent General Arnold yesterday D of his Address to the Officers & Soldiers of the Cont'l Army, inviting them to engage in a New Corps of Cavalry and Infantry."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. Gen. Heath declared the proclamation was without effect.—Memoirs of Maj.-Gen. Heath (1798), 291. See also Van Tyne, The Loyalists (1902), 188.

Smith writes that he hears that "the Bill moved for 24 May last by Govt. Pownall to enable the King to conclude a Peace or Truce with the Congress or any Assembly was drawn up in Chestnut Street in Philadelphia & sent over to Pownall by John Adams who if it pass'd was authorized to go to England."

Gov. Robertson issues a proclamation "forbidding" all persons whatever from carrying out by land, or on board any ship, vessel, or small craft, or being concerned in shipping or receiving on board any ship, vessel, or small craft, any stores, provisions, goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, without having first obtained a permission for that purpose from the superintendent of exports and imports. Violation of the order will result in the forfeiture of "all such stores, provisions, goods, wares and merchandise so shipped or conveyed."—Royal Gaz., O 28, 1780. This regulation is intended to reinforce the one reissued by Clinton on this day, which first appeared on July 17, 1777 (g.v.). See also Jl 24, 1779.

A news item, published in London on this day, states: "Fugitives repair so fast to the royal standard at New-York, that it was thought the new corps, raising by Major Odell, would soon be complete. One Gentleman marched into the city at the head of fifty, with files and drums, and was immediately appointed to the command of them. Others were daily coming in when the accounts came out. Valentine Nutter (see F. 1, 1782), at "No. 924, opposite the Coffee House" (the Merchants' Coffee House—see L. M. R. K., III: 979), advertises maps for sale, specifying large maps of Virginia, Maryland, New England, etc.—N. Y. Merc., O 30, 1780.

On Sept. 30, 1782, he advertised that he had for sale "at his book and stationary store, No. 22, opposite the Coffee House," two volumes of charts, of which he gives the contents, one being a chart of New York—ibid., S. 70, 1782.

There is offered, to be let on a "Building Lease," a lot on the north side of Stone Street, "upon which, before the Fire 1776, there was a large Brewery with all its appurtenances."—N. Y. Merc., O 30, 1780.

Rivington prints a "Gazette Extraordinary," which contains "Copies of Original Letters ... Intercepted in the Rebel Mail, taken some Days ago by a party of his Majesty's Loyal Subjects." One of these letters, dated Philadelphia, Oct. 6, is from Pres. Hunter to the Governor of Rhode Island, informing him that the resolutions passed in congress on Sept. 21, regarding the army, and declares that it is very important that the states comply with them and fill their quotas as soon as possible. These resolutions fix the number of regiments in the army, the number of companies in each regiment, and the number of officers in each company. They determine the quota of each state and call upon the states to have their troops ready by Jan. 1. This letter is very important, as it limits the enlistments "for and during the war," but if the quota of any state cannot be completed with such recruits by Dec. 1, the deficiency is to be supplied by "men engaged to serve for not less than one year." A bounty of $50 is to be granted to each recruit, and recruiting officers are to receive $2 for each enlistment.—Royal Gaz., N 2, 1780.

Commenting on this, Smith writes: "This arrangement greatly reduces the Number of Battalions & 90 offends the last of Officers [i. e., those recently appointed]. It is new Source of Discord, unless all the Officers are desirous to leave the Army & will Interest for it. It will be impossible to procure the Volunteers who are to form an Army of 33 thousand upwards—Vld. the Letters published."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI.

A New York newspaper on the same day reported on his arrival in London that "Gen. Arnold is a very unpopular character in the British army, nor can all the patronage he meets with from the Commander in Chief, procure him respectability. General Clinton, from obvious and just motives of policy, gives this signal convert great encouragement, though not, perhaps, an admirer of his principles more than others; but the Rebel Officers here feel the nature of such a connection to him, that they unanimously refused to serve under his command, and the detachment he is to lead was, on this account, officered from the Loyal American corps."—Lloyd's Eve. (1863), 706-7. A source of continual friction was the issuing of orders billeting British officers upon the citizens. "The haughty boarders expected the same subsistence in their boats that they would have found in England, but 'our colonists' had ideas of their own as to their obligations, and the two standards of hospitality clashed. The officer would clap his host into the main-guard, and then the prisoner and his friends would enter an indignant protest with the commander-in-chief. Although the officers were reprimanded, yet the citizen had no legal redress, and, as a result, began to long for civil rather than military government."—Van Tyne, The Early West, 249, citing Rivington's Gaz., N 11, 1780; N 23, 1779.

 Brig.-Gen. Birch, the commandant of the city, issues a proclamation offering a reward of 50 guineas for information leading to the arrest of the person or persons who placed combustibles in front of the magazines in New York, or who shall hereafter attempt to do so. A London news item reads: "Major-General Benedict Arnold, who has quitfed the American cause, and joined Sir Henry Clinton, is a brave, gallant, and experienced Officer. Post (London), N 13-15, 1780.

Washington approves the report of a court of inquiry which was held on Nov. 2 at West Point to examine into Lieut.-Col. Richard Varick's conduct in his connection with Benedict Arnold during the latter's command at West Point, and which unanimously gave the opinion that Varick's conduct "does him great honor as an officer, and particularly distinguishes him from his country."—The Varick court of inquiry, to investigate the implication of Colonel Varick (Arnold's private secretary) in the Arnold treason (ed. by A. B. Hart, and issued to members of the Bibliophile Soc., Boston, 1907), 165.

Yesterday I wrote to Rivington & inclosed him one of the Pamphlets De Rosset has published at Charlestown [see S. 30]. To take off his Suspicion I hinted that the overture by Lord Drummond was not fully displayed but that the Publication would draw further Information—he promised me an answer upon the Subject."—Wm. There is a second embarkation for Tobago fleet from Charlestown, where they expect not more than 4000 troops in N. Y. There has none of the Cork Fleet arrived yet.—"From letter of Lirut. Caleb Brewer to Col. John Lamb, in the Lamb Papers (M.S.), at N. Y. H. S.

A very numerous and respectable body of the merchants, traders and other inhabitants of Philadelphia seek by a set of resolutions to "avoid the difficulties and distresses ... daily increasing from the fluctuating state and rapid depreciation of the continental money." They fix the value of this money, "compared with specie, ... at seventy-five for one." All contracts in future are to be made in 'specie value, but payable nevertheless in continental money at the option of the debtor, at the exchange now established." Any one refusing to "receive the said paper money at the exchange settled," or demanding "a higher exchange," is to be "exposed to the public as an enemy to the independence of America, and to the peace and good order of the city." Likewise any one who shall "give or offer more than seventy-five continental dollars for one in specie" shall be considered a "disaffected and dangerous person." A committee of 13 is chosen "to draw up this Association in form, and get the same printed" to be presented for subscription "to every household, trader and tradesman."—Penn. Gaz., N 22, 1780. Commenting on these resolutions, Smith says they "Oblige all men to receive Continental Money at 75 for 1 by leaving the Debtor at Liberty tho' he contracts in Gold to pay in Paper at that Rate. Thus the established Laws are set aside. What Evidence of a Malady incurable! Nothing can supply the Want of Money in a State of War but that which all the World agrees to be Money. The Common Court of Exchange at Philadelphia is $130 & 135 for one at the Moment of these absurd Regulations."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

"Rivington writes wishing me to speak to the Com' in Chief about the Expense of republishing the Candid Retrospect [see 119] & he is often with the violent Refugees & particularly Govr Franklin who murmurs about the Delays of the Gen'l respecting the Board of Directors I am suspicious whether he is not prompted to find me if possible a Confidant of Sir Henry's a character in which I don't desire to be considered."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. See N. 22.

The loyalists were found so numerous in New York in 1780 that they were encouraged by the British government to form an association of their own [cf. Ag. 25, 1779], independent of the orders of the British commander. It was entitled 'The Honorable Board of Associated Loyalists.' At its head was the son of Dr. Franklin,—William, late the Tory governor of New Jersey. ..."—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., VII: 198.

Among the unbound Smith papers in the N. Y. P. L., there is a draft of a letter prepared by Smith for Sir Henry Clinton to sign appointing a board of directors for the "Associated Loyalists" (or the board was to have been)

"To William Franklin Esq' Governor of New Jersey Josiah Martia Esq' Governor of North Carolina Timothy Ruggles Daniel Coke George Duncan Ludlow Edward Latywcye George Rome & George Leonard Esquires.

Whereas I am informed, by a Letter from the Right Honorable Lord George Germain, one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, that you have determined to form, under your direction, an association of your fellow Countrymen, that certain Proposals contained in a Memorial of Mr. George Leonard, ... had been laid before the King, and appeared to his Majesty a proper Ground upon which a Place may be formed for employing the Zeal of his Majesty's faithful Subjects in North America, in annoying the Sea Coasts of the revolted Provinces, and distressing their Trade, either in Cooperation with his Majesty's Land & Sea Forces, or by making Diversions in their Favor, when they are carrying on Operations in other Parts; and it being also by the said Letter signified that his Majesty approves of you as a Board of Directors for the Conduct and Management of this Business I do therefore constitute you to be a Board of Directors for the Purposes aforesaid, with the Powers and under the Regulations, Limitations & Restrictions here in after mentioned or to be expressed in any future Instructions; it being the same as you shall from time to time hereafter receive.

You are to frame Articles for embodying and employing such of his Majesty's faithful Subjects as are able & willing to bear Arms for the Suppression of the present Rebellion and will engage to serve under your Direction & agreeable to this Establishment for such Terms as you & they can agree. Which Associates are to be duly enrolled, under the Signatures of Members of the Board, to be recommended by the Majority of your Board but to receive their Commissions from me, or the Commander in Chief for the Time being, and of such Articles of Association previous to the Execution thereof & of every future Change & Alteration of the same, you are to make Report at Head Quarters with all convenient Dispatch for consideration and approbation."

"As soon as you have collected a Force you are to report at Head Quarters its strength, and from Time to Time to give the Intimate & partake of the Requests that may be expedient to be being employed & operating with Success."

"You are to keep a Journal of your Meetings, Conventions, Resolutions and Transactions, & to transmit to Head Quarters every Month a fair Copy ... of the Entries ..."

"You are not to undertake any Enterprise without the previous Consent of the Commander in Chief ... And with your Intimation of a Desire to attempt any Enterprise, you are to state ... the probable Uses of the Intention ...

"You are to order the Commanding Officers of all Parties & Detachments of Associates to be particularly careful, that no loyal or quiet & inoffensive Inhabitants ... residing among the Rebels be hurt or molested."

"You are to direct the Association in all their Excursions to obey such Commands as may be given from Head Quarters as to their Conduct & Duration & to obtain every useful Intelligence respecting the Enemy, and particularly to bring off all Letters and Papers, which they may find in the Houses of distinguished Rebels ...

"It is very possible that Experience in the execution of this Confederacy may point to the Utility of increasing the Powers of your Board and to that End you are invited to make the necessary Representations that may seem expedient ..."—Wm. Smith MSS., folio 183.

On Nov. 21, 1780, Smith and Elliot had a conference with Clinton about this. Smith writes of the meeting:

"Mr. Elliot & I had an Interview with the Com' in Chief. I read we both explained & he approved, but a word altered Association for Confederacy at the End. He said it came up to his own Idea & he thank'd us much for the Trouble—He chose to appoint both Stewart & Alexander till the King's Pleasure can be known & I drew the Clause at Sec? Smith's—The General & he both charged with Secrecy as the Restraints upon the Board must administer both to Disgust & Jealousy."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VI. A copy of the letter was delivered to Gov. Franklin on Nov. 22.—Wm. Smith MSS., folio 185.

"The acquisition of General Arnold is regarded at New York as a very fortunate event, not only on account of the merit of that Gentleman in a military capacity, and the secrets of which he is in possession, but as it is an indication of those discontentments and murmurings, that have been said to have distracted, for some time, the American command. It is a common saying at New-York, that the ship must be near sinking when the rats are leaving it."—Lloyd's Ev. Post, N. 20-22, 1780.

"Wrote to Genl Robertson, advising to the Edition of 10,000 Copies of the Candid Retrospect—Rivington says if he prints 1000 he will be obliged to charge / for each & if less more, so that the more he prints the less he can sell them for."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI. See D. I.

In Philadelphia, a number of persons are apprehended who have been "long suspected of carrying on an illicit and dangerous correspondence with the enemy (by way of Shrewsbury) and depreciating our money." When examined "before the President and Vice-President, invoices of goods brought from New-York, to a great amount, accounts of the sales of gold and silver, rates of specie, the routes and conveyances. It is a common saying at New-York, that the ship must be near sinking when the rats are leaving it."—Penn. Gaz., N. 29, 1780.

The "Hussar," a British frigate of 28 guns, goes down in Hell Gate in "12 Fathom Water." "There must have been Monstrous bad Conduct But so there ever is in all the Departments of Service. I imagine she was to be implored with other ships in cutting out a Ship of 300 Ten with Salt & provisions that has shamefully been suffered to go into New London."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI, under Nov. 24.

Another authority states that the "Hussar" struck Pot Rock at Hell Gate, and sank "in a bay called 'The Brothers' in seven fathoms of water."—Mag. of Am. Hist. (1834), XII: 90, citing the Edinburgh Observer and other reports. All on board but 80 persons were lost.—Conn. Gaz., D 5, 1780. Sparks says that the disputes between Vermont and her neighbouring states made the British think that the Vermonters were no longer in sympathy with the American cause. The loyalist, Beverly Robinson, therefore wrote to Ethan Allen on March 20, 1780, asking if he would join the British and set up a separate government. Allen did not answer the letter, but he and his friends pretended to be well disposed toward the British and even made a truce with Canada and kept up a secret correspondence, in order that Vermont might be safe from attack. Robinson wrote again on Feb. 2, 1781, enclosing a copy of his first letter and renewing his proposals. Allen forwarded both letters to congress.—

1124 THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND
In 1781, Admiral Lord Howe, after a long campaign against the British fleet in the West Indies, decided to attack the American colonies directly. Howe's strategy was to take New York City, which was the largest and most important American port. This would give the British control over the American trade and resources, and also serve as a psychological blow to the American cause.

The British army under General Burgoyne had been defeated at Saratoga in 1777, and the American army, under George Washington, had driven the British out of New England. However, the British were still able to control the southern colonies and the land between New York and Pennsylvania. Howe's plan was to capture New York City, and then use it as a base to conquer the rest of the colonies.

Howe's forces sailed up the Hudson River and landed at Kingsbridge in September 1776. They then marched north and took control of the city of New York. Howe's force captured the American fleet in the harbor, and his troops occupied the city. The American army under General Washington retreated to the south, leaving the city in British hands.

The British army under General Washington retreated to the south, leaving the city in British hands. The British held New York City for the rest of the war, but were unable to take any other major American cities.

The British had a large advantage in numbers and resources, but the Americans had the support of the French and the colonists were willing to fight for their independence. The British army was also weakened by internal dissension and a lack of support from the American Indians.

The war continued for another seven years, with many battles and campaigns. The British were never able to gain complete control over the American colonies, and the war ended with the signing of the Treaty of Paris in 1783, which recognized American independence.

In the years following the war, the United States worked to establish its independence and new nation. It faced many challenges, including the drafting of the Constitution and the creation of a new government.

In 1781, the British government was still under the control of the monarchy and the House of Lords. The American colonists were fighting for their independence, and the war was seen as a struggle for freedom and democracy.

The war was fought with a combination of land and sea forces. The British had a large navy, and the Americans had a smaller but effective fleet. The war was characterized by a series of battles and campaigns, in which both sides suffered heavy losses.

The American colonies were divided in their support of the war. Some colonists were happy to be fighting for independence, while others were willing to fight for continued British rule.

III. No man can be innocent, even Forty Commissaries, in an endeavour to change the government of his country, if the medi-dated revolution will light up a civil war, and the miseries in prospect are likely to exceed those, which the community have been acquainted to endure.

IV. The establishments made in America by English emigrants and their associates might in the early day of the colonies, if the parent country had been so determined, have been prevented or broken up.

V. The Lords and Commons of England, being conscious of the grants and charters for the encouragement of the colonies and afterwards co-operating for regulating the plantations they cannot therefore be considered as merely Royal, but Parliamentary, or national establishments.

VI. The grants and charters to the colonies, and the posterior settlements, regulations and usages are incontestable proofs of a great national covenant between the Mother Country and the colonies, for her favours by inspiring the Colonists with confidence, and exposing them to hazardous and expensive undertakings, created rights.

VII. Before the year 1764, the King, Lords and Commons, were universally acknowledged to be the supreme law-givers of the entire empire; of which the colonies were not only.

VIII. The national covenant bound the parent country to protect and promote the colonies, as far as was consistent with the general weal of all the dispensations of the nation; and it obliged the plantations to submit to her authority in all cases not repugnant to their grants, charters and establishments; and to such acts and contributions, as were necessary for the common defence and safety of the colonies.

IX. Neither of the contracting parties may dissolve this compact, as long as their joint aim in the union, to wit, their mutual prosperity, can be attained by it.

X. As no provision was made for constituting an impartial Judge between them, their controversies are to be decided by negotiation and treaty, or an appeal by both to the Lord of Hosts; for neither is obliged to the other the essential rights at the will of the other, and each is justifiable in exerting its own self-

XI. When one of them wants either will or ability to fulfil its engagements, the other, if not instrumental to this disaffection or impotence, will be discharged from the original obligation.

But,

XII. Since amongst imperfect beings offences are inevitable, the contractors are by the laws of a judge who cannot be deceived, reciprocally bound, upon exceptions taken, to pursue every measure of a re-conciliatory nature, consistent with the end of the union; and to such mutual concessions, as tend to the re-establishment of the general felicity, peace and harmony. In the application of these principles to the government of America will appear to be without blame." The former's language to her colonies, at the passing of the Stamp Act was: "You Americans are absolutely ours. We may dispose of your persons, your commerce, your lands and acquisitions as we please. You have no rights. The grants of our kings to your ancestors do not bind this nation. The privileges and securities of Englishmen cannot be yours unless you return to the old realm... All America is subject to our taxation; nor will we hear of your complaints, until you first own our authority to deal with you as we please, and acknowledge that such benefits as you request, are to be expected not as of right, but of grace." The author remarks: "Had England such principles at the first emigrations, she was bound to declare them to the adventurers, before they gave themselves to the winds and the seas, to gain her a share of the wealth and commerce of the new world, by which her island has been converted into a Nation of Princes." He further declares:

1. That the present animosities are imputable to the pride and avarice of Great-Britain, in assuming an authority, inconsistent with the compact by which the empire had been long prosperously united.

2. That the Colonies were justifiable in censuring the new law devised to execute the tea duty act; for that aiming to enforce the claim of absolute sovereignty obliged to some conduct or declaration against an unconditional submission.

3. That the resentment of Great Britain, on the destruction and expulsion of the tea cargoes... was utterly unjustifiable, and an infradiction of the league, which obliged Great Britain to protect the colonies.

4. That the provinces were not blameable in forming a Congress, to unite their councils and ward off danger, as they did in September 1774.

5. That the duty of the American Assemblies, and of the Congress acting for the whole continent, at that time to tender a plan to the Mother Country for restoring peace, consistent with the compact, by which the Parliament of Great Britain was to enjoy a supremacy for the common felicity of the empire and consequently, that the declaration they then made, of the right of the colonies to an exclusive legislation was a departure in terms from the original league.

6. That it would not have been inconsistent with the dignity of Great-Britain, if instead of declaring war against her Colonies, she had animadverted upon the denial of her authority in all cases respecting internal polity, as an error. And that the parliamentary vote of the 20th of February, 1775, would have more naturally effected a treaty of reconciliation, had it explicitly asserted, that the right reserved to Parliament, of approving the quantum of the Colony contributions towards the common defence, was only claimed only on her right to judge of the exercise or defect of a due sympathy in any branch of the empire, to the general necessities of the whole body.

7. That it was a fault to issue that proposal, in terms capable of being construed upon the principle of unlimited submission and accompanying it with acts for augmenting her force at Boston more especially for her irritating sally to Concord and Lexington, on the 19th of April 1775 [p. 7], when no Governor but Mr. Gage had received the Parliament's conciliatory remonstrance.

8. That as this vote favoured the opinion of its being contrived, to deceive and divide the Provinces, the Congress of 1775, had some pretext for flying to arms.

9. That the total rejection of it in August 1775, and the neglect of the Congress to recall or explain the declaration of 1774, had a natural tendency to exasperate the nation; and her Congress desires the charge of abandoning to passion.

10. That the neglect of Great-Britain to supersede the orders to the navy, for sacrificing every town on the American coast, which should prepare for defence; and her continuance of hostilities after the petition to the King, confirmed the charge of her commencing a war to maintain an illiberal dominion.

11. That the Congress would have had merit with their countrymen, if they had at the same time expressed assuring his Majesty, that they meant not by their declaration of rights in 1774, to exclude Parliament from participating in the regulations respecting the independence of the Colonies.

12. That every partial view, whether of Great Britain, to aggrandize herself by extortionate exactions from the Plantations, or of America, to figure as an independent power is unrighteous in the sight of God.

13. Both countries being chargeable with inattention to the obligations they were under to pursue the measures requisite to a reconciliation, neither of them could reject terms consistent with the original compact.

14. That Great-Britain even in passing the prohibitory act of December 1775 [see D 21, 1775], opened a door to pacification and more especially as the King's Ministers had so early as September (soon after the Congress's petition to the King) dispatched messengers, who, in January 1776, had interviews with certain of the Delegates at Philadelphia, and made such intimations, as gave just ground to hope for an immediate termination of all differences, had the Congress sent others on their part, to confess their willingness to negotiate upon the overtures.

15. That the concealment of these pre-intimations, added to the guilt of the Congress, and favoured the perilous design of drawing the people into the precipitate renunciation of the dependency of the Colonies, the 4th of July, 1776, and of plunging their countrymen into a tedious and desolating war.

16. That there is reason to suspect, that the views which prompted to that awful resolution, will lead the Delegates to practice every artifice, to hide its horrible tendency from the eye of the public; and if possible, to turn the quarrel to their own emolument, at the expense of their country.

17. That the Appeal being made by the sword to the Omniscient Judge and the war wasting the empire, it concerns those who began, as well as those who support and protract it, to cultivate concord, and return to their ancient union.

18. If it was the duty of the Congress by withholding at first or afterwards retracting the declaration of 1774, to have prevented an open war; or to have terminated any engagement in answer to the overtures of January 1776, no subsequent transaction of the Congress, can bind the rest of their countrymen.

19. Who are the real enemies of America, if not they who have perverted the virtuous aims of the main body of the people for the defence of their rights and privileges into a war for dominion? who, under the disguise of patriot zeal, did, unauthorized, dispatch an emissary [Silas Deane] to draw the ancient eminence of France into a contention purely domestic.

20. It being manifest that nothing will satisfy the directors of the American Councils, but measure incompatible with the safety of the many millions of the same natural stock, Great-Britain will be justified in exerting all the powers she enjoys for her preservation.

21. It was wise and just as well as merciful in Great-Britain, to issue as she did, in October 1778, general and undistinguishing pardons.

22. That the sufferings of the loyalists in all parts of the continent will eternally demonstrate the hypocrisy, avarice and protracted some, and the lannicism of the rest of their oppressors, as the forbearance of Great-Britain, in not having yet executed a single rebel in her power, and in restraining from the devastations and complicated calamities, she might have brought upon the avowed ally of her inveterate enemy, of her lenity and generosity.

23. Finally, That Great-Britain independent of her own interest in the controversy, is bound to prevent the ruin of her American friends [the loyalists], at every risk short of certain destruction to herself. If compelled by adversity to conclude a disadvantageous peace, and to part with one or more of her Colonies to France, Spain, or any other foreign nation, she should stipulate in clear and strong terms, in behalf of the loyalists who may be found there, for every advantage of disposing of their estates, and free liberty to remove to such of the Colonies or Dominions as may not be unfortunately surrendered at the end of the war to a popish or arbitrary power.

Very important source material (the major portion of which is not published elsewhere), upon which the author bases his statements, appears in the form of footnotes. In the Charleston edition above mentioned this source material appeared as an appendix, and it was Smith's request to Rivington (see N 27, 1780) that, in this new edition, "the Appendix be taken in as Notes—to prevent disconnection in the Perusal."

The Candid Retrospect (with all the footnotes) was reprinted in instalments in the Royal Gazette of Mr. 28, 31, and Apr 4. Smith's authorship, of course, was not mentioned. Rivington introduced the article with the statement that it was "the least exceptional of any address for years past from the American press," and added: "Happy had the leaders of the continent been actuated by the spirit it breathed! or that the general mass of the people had been early apprized of the secrets it revealed! Thousands of lives have been sacrificed to the wicked and pernicious concealment,—and it is too much to be feared, that many more continuing uninformed will become victims to the insatiable ambition and avarice of their seducers." The article appeared again in the Gazette of Aug 29, S 1, and 5, 1781.

Smith writes in his diary: "A vessel arrives from Lisbon—Jayne a merchant there writes 14 Nov to Mr. Shoemaker that they had just recd the King's Speech which is spirited and breaths Vigor—that a large Body of Troops are ordered for this coast sufficient [illegible] to suppress a Rebellion too long protracted for Want of suitable Exertions."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

The letter is printed in Royal Gaz., Ja 31, 1781. Two days later vessels arrived direct from England bringing the king's speech.—Smith's Diary, ibid.

Smith writes that "Rivington has struck off 5000 Copies of the Candid Retrospect [see Ja 30], & given out go to Mr. Shoemaker & 60 to the Board of Directors of loyal Refugees & 100 to me & made up 400 for Genl Arnold."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

An inquiry is held on board the "Jersey," under the command of Lieut. John Sporn, of the Royal Navy, "respecting the treatment and usage of naval prisoners in all cases." Capt. Dawson of the "Iris" (see J 25), and other British officers, are present. The testimony of six of the principal American officers among the prisoners, and seven of the men longest in confinement, shows, with respect to the prisoners "Scorpion," "Strombolo," "Hunter," and "Jersey," that "their situation was made at all times as comfortable as possible, and that they were in no instance oppressed or ill-treated; that they regularly received certain stated rations, which are "and ever have been issued to them without drawback or deduction, and of the very same species and quality with which the Commanders, Officers, Seamen and Marines, belonging to said ships were victualled; as also, the Officers and Privates of the respective guard service; and that they have at all times had fuel and every necessary convenience for cooking;" and they further say that "the sickness present among the prisoners, arises from a want of clothing, and a proper attention in themselves to their own cleanliness; and that "they have never been, and are not now crowded in the prison ship; and that two or three of each rank are now, and have ever been permitted daily, to go on shore to New-York, to purchase for themselves, or on the part of the rest of the prisoners, whatever they may be in want of."—N. T. Mrr., F 2, 1781.

Following this report, Gaine prints a series of seven different affidavits to the same effect, given voluntarily under oath before Mayor Mathews on Feb. 3. These documents, together with those mentioned above under Jan. 25 (q.v.), are printed in sequence after those dated Jan. 5 (q.v.).

6. Smith writes concerning The Candid Retrospect (see J 30): "The Pamphlet both pleases and offends—it puzzled the Loyalsists—[Capt.] Smith asked me who was the author of it. I as usual evasively states that it was imputed in Charles Town to one Williams a Lawyer. None of the Gazettes take it up—Kiriington does not even advertise it. Mr. Shoemaker has sent several Copies to Philadelphia. General Robertson & Mr. Elliot don't open their Lips upon the Subject."

8. Smith writes in his diary that he has been informed by Israel Knapp, of Connecticut, formerly a deputy commissary in the rebel army, that "The Party that penetrated Westchester lately were 600 under General Parsons—In Rages, many, about 100 perfectly barefooted. They came for Spoil & plundered Friends & Foes Petticoats & everything to cover Nakedness. This to still Discontent."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Knapp also tells Smith that "The Comr's Declaration is among the People. Patriots thought the Exception a Blunder, said the Ex- ception took in all the Officers for all of them had condemned Loy- alsists & Courtier proposals, and were esteemed by the lessening of their Party. They gave out that 10 French Ships with 10 Land Forces are soon expected at Rhode Island. The People or 20 or 1 of them reply—What good will do us—for since we can't raise an army of our own we shall belong to France or G Britain & they had rather be immediately reconciled with the latter than run the Risk of being conquered by the other. The Zealots for Independency much mortified by the Introduction of British goods from Long Island and the Trade with the Fleet at Gardner's Bay—They think it draws out the Bollion they got from the French & that this with what they would get from us for Provisions would if withheld support the War."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

9. The correspondence of David Sproat, the British commissary of prisoners, Gaine publishes the sworn declaration of one George Battersman, dated Dec. 19, 1780, which appeared in the Penn. Gaz. of Jan. 17, 1781, condemning the treatment he received when a prisoner on the "Jersey," also the resolution of congress of Jan. 5, 1781 (q.v.), and Sproat's own answer, dated Jan. 29, 1781, ad- dressed to Mr. Skinner, the American commissary, regarding the charges against British management of prisoners.

Battersman's letter relates to the supposed number of prisoners on board (1,100, he says), the poor food, attempts to make prisoners enlist in the British service, the transfer of officers so to the "Yarmouth," etc. Battersman says in closing: "They have taken this method of starving us for the want of water, to kill us, or to make us suffer into the service. They have never allowed a man that is sick to go to the hospital ship till they are so weak and low that they often expire before they get out of the ship. They never allow the sick to be mustered only when there is a wet or damp air. The com- manding officer told us, that his orders were, that if the ship took fire, we should all be turned below and perish in the flames which we experienced one day; by accident the ship took fire in the steward's room; the commanding officer ordered the Hessian guards to turn us below and if we offered to resist that they should fire among us and if any of us should get into the water they should fire us and kill us if possible.

In his letter to Skimmer, Sproat says: "That very many of them are sick and die is true; but I will not allow that their disorders proceed from any other cause than dirt, nastiness and want of clothing." Regarding food allowance, he says he posted up the schedule of rations, and "requested of their own officers that they would take in rotation the trouble to see that they got the full quantity of good sound wholesome provisions; and that when a case happened to prove damaged or otherwise bad, it should not be served to them but headed up again, surveyed and condemned according to the custom of the navy."

He describes his own services, the fitting out and burning of "Good Hope" by the American prisoners (see Mr 5, 1780); he assails the manner in which British prisoners are treated, and declares that the congressional resolution of Jan. 5, 1781 (q.v.), "will hurry on their misery and distress faster than they are aware of and in a short time put the honour of every man to the test who is out on parole. . . ."

Immediately following this correspondence, Gaine printed, at the request of G. Dawson, captain of the "Iris," and commanding officer of British ships at New York, other correspondence on the same subject, embracing Washington's letter of Jan. 25 (q.v.), together with Dawson's reply, and the supporting affidavits made by American prisoners to show their good treatment and satisfactory rations.—N. T. Mrr., F 12, 1781; Banks, David Sproat and the Naval Prisoners, 34-46.

By unanimous ballot, the continental congress elects Robert Morris "superintendent of Finance."—Jour. of Cong. (Ford ed.), XIX. 180. He accepted the office on May 7, and took complete control on Sept. 20.—Winsor, VII. 69. See, further, My 26.

There is prepared "A plan of a piece of Ground belonging to James De Lancey Esq' near fresh water survey'd Feb. 10, 1781—40 feet to an inch."—The original MS. is in the Banczer Coll., in the N. Y. P. L.

The office of police invites proposals from any person or persons for cleaning the streets under a contract which gives "an exclusive right to take all the Mauae and Rubbish for their own benefit."—N. T. Mrr., Mr 5, 1781.

Articles found incumbering streets and wharves, contrary to the order of April 6, 1780 (q.v.), have lately been carted by the police to the Comfort of Independents greatly in front of the almshouse. The police board now publishes a notice that they will be sold at public auction on March 12, for the benefit of the poor, unless claimants obtain permission to remove them before that day.—N. T. Mrr., Mr 5, 1781.

An advertisement, headed "Pro Bono Publico," is published in New York of horse-races to be run on four days, beginning Easter Monday, April 16, "on Acast Heath, five miles from Brooklyn Ferry." The purses offered are: a "County Subscription Purse," given on two days, of £100; a: a "Noblemen's and Gentlemen's Subscription Purse," of £100; and a "City Subscription Purse," of £100. Each race is to be run under carefully arranged conditions and regulations. Among these are the following:

1. All Horses to be of eight and a-half year of age and must have been carted by the police to the Brooklyn Hill, on or before Friday, the 6th day of April; or on Saturday the 7th of April, at Mr. Loosley's Booth on the Race Ground, or to pay double entrance at the post.

2. No person will be admitted to start a Horse, for either of the Purses, unless the rider is in proper uniform, with a small saddle jockey cap, silk jacket, and light Boots.

It is expected that no person will attempt to erect a booth on the race ground, without first subscribing at least three guineas, neither to sell wines, liquors, &c. from waggons and other carriages, without subscribing two guineas towards the Saddle, Bridle and Whip [to be run for each day], and other expenses attending the race.

Tavern-keepers Take Notice.

To avoid suspicion of collusive practice in running, it is ex- cepted Gentlemen (who enter Horses for any of the Purses above mentioned) do qualify themselves, that the Horses entered in their

1. The Chamber of Commerce presents an address to Sir Henry Clinton advising him to suspend the collection of duties on imported articles because its enforcement "will be attended with the most fatal effects to the supply of this Garrison and the Mercantile Interest." Clinton complies with the request and promises to send a copy of the memorial to the king's secretary of state.—Col. Rec. of N. Y. Chamber of Commerce, 1768-1784, 247-50.

2. Smith writes in his diary: "General Philips sails with a fresh Gale; it is a good thing we are not to see Gen. H. Clinton told me last night in his Coach as we ret'd from Dinner at General Robertson's that the French were not moved last Thursday & we have now here a go 6 or 6 Frigates to convoy the Detachtn' going to the Chesapeake. It is calculated that [La] Fayette will not reach Arnold in several Days by being obliged to head the navigable Rivers of Virginia."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

New York State passes a law for relieving persons loyal to the United States whose sons have, contrary to their will, joined the enemy, from the payment of certain taxes.—Laws of N. Y., 4th sess., chap. 28 (printed by Holt, 1782).

Brig.-Gen. Samuel Birch publishes a regulation which prescribes that cord-wood shall be of the full length of four feet "including half the scar." His order also provides that, after July 1, no one shall "drive any iron bound Cart, Truck, or other Carriage, within this city," for carrying goods for hire, under penalty of £5 for each offence.—N. Y. Merc., Mr 19, 1781. See also Dawson's report on city finances in the Revolution, in Proc., Bd. of Alds., LXXVII: 248.

A packet ship is stranded at Corlear's Hook.—Royal Gal., Mr 15, 1781.

Fraunces offers his tavern for sale, describing it as follows: "To be Sold, with or without the Fixtures. An elegant three story house and a half brick dwelling house, situate in Great Dock Street, at the corner of Broad Street, the property of Mr. Samuel Fraunces, and for many years distinguished as the Queen's Head Tavern; in which are nine spacious rooms, besides five bed chambers, with thirteen fire places, an excellent garret in which are three bed rooms well finished, an excellent good kitchen, and a spring of remarkable fine water therein; a most excellent cellar under the whole, divided into three commodious apartments; a convenient yard, with a good easter and pump, and many other conveniences too numerous to be mentioned, are in excellent repair, and are in every respect, in present a remarkable good stand for business of any kind, and will upon a reestablishment of civil government be the most advantageous situation in this city, from its vicinity to the North River and New Jersey. . . ."—N. Y. Merc., Mr 19, 1781. Fraunces did not effect a sale of the property until April 23, 1785 (p. 2).

A letter received at Boston from Connecticut states: "The merchants of New-York, and their associates in a number of these states, employ every kind of means for conveying English goods, through this continent. We see, by the New-York Gazettes, and by divers letters from that city, that its inhabitants are enraged at the late resolves of Congress for the confiscation of English merchandize: This is one proof that these resolutions have struck them in a most sensible part. In truth, if we could but agree to do what it is in our power towards ruining the commerce of England, we not cut off an arm of this tyrannical power, and have more hope of speedily reducing her to the terms which form the object of the present war.---N. Y. Merc., Ap 15, 1782.

A French officer at New York writes to a friend in London: "I see the pleasure to acquaint you, that our affairs go on so extremely well, that I doubt not but we shall soon be Masters of all America, for it is impossible for them to hold out much longer; Washington's army is reduced to a handful of men, half starved, without clothing, and in want of every necessary, daily deserting, some coming over to us, and others returning home. . . .

The situation of the post-office at this time is indicated in an advertisement for the sale of a house and lot, "No 18, Broad-Street, opposite the General Post Office."—Royal Gal., Mr 28, 1781.

The state legislature passes "An Act more effectually to punish Adherence to the King of Great-Britain, within this State." This provides that any New Yorker who shall teach, write, or print that "the King of Great Britain hath, or of Right ought to have, any Authority . . ." in over this State," or who shall try to persuade others to renounce their allegiance to the state, shall be guilty of felony and may be tried and convicted for that crime. Instead of being sentenced to death, the convicted person may be made to serve for three years on board a war ship belonging to the United States or to France.—Laws of N. Y., 4th sess., chap. 48 (printed by Holt, 1782), Laws of N. Y. State against Loyalty (London, 1786), 110-11; Ind. Gal., D 27, 1785.

The first American man-of-war is building at Portsmouth, N. H., under the superintendence of Paul Jones; it is named the "Amer-

Wm. Smith writes to Clinton: "In the manifest Declension of the severe Restraint heretofore laid upon the Rebel Press and the increasing Eageress of the Multitude to see what comes from our's I beg leave to remind your Excellency of your Intention that I should suspect certain Papers taken in Virginia that may serve to detect the Frauds upon the People.

'Rivington's Gazette being more sought for is the best Vehicle for such Communications but as none of them go out except such as his Customers send to their Friends 'tis humbly submitted whether he ought not to be ordered to put up a 100 Copies & forward them weekly to Connecticut and New Jersey under such Directions by the Flaggs as are most likely to convey them far into the interior Country."

"Your most faithful and obed'nt serv't"—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

Smith writes that he finds the Rebel Papers the Congress freely handled by anonymous Essayists under the Title of the Indep' American the Druid &c. "These," he adds, have impelled Gov. Trumbull and the legislatures in New York and Massachusetts to publish "Address to the multitude to animate them afresh with strong Implications of their apostacy from their first Principles."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

A number of Citizens having formed themselves into Companies by the names of the Friendly Union, Hand in Hand, and Heart to Heart Fire Companies," with the good purpose of aiding in removing and securing the personal property of inhabitants, endangered by fire, a garrison order is issued that the memers of these companies (and they only) are to wear "round hats with black caps and white trims." They are to be permitted to pass any country without hindrance, and to be exempt "from handing buckets, or assisting to work the engines."—Royal Gal., Apr 8, 1781; Men. Com. Coun. (1863), 711;

and the capture of Fort Independence. "In consequence of the May measures concerted at the late interview, all the French Troops, except about 200 to be left as a guard over their heavy stores and Baggage at Providence, are to march as soon as circumstances will admit, and form a junction with me upon the North River.—Five hundred Militia are to be stationed upon Rhode Island for the preservation of the Works which have been erected, and for the security of the harbour. . . . Upon a full consideration of affairs in every point of view, an expedition against New York has been deemed preferable to making further detachments to the Southward, while they can only be sent by land. . . . The enemy, weakened as they are now by detachment, must either sacrifice the valuable Post of New York, or recall a part of their force from the Southward to defend them. . . . I am very apprehensive of a formidable Invasion of the Northern frontier, as the Enemy from Canada are undoubtedly collecting in considerable force at Crown Point. . . ."—From transcript of the original text, pub. in cat. In a letter to La Fayette on May 31, Washington gave a report of the Wethersfield conference, at which, it appeared, he, Rochambeau, Chateilene, Gen. Knox, and Gen. Duportail were present. Writing from New Windsor, he says in this letter: "Upon a full Consideration of our Affairs in every Point of View, an Attempt upon New York with its present Garrison (which, by Estimation is reduced to 17,000 men) is considered (with and of this) was deemed preferable to a Southern Operation, as we had not a Command of the Water. The Reasons which induced this Determination were, the Danger to be apprehended from the approaching Heats, the inevitable Dissipation and Loss of Men by so long a March, and the Difficulty of Transportation; but above all, it was thought that we had a tolerable Prospect of expelling the Enemy, or obliging them to withdraw Part of their Force from the Southward, which last would give the most effectual Relief to those States. The French Troops are to march this Way as soon as certain Circumstances will admit. . . . I . . . you perceive it will be some Time before our Plan can be ripe for Execution, and that a Failure on our Part in Men and Supplies may defeat it but I am in hopes that the States at this Quarter will exert themselves to attain what has long been a favourite, and is an important object to them. This letter was intercepted by the British, and was evidently a ruse (see N.23)—Lloyd’s Eve. Post, JI 13-16, 1781.

A letter received in London on July 17 from a British officer at New York declared: "It is believed our General intends attacking Mr. Washington’s lines the Rebel Mail which we intercepted, tells us, he, with Rochambeau, and 4,000 French troops, propose attacking us; but, alas! Sir, did they but know how well we were prepared to receive them, they would never entertain another thought of it."—Lloyd’s Eve. Post (London), JI 13-16, 1781.

Lieut.-Gov. Elliott, presiding at a meeting of the council, informs the members that Gov. Robertson has left the city for a short time and has delivered the orders to hurry on the Cown, Min., of 500. Cf. Wm. Smith’s Diary, VII, under the same date.

Smith writes that he is informed that Sir Henry Clinton "confesses he hates Business that he thinks himself fit for a small army but not for the complicated work assigned him—He wishes a Vice Roy above both him & the admiral."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

Congress approves a "Plan for establishing a National Bank in the United States, submitted to their consideration, by Mr. Robert Morris, the 17th May, 1781." The resolutions were published in full in the N. Y. Packet (Fish-Kill), JI 14, 1781. See F 20.

Sir Henry Clinton informs William Smith that he is assured by private letters that the British are "in a fair way in an Alliance with the Emperor of Germany but Ministers are silent. . . . till the Treaty is concluded."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

Wm. Smith writes that a "Plan of Peace" is under discussion in which the British give up "all the Colonies Northward of the Chesapeake." Cornwallis is said to favour it.—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

Gen. Samuel Birch, the commandant at New York, issues long and detailed market regulations, which are published in full. The reason for this is that "divers persons influenced by a desire of inordinate gain, have been guilty of engraving and forstalling all kinds of virtuall and provisions in this town, whereby the prices thereof are excessively enhanced." The first regulation is "That all fresh meats, victuals and provisions of all kinds (fish excepted) shall be openly sold in one or other of the public Market Places, and nowhere else in this city (the place where Coenties Market formerly stood, to be considered as one) on penalty of forfeiture, one moiety to the informer, and the other to the better of the poor of this city." No sales shall be made there before sunrise.—N. Y. Merc., JI 4, 1781; Man. Com. Cope (1861), 714; Proc., Bd. of Ald., LXXVI: 219.

The reference to the "place where Coenties Market formerly stood" is a clear indication that it had been removed. The last date prior to this when the building appears of record was Aug. 23, 1780 (see Royal Gaz. of that date), although it is mentioned a later date in an advertisement for rooms to let in a house "in Dock Street, near the Coenties Market."—Royal Gaz., JI 30, 1781. This reference, however, evidently means the familiar site and neighbourhood, it being thus specifically referred to in another advertisement, two years later, of a merchant’s removal "to the house No. 17 in Little Dock Street between the Old Slip and Coenties Market-Place."—Ibid., My 14, 1783.

"This ‘Market-place’ was not used as such after peace was proclaimed, but the Slip was a grand depot, principally for all the market-boats, which brought farming produce and live stock that came down the East River, and this continued, principally until the year 1815."—De Voe, Market-Book, 122-23, 125. See also N 16, 1720; Ag 2, 1771; L. M. R. K., III: 1956; and of this, it was said: "The Grand Rorses of Accost Heath [see F 26], Being postponed till Wednesday the 6th of June, on account of the King’s birth day, notice is hereby given the Public, that there will be a Hurling Match on the ground on Tuesday the 7th instant; when those Gentlemen who have a curiosity to play (or see) that ancient diversion, will get hurls and bats at the Irish Flag, at twelve o’clock; and at four in the afternoon an elegant saddle will be run for."—N. Y. Merc., JI 4, 1781. See also My 18, 1782.

The American privateer "General Washington" (said to be the property of Gen. Washington and Robert Morris) is brought into port by "The Chatham."—Journ. of Hugh Gaine, II: 120; N. Y. Merc., No. 1548.

"Europeans are sent to England in the Confederate, who sailed with the Fleet this Day."—Gaine, op. cit., II: 120. This may have been the captured American frigate "Confederacy."—See Ap 19.

Von Krafot reports that at this time "At New York were still in camp, of the English, the 22nd and 43rd regiments and the 76th Scotch. The Hessian Body regiment was in camp at Johnsheath House [Jones’ house, "Mount Pitt"]—see 1776; the Prz. Charl regiment by the 76th mile-stone, east side."—On Krafot’s Jour., 140. See S 1776, Ag 25.

Congress adopts instructions to Adams, Franklin, Jay, Laurens, and Jefferson, authorizing the acceptance of the mediation proposed by the Empress of Russia and the Emperor of Germany. These forbid any treaty of peace which shall not, first, effectually secure the independence and sovereignty of the United States, according to the subsisting treaties with France; and, second, in which the said treaties shall not be left in full force.—Winor, VII: 92.

Among items of news from the British admiralty office are the following: "Tuesday [June 12] a commission passed the great seal, appointing Robert Digby, Esq; Rear Admiral of the Red, commander in chief of his Majesty’s ships and vessels employed on the coast of North-America, and a commission for Sir Henry Clinton, for signing pardons to his Majesty’s subjects in America. . . . "Prince William Henry set out for Portsmouth to embark for North America with Admiral Digby on the 28th,"—N. Y. Merc., S 10, 1781. Digby and the prince arrived Sept. 26 (q.v.).

"A Bull Baiting, after the true English manner," is advertised to take place at the Brooklyn ferry. Taurus will be brought to the Ring at 3 o’clock; some good dogs are already provided, but every assistance of that sort will still be esteemed a favour. A Dinner exactly British will be upon Loosley’s table at 11 o’clock, after which there is not the least doubt but that the song called O! the Roast Beef of old England will be sung with harmony and glee." The sport of bull-baiting is somewhat described in blank verse: "A Bull of Magnitude and Spirit, Will dare the dogs preceding me, etc. —Royal Gaz. of 1781, JI 30, 1781.

Smith writes of Gen. Skinner’s "ridiculous Expedition to Monmouth for Cattle for the Navy (15 Ships now uselessly anchored at the Hook)." About 1,300 men took part in the incursion but were so slow in their movements that people and cattle had disappeared when they arrived. Ten men were lost, and only a few lean cattle and 40 sheep taken.—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

Washington plans “to surprise the Enemy's Posts at the No. end of Yk. Island, . . . having fixed up the Night of the 2d. of July for this purpose—and having moreover combined with it an attempt to cut off Delancy's six or eight light Corps without engaging them.” From Washington's journal (in the Lib. of the Dept. of State, Washington), pub. in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1881), VI: 117-18 (see also 113-14).

Wm. Smith writes that reports come from England that “both the General [Clinton & Adm] [Barthoumot] are blamed and with great Reason” for their failure to cooperate. “The Generals in said with their Johnson Place, and write to them in Civil Terms— the Dread of increasing the Minority Faction.” The admiral sailed for home on the 6th.—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

Because of failure to receive his salary, and for other reasons, Chief-Justice Smith fancies he may be out of favour with the home government, and says: “Don't they see the Candid Retrospect—am I suspected to be the Author? It is known only to De Rosset and Fanning . . . I will persevere nevertheless in what I conceive to be the true Interest of the whole Empire & if possible bring on an American Parliament.”—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

This evening and the following day some “rebels” crossed over North River from Jersey and marched in full view of the Hessians near Fort Independence, “in whole regiments, flags flying and bands playing, down along the lower Courtland House.” Many of them were wounded or killed by the “Yagers” (sharpshooters).—Von Krafft’s Jour., 143; Winner, VI: 561. This was a skirmish at Kingsbridge between 200 “Yagers” and 50 horsemen on the one side, and an advance corps of the “rebels” consisting of 800 foot and 750 horse. The “Yagers” compelled the “rebels” to quit the port, and drove them from the heights as far as Deveaux's house. The troops were ordered to fall back to their former position leaving 100 “Yagers” at Fort Independence, who observed the movements of Gen. Washington's army as he reconnoitred “Spiten Devil.”—Royal Gov., Jl 14, 1781.

Wm. Smith adds: “It remains doubtful . . . whose loss is greatest—They have carried off the Cattle collected by the Refugees. I believe we have near 40 wounded—40 or 5 killed—I don’t learn of more than 21 of the Rebels left dead in different Places. They carried their Wounded off in 9 Wagons.

“there seems to be a general Censure of Sir H as unprepared for a great Force. . . . He is blamed for not having Boats at the Bridge named Vessels in the River . . .”

“If Sir H wishes the Enemy to venture near our Posts he ought to be prepared to surround them by the Hudson or the Sound . . . if he desires to keep them at Home he should fill the Hudson with Vessels & appear to menace West point. He is incapable of Business—He consults No Body—All about him are Illers & ignorant.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (M.S.), VII: under Jl 4.

The battle of Loyal Volunteers of N. Y. City, commanded by the governor, Lieut.-Gen. Robertson, paraded in Broadway at 5 a.m.; and at 6 marched to the house of Mayor David Mathews on Water St. Here the mayor, their heat-colonel, presented the corps with “a pair of elegant colours, a compliment from Lieut.-Gen. Robertson,” in approbation of their “loyalty and spirited resolution in forming themselves into a select body for the defence of this city.” The officers were drawn up in three ranks in front of the battalion, which stood presenting arms, while a band played “God Save the King.” They then proceeded to “the ground of exercise above the ship-yards, and after a very short field day, particularly calculated for immediate service,” they marched back “to the Field from St. Paul’s Church,” and, accompanied by two light infantry companies, music, etc., “lodged their colours” at Lient.-Col. Mathews's house. Officers and men numbered 332. They “made an elegant appearance, being a fine body of men, dressed in uniform.”—N. Y. Merc., Jl 9, 1781.

There seems to be no Attention to our Militia, either here or on Long Island or Staten Island. This ought to be Gen. Robertson’s Care—more than we anticipated—the Soldiers employed at King’s Bridge in Work Capt. Scott of the Artillery tells me agreed by the Generals last Summer to set about the next Day—and at Breucklyn on what they ought to have done in March, rather than in the present extreme Heats.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary July (M.S.), VII.

A New Yorker writes: “Jonathan is collecting all his forces, raising Heaven and Earth to besiege us, in conjunction with about 4000 French troops; on this occasion the New-England Yankees seem to be very forward, in its consequences, put an end to the rebellion.”—Lloyd’s Env. Post (London), Ag 31-S. 3, 1781.

“Near 500 men being ordered to march for Kingsbridge, to cover and secure a reconnoitre of the Enemies works on the No. end of York Island, Harlaen river, & the Sound, were prevented doing so by incessant rain.”—From Washington’s journal (in State Dept., Wash.), pub. in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1881), VII: 119.

Von Krafft records in his journal that his company and “the Body Company” have to move unexpectedly into tents in Fort Knuyphenhusen, because “the Rebels” are expected.—Von Krafft’s Jour., 143.

Washington writes in his journal: “I passed the North River with Count de Rochambeau—Genl. de Beville, his Qr. Mr. Genl. Genl. & Com. Deportuil in one boat. Duportail in another, reports to General of Posts and Encampments at the North end of York Island.” He records what he discovered, including the following:

“About the center of the Ground leading to Jeffrey’s Rock or point a Guard mounts. . . .

the shore from Jeffrey’s rock downwards was quite open and many—Huts of any kind—Huts. . . Troops—none being encamped below the heights. The shore did not even appear springs, or washing places any where on the face of the Hill which were resorted to—

The Island is totally stripped of Trees, & wood of every kind; but low bushes (apparently as high as a mans waste) appear in places which were covered with wood in the year 1776.

The side of the Hill from the Batteries below Fort Tryon, to the Bay opposite to fort Kuyphenhusen is difficult of access; but there seems to be a place abt 200 yds above the bay, which has the best appearance of a landing, and is most private—but a but or two on the heights abt. 200 yds above Fort Kuyphenhusen, & a little above the old long Battery, which was thrown up in 1776 must be avoided by leaving it on the left in getting to the Fort last mentioned.

The hill in the hollow below Morris’s heights (between that & Harlaem) is a good place to land; but near the York road opposite there appeared to be a few Tents—and many Dragon Horses seemed to be at Pasture in the low land between the heights—a landing perfectly concealed but not so good, might be made a little higher up the river, and nearer to those heights which ought to be immediately occupied (between the old American lines and the aforesaid hollows).

From the point within the mouth of Spiven devil, the way to the Fort on Cox’s Hill seems difficult, and the first part of it covered with bushes—there is a better way up from the outer point, but too much exposed to a discovery from the ship which Iys opposite to it, and on acet of its being less covered with wood—

The ground round the Fort on Cox’s hill is clear of Bush—there is an abats around the works, but no frizing; nor could I discover whether there is a ditch.

At the No. Ee corner there appeared to be no Parapet—but the whole seemed to be in a decaying state—the gate is next the No. River.

Fort Tryon, Kuyphenhusen & Ft. George on Laurell, with the Battery in the line of Pallisading across from River to River appeared to be well frized, ditched & abattied—in a word to be strong and in good repair.

Fort No. 8 is also abattied & frized at the Top—the gate is next Haerlem—there are no Houses or Huts on the side of the Hill from this work till you come near old Fort Independence.

On Mr Gowans heights there appears (by the extent of the Troops to be seen there) and encamped—supposed to be British Grenadiers—a little in the rear of this and on the (enemy) left, are a number of Huts—but whether they are Inhabited or not could not be ascertained—there being different opinions on this point from the nearest view we could get of it.—On the height opposite to Morris' White House there appeared to be another Regt. (supposed to be the 38th British) Between this and Fort Knyphausen (abt. half way) are two small Encampments contiguous to each other—both together containing two or 3 and 40 Tents.

—Hensins—On Laurel Hill near Fort George is another Encampment in view abt. 40 Tents & Huts which appear to be Inhabited also—by (it is said)—the 57th Regiment.

"The other, and only remaining Encampment in view, discoverable from the west side of the river, is betw. the Barrier and King's bridge—In the hollow between Cox's Hill and the heights below—"One hundred Tents could be counted in view at the same time, and others might be hid by the Hill—At this place it is said the Jagers—Hessians & Anspach lay."

—Mag. of Am. Hist., VI. 121.

"Again ordered abt. 5000 men to be ready to march at 8 o'clock, for the purpose of reconnoitering the enemy's Posts at Kingsbridge—and to cut off, if possible, such of Delancy's Corps as should be found outside their lines."

"At the hour appointed the march commenced in 4 columns on different roads. The whole Army (Parson's division first) arrived at Kingsbridge about daylight & formed on the heights back of Fort Independence—extending towards delancy's Mills—while the Legion of Lauzen & Waterbury proceeded to scour the Necks of Morrisania & thros to little effect, as most of the Refugees were fled, & hid in such obscure places as not to be discovered; & by stealth got over to the Island adjacent, & to the enemy's shipping which they attacked a few, & forth, & burnt Cattle & Houses brought off.—"From Washington's Journal, pub. in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1881), VI: 122-23; N. J. Jour., Aug. 1, 1781.

Washington continues the record of his expedition around Kingsbridge:

"The enemy did not appear to have had the least intelligence of our movement—or to know we were upon the heights opposite to them till the whole Army were ready to display. I began, with General Rochambeau the Engineers, to reconnoitre the enemy's position & works, first from Tippett's hill opposite to their left—and from hence it was evident that the small redoubt (Fort Charles) near Kingsbridge would be absolutely at the command of a battery which might be erected thereon.—It also appeared equally evident that the fort on Cox's hill was in bad repair. . . . From this view and every other I could get of Forts Tryon, Knyphausen & Laurel hill, the works are formidable.

"There are no Barracks or huts on the East side of the Hill on which Forts Tryon and Knyphausen stands—nor are there any on the hill opposite except those by Fort George. Near the Blew bell there is a number of Houses, but they have more the appearance of Stables & Hen Houses—Fort Tryon & Fort Charles, at the Gate, are about 14 or 15 Tents; which is the only Encampment I could see without the line of Pallisading, as the large one discovered on the 18th through the brake at the Hill betw. Fort Tryon & Cox's hill was not to be seen from any view I had.—"A continued hill from the Creek East of Haslamar River & a little below Morrisania's White House, Brown's Creek, filled in—Peterson, Landmarks, 1858, has from every part of it the command of the opposite shore, and all the plain adjoining within range of shot from batteries which may be erected thereon.—The general width of the river along this range of Hills appears to be from one to two hundred yardes—the opposite shore (tho' more or less marshy) does not seem miry, & the banks are very easy of access—between the Forts, & Battery under cover of a Hill No. West of Harlem town is capable of scouring the plain is difficult to determine from this side, but it would seem as if the distance was too great to be within the range of its shot on that part of the plain nearest the Creek before mentioned, & which is also nearest the height back of our old lines thrown up in the year 1776. —It unfortunately happens that in the rear of the (continued) hill before mentioned there is a deep swamp, and the grounds, East of that swamp are not so high as the heights near Harlem river.

"In the rear of this again is the Bruns, which is not to be crossed without Boats below De Lacey's Mills."—From Washington's journal pub. in Mag. of Am. Hist. (1881), VI: 123-24. See also the Military Journal of James Tischer, M.D. (1843), 321.

Von Krafft records that the combined forces of the "Rebels" and French, in whole columns, came marching over, where Independent had been, and "up towards us," in different divisions. From Laurel Hill a few shots were fired from the fort with 24-pounders at the "Rebels," whereupon they immediately retired behind the height. Afterwards, Von Krafft saw several columns of the "Rebels" march off behind Fort No. 8 (just south of N. Y. University) to the end of "Morrisiey" but being terrifically bombarded from Harlem, from "Shenek-hill" (Snake Hill), they were "soon retreating into the thicket and returning again."—Von Krafft's Jour., 144.

This is one of the early references to Snake Hill, the rocky height now in the centre of Mt. Morris Park, the name of which is taken from the Dutch "Slangberg," on account of the reptiles which formerly infested it.—Riker, Hist. of Harlem, cited in 25th Ann. Rep., Am. Socn. & Hist. Pres. Soc. (1915), 195, where collated historical information regarding the mark is publishing, including other references to "Shenek Hill" from Von Krafft's Jour.

Wm. Smith has a visit from Gen. Arnold, who is "dissatisthed at the Inactivity of the Day.——Says we have here now 10,500 odd rank & file of Regulars exclusive of Officers who may be near 2000 more. Yet Washington shewed himself yesterday at King's Bridge & 'tis said in Morrisania. Sir H Clinton went out this morning at 3 but was back to dine at the Hill formerly Mortier's.

"He disapproves of L. A. Cornwallis's Stay in Virginia with 7000 Men. He advised his going with 4000 to Alexandria & Baltimore and the Head of Elke—Offered to meet him at either Place with 1000 more by Water—Would by this Time have ousted the Congress at Philadelphia."—Wm. Smith's Diary (Ms.), VII.

"The commodious Wind-Mill, with six lots of ground adjoining, situated near the One Mile Stone, and fronting the Bowery Lane, is offered for sale.—N. T. Merc., Jl 23, 1781.

"The Postcoons carried to King's Bridge but the Rebels who were yesterday at Morrisania are fallen back.—We took up the Bridge on Sunday—What conduct!"—Wm. Smith's Diary (Ms.), VII.

A letter written from New York contains the following:—"The French and the Rebels have lately made their appearance before our lines; but four days ago they fell back towards the White Plains. They industriously propagate through the country that they intend to attempt New York, which I do not believe. Washington, perhaps, is willing to make a desjisperate push, but he cannot have the least hopes without the assistance of the French; and we do not think they are ripe to knock their heads against a wall, to please their new Confederates, with whom we are well assured they are upon very indifferent terms. . . .

"Those here, who are best informed, entertain not a doubt, that a prudent conduct on our part, must ensure success. However justly odious the leaders of the Rebels are on account of the miseries they have brought on their country, we must, in candour, allow them profound capacity, and unremitting industry."—Lett. & Eco. Post (London), Jan. 11, 1781.

Congress again resolves (see Ja 5): "That it appears to Congress [report from a committee headed by Elias Boudinot] that a very large number of marine prisoners and citizens of these United States, taken by the enemy, are now close confined on board prison-ships in the harbour of New York:

"That the said prison-ships are so unequal in size to the number of prisoners, as not to admit of a possibility of preserving life in this warm season of the year, they being crowded together in such a manner as to be in danger of suffocation, as well as exposed to every kind of putrid and pestilential disorder.

"That, therefore, the Commander in Chief [Washington] be, and he is hereby, instructed and required to remonstrate to the proper officers within the enemy's lines . . .

"That the Commander in Chief be, and he is hereby, also instructed to direct the supplying the said prisoners with such provisions and light clothing . . ."—Jour. of Cong. (ed. by Hunt), XLII: 829-30; Recollections of the Jersey Prison-ships: from the original MS. of Capt. Thomas Dring, by A. G. Greene (ed. by Dawson, 1865), 171; Dandridge, Am. Prisoners of the Rev., 402. See, further, Ag 21.

The following letter is written by a prisoner on the "Jersey" prison-ship ("vulgarly called Hell") : " . . . Our ship's company is reduced to a small number (by death and entering into the British service) of 19 . . . we bury 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 men a day, we have 200 more sick and falling sick every day, the sickness is the yellow fever, small-poix, and in short everything that can be mentioned . . . our morning's salutation is, 'Rebels! turn out your dead!'"—Penn. Packet, S 4, 1781.
The late Henry James wrote in his correspondence:

"The Fleet of German Troops (1800) arrive from the Weser—The chief Porte Trumbull of 32 Guns taken by the Iris (Capt. Dawson) formerly the Hancoc and several other Prizes. These Troops change the Condition of Affairs. Washington & the French must abandon W Chester. They hoped to induce us to draw off Part of L. Cornwallis's Forces—Of this they have now no Prospect—I am at a Loss what Veil they can invent to pacify the People who have been interested in the Conduct of this Revolution. I have heard the People in the Highland Forts. Hardy I believe on Account of Contentions. What Disgrace if they fall back—One Army to the Mountains & the Rest to Rhode Island!"

"Sir H C ought to muster in the River & acquire the Credit of forcing them to retire. He should do more send 3000 Men to Delaware to meet Cornwallis at the Head of Elk if the Earl is determined & I doubt his Attempting any Thing. Mr. White says he apologized for not going out with a Part of his 12000 by his Dread of a Party by Water to burn this Town."

"Sir H is a distress'd Man. Drummond the Auditor has shown his Expenditures greater than Howe's with a larger Force. A Board of Enquiry of Genl Robertson Birch Earl of Lincoln [sic] Patterson Genl Campell from Pennsylvania—Elliot & White. What hinders our landing any where at Philad: Boston Providence New London or any other Place where there are Stores? Sir H now commands here 15,000—Virginia 8 Thousand & above 4 Thousand in S Carolina—in all 25,000."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

A letter reaches Washington from De Grasse, stating that he will sail directly for the Chesapeake. Washington desires to cooperate with him there against Cornwallis, instead of making a descent upon New York (with the expected help of the French fleet under De Grasse) for the purpose of taking the city from Sir Henry Clinton, whose forces are weakened by detachments to the southward.—N. Y. City during the Am. Rev. (1881), 177, footnote.

"General orders are now issued for the army to prepare for a movement at a moment's notice. The real object of the allied armies [in the present campaign] become a subject of much speculation. Ostensibly, an investment of the city of New York is in contemplation—preparations in all quarters for some months past, indicate this to be the object of our combined operations. . . . General Washington and Count Rochambeau have crossed the North river, and it is supposed for the purpose of reenforcing the enemy's posts on the Jersey shore. A field for an extensive encampment has been marked out on the Jersey side, and a number of ovens have been erected and fuel provided for the purpose of baking bread for the army. . . . The royal army at New York, have received a reinforcement of three thousand Germans from Europe" (see Ag. 11)—James Thaxter, M.D., A Military Journal (1843), 342.

"To have a copy," says Smith, "a very succinct Review of this Campaign. I wish'd to have centured less & have studied to avoid it, as far as consisted with Fidelity to the Public. I mean to send a Copy to Eden & another to Tryon that one or other may reach the Cabinets. My Views are to prevent a Dereliction of the Colonies or any Part of them from Want of Success by shewing it impossible to erroneous Plans or a shameful Inactivity. I have faulted Lord Cornwallis Idea with Tenderness. I know not how to spare Sir H Clinton. It is from my Disapprobation of his Conduct that I do not avail myself of the openings he gives for an Acquaintance that would grow into Confidence—I am satisfied that he is a Trifler jealous & domineering. Our Neighbourhood has brought me to the knowledge of his Family—Not a Man of Business or Estate amongst them. They are ready to make a use of their Genl's for their own Interests. I allude to Oliver De Lancey Junr his Adjut General Capl Stapleton & Bibby assistants to De Lancey Col Crobie Barrack Master Genl Smith his Chief Secy Capl Russell & Major Phillips Deputy or Assis Secretaries Ld Dalrymple Cell Brw Co Water Aid De Camp. Of all these they have the least Pretension to genius or Learning (Watson) but he has rather taste than Strength of Mind & none of the Lott seeks Information. Their Principal I understand gives himself to such Guts of Passion that No Gent of Spirit and Independence will long continue in his Family—I don't find any of the Generals to have his Confidence—Arnold says they all complain. Hilliard & Robertson are most attended to—the latter thinks himself meanly of him—The former has the inner hold of Tongue for his Interest affects to conceal his Connection with him—Poor Sir Henry! His Want of Parts renders him insensible of his Dangers—He is Civil to me as a Neighbour & I don't wish a more intimate Connection, Aug. 15 because it cannot be useful to the Public & may hamper me. It is long since I have visited him."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

For a copy of Smith's "succinct Review," endorsed "Review of Operations in 1781 to 15 Aug.," lacking, however, the first pages, see Wm. Smith's Papers (MS.), folio 212.

Agreed to by the direction of Congress of Aug. 3 (g.t.), Washington's letter to Commodore Affleck proposing that "our Commissary—general of prisoners, or any other officer, who shall be agreed upon, shall have liberty to visit the ships, inspect the situation of the prisoners, and make a report, from an exact survey of the situation . . . whether, in his opinion, there has been any just cause for complaint."—In his reply, dated at New York on Aug. 10, the commodore stated, among other things: "The Government having made no other provision for naval prisoners than shipping [prison-ships], it is impossible that the greater inconvenience, which people on board ships experience beyond those confined on shore, can be avoided, and a sudden accumulation of people often aggravates the evil. But I assure you, that every attention is shown that is possible, and that the Prison ships are under the very same regulations here, that have been constantly observed towards the prisoners of all nations in Europe. Tables of diet are publicly affixed, officers visit every week, reduct and report grievances, and the numbers are thinned as they can provide shipping, and no attention has been wanting to send any officer fit to go a character to the lines for that purpose, he will be conducted to, and he shall be accompanied by an officer, and become a witness of the manner in which we treat the prisoners. And I shall expect to have my visitor the prisoners detained in your jails and dungeons in like manner, as well as in the mines. . . . "—Recollections of the Jersey Prison ships from the original M.S. of Capt. Thomas Dray, by A. G. Greene (ed. by Davison 1843), 15; Banks, David Sprear and the Naval Prisoners (1909), 21; Dandridge, Am. Prisoners of the Rev. 404-6. For Washington's later observations, see D 27.

"Our situation reminds me of some theatrical exhibition where the interest and expectations of the spectators are continually increasing, and where curiosity is brought to the highest point. Our destination has been for some time matter of perplexing doubt and uncertainty; bets have run high on one side, that we were to occupy the ground marked out on the Jersey shore, to aid in the siege of New York, and on the other, that we are stealing a march on the enemy, and are actually destined to Virginia, in pursuit of the army under Lord Cornwallis. We crossed at King's ferry, 51st instant, and encamped at Haverstraw. A number of bateaux, mounted on carriages, have followed in our train, supposed for the purpose of conveying the troops from New York Island."—James Thaxter, M.D., Military Journal (1843), 323.

On the 21st, the army resumed its march, and passed rapidly through Paramus, Aequackanack, Springfield, and Princeton, passing all the enemy's posts, and pursuing a route, with increasing rapidity, toward Philadelphia. "Our destination can no longer be a Secret. The British army, under Lord Cornwallis, is unquestionably the object of our present expedition. . . ."—Ibid. 123-24.

"In an Interview with St. Henry Clinton this Day he held that the French were 5000 & Washington 7000—He said a late Letter of Genl Parson's said the Rebels dealt out 10,000 Rations—He showed for 3000 less—The Rebels had no Women. But I recollect that Parsons made both armies but 8000 as Henry Van Schack had informed me, June 30 with a Letter & study only to make a use of their Genls for their own Interests. I allude to Oliver De Lancey Junr his Adjut General Capl Stapleton & Bibby assistants to De Lancey Col Crobie Barrack Master Genl Smith his Chief Secy Capl Russell & Major Phillips Deputy or Assis Secretaries Ld Dalrymple Cell Brw Co Water Aid De Camp. Of all these they have the least Pretension to genius or Learning (Watson) but he has rather taste than Strength of Mind & none of the Lott seeks Information. Their Principal I understand gives himself to such Guts of Passion that No Gent of Spirit and Independence will long continue in his Family—I don't find any of the Generals to have his Confidence—Arnold says they all complain. Hilliard & Robertson are most attended to—the latter thinks himself meanly of him—The former has the inner hold of Tongue for his Interest affects to conceal his Connection with him—Poor Sir Henry! His Want of Parts renders him insensible of his Dangers—He is Civil to me as a Neighbour & I don't wish a more intimate Connection, Aug. 15 because it cannot be useful to the Public & may hamper me. It is long since I have visited him."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Sir Samuel Hood came to the Hook last night from the West Indies with 14 Ships of the Line several Frigates & 3 Reg't said to be 2000—we have then here 17000 men.

Thos. McMollan advertises a bull-baiting to take place on Aug. 30 "at his house, the sign of his present Majesty, near the fresh water pump." He states that "The Bull is active and very vicious, therefore hopes the spectators will have satisfactory diversion."—Royal Gaz. Ag. 29, 1781. Cf. Je 20.

"The Town much agitated this morning because No Troops are in Motion to stay the Progress of the Rebels Southward. No French Fleet in the Chesapeake last Sunday—Ours can't leave the Hook yet for Head Winds ever since the Night before last."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"The great secret respecting our late preparations and movements can now be explained. It was a judiciously concerted stratagem, calculated to menace and alarm Sir Henry Clinton for the safety of the garrison of New York, and induce him to recall a part of his troops from Virginia, for his own defence; or perhaps learn some secrets of the enemy's strength, that were concealed from him by the arrival of a French fleet, favorable circumstances should present. The deception has proved completely successful, a part of Cornwallis' troops are reported to have returned to New York. His Excellency General Washington, having succeeded in a masterly piece of generalship, has now the satisfaction of leaving his adversary to ruminate on his own mortifying situation, and to anticipate the perils late which awaits his friend, Lord Cornwallis, in a different quarter. Major General Heath is left commander in chief of our army in the vicinity of New York and the highlands, and the menacing aspect of an attack on New York, will be continued till time and circumstances shall remove the delusive veil from the eyes of Sir Henry Clinton, when it will probably be too late to avert succour to Lord Cornwallis. To our officers, the inactivity of our enemy, in New York, is truly wonderful; they might without risking a great deal, harass our army on its march, and subject us to irreplaceable injury; but the royalists are more dexterous in availing themselves of treachery and insurrection than in effecting valuable achievements."—James Thacher, M.D., Military Journal (1883), 324. This journal gives particulars of the operations of the American army to the southward, including the siege of Yorktown, Virginia.

Among the original papers in the possession of the Mercantile Library Assn., which were published in 1881, is one partly in the autograph of Sir Henry Clinton presenting some of the circumstances which induced him to permit the allied forces of America and France to proceed from the North to Virginia, without interfering with a part of his army at Fort Ticonderoga which was cast upon him after the capture of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.—N. Y. City during the Am. Rev. (1861), 177-84.

Smith writes: "Reports from Jersey last Night that the whole Rebel army are still moving South. Some say the Southern Delegates carry the Sway in Congress & that Washington moves South agt his own Opinion."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Washington was on his army passes through Philadelphia to join Lafayette in Virginia.—Penn. Jour., S. 5, 1781.

Concerning the British regime in New York, Smith writes: "There is no Spirit of Enterprize—the general Dunloe kills the Spark that happens to rise in the Mind of any Man. Washingtons present movem't from the Hudson is the severest Censure upon the British Commanders in this Quarter I almost doubt whether Arnold will not be stop'd, for the very Reason why he should go on. . . .

"This is the 5th Day since Arnold was notified of his Command agt New London—He is not gone yet—Detachment from Robertson's & Skinner's Battalions passed thro' Flat Bush towards Whitestone but yesterday. Shameful Delays! The Design was known to go to Town yesterday—The Wind fair & strong since Saturday afternoon. Some of his Force is now imbarking."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Smith writes that a "Message Boat from L'4 Cornwallis" tells us that "a French Fleet arrived there [Virginia] on Thursday 30 Aug. 23 Ships in all—17 of them of the Line. . . . How well Sept. timed Sir Sam'l Hoods arrival here 27 Aug [see Ag 28]. . . . A 4 week will decide perhaps the Ruin or Salvation of the British Empire. . . . It is said he [Clinton] intends for the Chesapeake on the first News—but this is strange! If our Fleet be broken he can't go—if they get the Victory he will not be wanted."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Rivington publishes a long contribution from "A Friend to America and to Peace," who discusses the overtures made to congress by Lord Drummond in January, 1776, and suggests terms for a new negotiation. In the course of the text, this writer refers to "the secret agents of British Commissioners [the Howes—see Jl 14, 1776], who neglected to unfold to the people of this country at large, the liberality of the government, which they were authorised to publish, and which if divulged had prevented the falsities of that day from imposing as they have done, upon a heated and credulous multitude to the ruin of a country that from that murmuring might have enjoyed peace, and before his time been rendered the envy of the world."—Royal Gaz., S 8, 1781.

This article was contributed by William Smith to whom Rivington wrote on Sept. 30: "Having a visit from the A't G' who informed me that the manner in which the Howes were mentioned, in the long piece respecting pacification, had given disgust, & being directed to discontinue such freedoms, is the Reason why it does not now should be corrected as how out what may be thought to militate against them I will get it into Wednesdays."—From original letter preserved within Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

A council of war is held at New York to determine "how to convey the most effectual relief to the brave Cornwallis." It is unanimously agreed that "a general and vigorous attack should be attempted by sea, and that the British fleet should leave Sandy Hook on or about the 15th of October for that purpose." Gen. Clinton is to go in person on the expedition with 5,000 men from New York. The sailing of the fleet is deferred a month because "before the 15th of October there will be a great risk in getting over the Bar," and Lord Cornwallis has notified Clinton that his provisions will last until the end of October.—Lloyd's Eve Post (London), N 7-9, 1781.

An item of news from Cape Henry says: "Admiral Digby is most assuredly arrived off the Hook with one ship of 90 guns, and two of 74. The reports (from them) say he left England [see Je 19] with six ships of the line, six frigates and 100 transports, for America: but some advises the Admiral received at sea, made it necessary for him to come on with three ships, leaving the transport under cover of three ships of the line and six frigates."—N. Y. Merc., O 8, 1781. See, further, S 26.

Smith writes: "Arnold did not return till yesterday afternoon from New London owing to Head Winds—it is a badSymptom that the Army think their Loss greater than the Rebels. G [Robertson talks in this pitiful strain—He is a Dotard & abandoned to Frivolity & he has Parties of Girls in the Port Garden, the Midst of his own Fears, and the Anxieties of this Hour."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

News reaches New York, writes Smith, "That De Grasse got out of the Chesapeake before our Fleet arrived & had been joined by Barras. That then they were 24 of the Line & had left a Ship or two Frigates as we suppose in the Chesapeake. That our Van had attacked their Rear & Center coming out 5 Ins—and were left in Chace of them 4 Days ago 10 Ins', the French making for the Chesapeake others say N[ew] E[n]gland. This near Currituck Inlet S. of Cape Henry."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Smith is informed that Cornwallis, on Aug. 22, at Yorktown, "had Provisions for 10,000 Men for 62 Days—He must have great Help from the Country besides. We need not be anxious on this Account till in October."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. See O 19.

A Committee is appointed to examine the patents, deeds, and other papers belonging to Trinity Church with a view to having them properly recorded, as "many of the Public Records are removed from this City," and "it is feared some accident may prevent their being lodged again in their respective Offices."—Min. John Amory, who for a few years was proprietor of Montague's tavern on Broadway south of Warren, offers the place for rent. He describes it as the "House and Gardens . . . pleasantly situated in Great-George-Street, opposite the Artillery Park." Enough "furniture to carry on the business will be sold. The situation and convenience of the house and gardens are so well known as to render a further description unnecessary."—N. T. Merc., S 17, 1781. See O 22.

Peter Lenois, "From Graves's Line of Battle Ships come up from the Hook into the North River to refit."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

William Smith, writing to Gen. Tryon, says: "The French Adm' has been too cunning for Rodney and is come with his whole Fleet to the Chesapeake where the Enemy had last Monday 32 sail of the Line. The Armies that pased us un molested had not got down—The Force already collected there 3000 French 2000 Contis & month's men & 4000 Peasants of the neighbourhood

"Dibgy Dibgy is the Cry—if he arrives to morrow Graves who has 10 Ships refitting in our Harbour will not he ready to sail in some Days And every Hour is precious to Lord Cornwallis tho' his Provisions will hold out for 6 Weeks . . ." I was told it was clear that the Fleet will undertake to give him the intended Succours or if they will not that we shall make our Activity in this Part of the Conti counterbalance for our Losses elsewhere And the Enemy's thirt for Peace be equal to our own—My Zeal and perhaps my Ignorance would incline me to march with 10,000 Men to Philadi for the Destruction of every Thing useful for Commerce or for Arms except the Cattle of the implacable Foe wanted here. And if it should please God to give Ld Cornwallis the Glory of saving the Empire such Services would not deserve Censure . . ." In a postscript he adds: "To our unspeakable Joy Dibgy is at the Hook 4 of Clock P M—All well—The Presence of the Prince may supply our Deficiency."—Wm. Smith (MS.), folio 194. The "Prince" was William Henry, the third son of George III.—N. J. Gaz. (Trenton), which paper gives the date of his arrival erroneously as Sept. 25.

Prince William Henry was "the first of royal lineage" to visit this continent.—Pens. Packet, O 4, 1781. On the death of George IV, in 1830, he became King William IV, reigning until 1837, when Victoria became Queen.—See the "Roster of a Republican Governor's Table," Sept., 1970.

Prince William Henry arrives in the city, "accompanied by the Honorable Admiral Dibgy; he was received at landing by his Excellency the Commander in Chief, accompanied by the Governor, the Admirals, Generals, and other great Officers of the Crown, conducted to Commodore Affleck's where his Royal Highness dined, and in the evening retired to apartments provided for his accommodation in Wall-Street."—Royal Gaz., S 29, 1781. See also N. T. Merc., O 1, 1781.

Smith says that the prince, on landing, was "rec'd by Sir H Clinton the Govr [Robertson] & a Crowd behind Kennedy's House at the North River—They led him on Foot to Commodore Affleck's where he dined with Adm Dibgy & two Gen's in the Interim walked in the Library of Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"The Prince walked thro' a Part of the Town with Sir H Clinton & his Family with Crowds after him whose Curiosity he had gratified all the Morning at the Window. He dined this Day with Sir Henry & went Home at 9 in the Evening."—Wm. Smith's Diary, VII.

The siege of Yorktown begins. For particulars, with maps, see Winsor, VI 501, 541, 592-93. See, further, H 148.

Wm. Smith writes of the events of this day: "I was called to the Govr's at 7—k settled a new Draft of an Address wrote by Gen'l R after some Conversation with Adm Dibgy who was fearful of bringing the Prince into much too Notice for the King's Inclination—It was in Part composed of my Draft, but I think a better put together when we had settled it—k marked but one Alteration which we would not suffer. While we were together Gen'l Of De Lancy & Roger Morris came . . . according to appointment for 8 O'Clock and after that others of the Council to whom it was read as they entered but no Man Objected—Two Copies were ordered & one sent to the Prince—At 10 o'Clock we went with the Govr & were called up & introduced at the Head of the Stairs to Adm Dibgy who brought us in to the Prince who had Sir Sam'l Hood with him. The Passage all thro' was lined with General & other Officers of the Army & Navy waiting to be introduced.

"The Prince stood at the Right of the Fireplace with a Paper in his Hand & up at his Breast and bowed as we entered. Dibgy was at his right Hand a little behind. Gen'l Robertson advanced & took out the Address, but not having Spectacles got thro' with great Difficulty. The Prince then read his Answer—After which the Govr named several of us as we stood on his Right & down to the Bottom ending with the Mayor & Gen'l De Lancy—on this he bowed & retired & we did severally—

"After the Introduction of the Officers the Prince rode out in a Phaeton with Adm Dibgy to see the Island conducted by Col Watson Col Bruce and came back at 5—4 the Govr was to have attended him to shew the Way to his House, thro' a Double Rank of Militia down Wall St & thro' the Square & he had already Left Home before the Prince came in the Gen's coach—when apprized of the Intention to gratify the Militia & People he consented to walk up to his Lodging & back again as they did uncover all the Way in a very hot Sun. I was at that Time in the House with the Adm's Dibgy Hood Drake, the Council & other Guests for that Day's Dinner.

"The last sat down at 5 in the following order—The Prince at the Head between Gen'l Robertson & General Kniphausen—The Left Wing of a Horse Shue Table was the upper Part of the Room farthest from the Door—and the Guests next to General Kniphausen Dibgy Birch the Commd' Adm' Comm'd A'ffleck Mr Elliot myself Major Murray Capt Elphingstone—On the other Side after Gen'l R—Sir Sam'l Hood Adm' Dibgy Drake The Earl of Lincoln—Col' Adm' Cooke & Capt Short—While Mr. Col De Lancy Col' Roger Morris the Prince's Chaplain who said grace before any Person seated himself.—There were no formal Thankings.

"At 7 the Prince rose after Coffee on a Nodd from Adm Dibgy & took Coach to the Fort where he walked the Ramps a while & then proceeded to Whitehall where he imbibed & was carried to the Ship Prince George and thus ended this Day. The Prince drank down the left Wing of the Table but few Gen's drank to him or others except those near them & there was no heightened Conversation. He spoke a good deal to Gen'l R & Gen'l Kniphausen & always to the latter in French & accented it very properly. André was a Part of the Conversation but I heard very little of his Voice between us. I heard not a word of Kniphausen's. No man elevated his Voice so much as Sir Sam'l Hood a Native of Shropshire but the Image of a Yankee Col both in Person & stiff Behavior."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

The text of the address, published later, is as follows:

"The humble Address of the Governor, his Majesty's Council, and Inhabitants of New-York, May it please your Royal Highness,

"To permit me with the Members of his Majesty's Council, to hail your auspicious arrival on the American Shore.

"At the same time suffer me to express the Congratulations which all the Inhabitants by their Chief Magistrate, have commissioned me to convey to your Royal Highness.

"On the report of your coming [see 1 r 19], we felt our obligation to our gracious King, for this new and signal proof of his regard. Your Royal Highness's appearance augments our gratitude, by improving our idea of the extent of his goodness.

"Your presence animates every loyal breast, the glow in our own, persuades us you are formed to win every heart; a Rebellion that grew upon prejudice, should sink at the approach of so fair a representation of our Royal Virtues.

"But if a misled faction, not to be vanquished by goodness, persists in the war, every man of spirit will be proud to fight in a cause to which you expose your life.

"May your Royal Highness bring an accession of glory to that distinguished family from which you are descended; and who, as patrons of Liberty, and the Protestant religion, have spread Blessings among Nations.

"The prince's reply was as follows: "Gentlemen, I beg you will receive my best thanks for your attention to me, and congratulations on my arrival in this country, which I shall certainly take the first opportunity of making known to his Majesty. I desire you will accept of my best wishes for the prosperity of America in general, and this Province in particular."—N. T.Merc., O 1, 1781.

"It is impossible to express the satisfaction felt (by persons of all ranks), from the ease, affability, and condescension shewn by this most pleasing, manly youth, when he appears abroad amongst the happy, and approved loyal subjects of the good and gracious King, our best and firmeast friend, the Majesty of England, his Royal Highness's sincerely beloved Father."—Royal Gen., S 29, 1781; N. T. Merc., O 1, 1781. Samuel Loudon, at Fish-Kill, reprinted in his N. T. Packet of Oct. 4, the foregoing item from Rivington's Gen., adding at the end: "[Whew . . . w . . . w!]

William Smith writes of "agreeable Intelligence" concerning the provincial records. He says the captain of the "Warwick," at his late departure from Plimouth," received two boxes, but "no orders concerning them for these he would find here—No Intimation being got on his arrival here he has taken them to Sea on his late Convoy of the Detachmus with Baron Roodesel to Canada—Sung the 8th of July by Rats & four Dogs & found they were Books of Records & had mentioned the Boxes to Genl [Roberts- son]. He wished he was rid of them.

"I called in the evening at the Deputy Secretary's (Bayards) and as he was in the Country desired his Father that he might be sent for in the morning to attend the Receipt of the Boxes lest they should be carried out again to Sea and lost.

"Now the Gov't tells me Sir Saml. Hood says he left Records of this Province at Portsmouth at his last coming out to reinforce Rodney—Sir Saml. had been a Commissioner of the Navy at Portsmouth and on orders being issued to clear out the Eagle it was reported to him that there were Boxes on Board which they knew nothing about—He discovered they were N. York Records & wrote to London for directions but never had any Answer to his Letter or Letters 'The Govt' asks me what these can be and what he ought to do for their Safety.

"I replied that those must be the Papers now in the Warwick she having sailed from Portsmouth since Sir Samuel left it. Capl Ephinstone says they are large Boxes & Mr Tryon did not take more from Bayard in 1775 than two Cargo Boxes would contain. Majt Bays had been to Bayards to bring the Records to the Warwick for these Boxes, but he is not yet in Town & I advise the Delivery to his Clerk, for Fear of the Warwick's Sailing

"I now conjecture that before the Asia Sailed Home, Capt Vendepet delivered his Records to Lt. Howe's order on Board of the Eagle at this Port & that his Lordship had them there till his Return in the Fall 1778 that he left them on Board nor afterwards touched the Heads about them. What Shameful Carelessness!! These important Papers have been exposed to every Risk in the Delaware & Chesapeake & afterwards when he followed D'Estaigue to Rhode Island. —Were in the Storm that happened in Aug' 1778— and the Eagle had been well nigh taken in going Home."

On the next day Smith added: "Called at M's Bayards. He has all the Books of Records he delivered to Govt Tryon in 1775, except the five thousand Indian Cessions. These Returned are 24 Vol. They have suffered by the Damps, but I believe no Part of the writing is lost—Some of them must be transcribed for common Resort—An Act of Assembly may be proper to authenticat these Transcripts. If the Volume of Indian Cessions is lost 'tis the one least Material to the Public."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), V. Rivington congratulates the public," on Oct. 3 (q.v.). Bayard made a report to Gov. Robertson regarding the receipt of these Records, on Apr. 10, 1783 (q.v.)

"These effigies, the notice states, "are actually hanged on the gallows at New-York and Fort Knyphaser."—N. T. Merc., O 8, 1781.

Rivington "congratulates the public, and especially the inhabitants of this Province, upon the King's gracious restoration of those important records, which General Tryon's care and vigilance, secured on board the ship Dutchess of Gordon, to this Port, the 9th of November, 1775" (see Dec 6 and 9, 1775). He states that a mob, headed by Sears, was about to seize "that inestimable treasure" in the secretary's office, and take it to New England; but "General Tryon [then governor] caused such of the books to be selected as put it out of the power, of almost every land-holder without recourse to evidence in a court of Law, to take his title to his estate; and these were brought off in strong boxes under locks and seals. They were carried home to England, in 1778, and lately sent back in one of the King's ships to their ancient deposit.

"The residue, or general mass of papers, are among the rebels, having been first conveyed by order of the Provincial Congress to Kingston, in Ulster county, Mr. Bayard the Deputy Secretary was with them, and watched over them, 'till the violence of the times wrested them from his hands and consigned them to others above three years ago; since which, they have been exposed to a perilous transportation from one place to another in carts.' After referring to the possible "mischief" and "wild confusion in property" had Sear's project succeeded, Rivington states that the records are "at present secure in the hands of Mr. Bayard, at the Secretary's Office."—Royal Gen., O 3, 1781.

Commenting on this, Wm. Smith says: "Rivington inserts this Day a Congratulation of the Public on Receipt of the Records, which I drew to show the Landholders, that the Crown had a mortgage upon the Province for her Return to her Fidelity.—It hints obliquely at the Necessity of Recourse to thence to prove their Titles and asserts that Care will be taken to prevent their falling into the Hands of the Usurers. It may also set the People at any Project for burning this Town."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. Gen. Arnold asserts to Wm. Smith "that the Adj'lt General has informed him that there are now here above 11,000 Rank & file—Take out 5 for the Chesapeake there will be 8 left with Officers above 900. Sir H. Clinton did not produce his Letter but got him to declare his objects saying the Letter was mislaid. General [Roberts]on made the Objection of Danger to N. Y.—Sir H help'd by stating his Force here at but 11,000 which Arnold denies to be the Truth."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Chief-Justice Smith is one of the guests dining with the prince and Admiral Digby on board the latter's ship; he writes that he has "every advantage to hear & mix in the Conversation," and that it was "very well" of his [i.e., the prince's] Genius & Information as well as of his Manners—He is very sprightly and inquisitive."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

The quarterly meeting of the Marine Society is held at "Hewet's Tavern, on Hallett's Wharf."—N. T. Merc., O 8, 1781.

"Maj. Olivier de Lancy, of the 17th Regiment of Light Dragoons, is appointed "Adjutant-General of the forces in North-America, vice John And'rz." He is also promoted to be a lieutenant-colonel.—N. Y. Merc., D 24, 1781.

In a circular letter addressed to the governor of New York, Robert Morris (see F 20) explains in detail the measures taken to secure financial aid from abroad and the difficulties there met with. He says: "People have flattered themselves with a visionary idea that the thing more was necessary than for Congress to send a lega- nister abroad, and that immediately he would get as much money as he chose to ask for. That when he opened a loan, hoardcals would run to see who would have the honour of subscribing to it, and the like, but surely a moment's reflection should have convinced every reasonable man that without the clear prospect of repayment people will not part with their property. Have the efforts to borrow in this country been so successful as to ground any hopes from abroad? Or is it to be supposed that foreigners will interest themselves more in our prosperity or safety than our own citizens? Or can it be believed that credit shall he given abroad before solid funds are provided at home? . . ."

The Congress conformable to the public wish have appointed ministers, requested grants, and opened loans. God bless them they have got nothing, and in Spain but very little. Loans were expected from individuals in Holland, but nothing of that sort has been or probably will be obtained . . .
"Our fleet, which received considerable damage in their spars and rigging in the last engagement off Chesapeake, are now perfectly repaired. 8,000 troops are embarked on board of the men of war, and wait only for a fair wind to sail to the assistance of our Southern Hero. Gen. Clinton goes with them; for he always accompanies the grenadiers and 42d regiment. There are three ships of 90 guns, 16 of 74, six of 64, and two of 50, besides frigates. The whole of these have for three weeks past been lying in our harbours."—Washington, Oct. 18.

The Americans defeat the British at Yorktown, Va. The formal surrender is made by O'Hara, in the absence of Cornwallis, to Lincoln, the representative of Washington.—Winsor, VI: 504. Articles of capitulation are settled between Washington and Cornwallis. An interchange of notes between Clinton and Cornwallis, from Oct. 9, 1781, regarding terms of surrender.—N. J. Jour., Oct. 17: N. T. Merc., N. 5, 1781; Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 35. A letter from Cornwallis, written at Yorktown on Oct. 20, to his commander-in-chief, Clinton, describing the battle and his capitulation, was published in the N. T. Merc., N. 26 (g. v.), one week after Cornwallis himself appeared in New York on his return from Yorktown. See N. 19.

"The British army became prisoners of war, subject to the ordinary rules of exchange. The only delicate question related to the American loyalists in the army, whom Cornwallis felt it wrong to leave in the lurch. This point was nearly disposed of by allowing him to send a ship to Sir Henry Clinton, with news of the catastrophe and to embark in it such troops as he might think proper [see O 31] to lead to New York, and no questions asked."—Fiske, American Revolution, 44.

On this very day, Admiral Graves's fleet, with Sir Henry Clinton on board, sails from New York to relieve Cornwallis; it was booked to start a week earlier.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

The news of the surrender reached New York on Oct. 24 (g. v.).

Anbury wrote on Oct. 30, that "When the British fleet left Sandy Hook [for the Chesapeake, to relieve Cornwallis], Gen. Washington had certain intelligence of it within forty-eight hours after it sailed, although at such a considerable distance as near six hundred miles, by means of signal guns and alarms. A very notorious rebel in New York, from the top of his house, hung out the signal of a white flag, the moment the fleet got under way, which was immediately answered by the firing of a gun at a small village about a mile from our post at Paulus Hook; after that a continual firing of cannon was heard on the opposite shore."—Anbury, Travels through the Interior Ports of Am., II: 545.

"The London Fleet" arrives at the Hook "and brings Provisions for 50,000 Men for 6 months."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Cornwallis writes to Sir Henry Clinton of his surrender at Yorktown, giving a detailed account of the action. In extenuation he adds: "I never saw this post in any favourable light, but when I found I was to be attacked in it in so unprepared a state, by so powerful an army and artillery, nothing but the hopes of relief would have induced me to attempt its defence, for I would either have endeavoured to escape to New-York by rapid marches from the Gloucester side, immediately on the arrival of General Washington's troops at Williamsburg, or I would, notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, have attacked them in the open field, where it might have been just possible that fortune would have favoured the gallantry of the handful of troops under my command. But being assured by your Excellency's letters that every possible means would be tried by the navy and army to relieve us, I could not think myself left liberty to venture on either of those desperate attempts."—N. T. Merc., N. 26, 1781. For Smith's comments on this letter, see N. 24 and 26.

John Kirk, "who lately kept the Mitre Taverns in the Broadway," announces that he has removed to the "well known tavern in Great George street, opposite the Artillery Park. The capture of Cornwallis is confirmed "by a Messenger from Staten Island."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 135.

A further account of the taking of Lord Cornwallis and Part of Articles of Capitulation arrived, but not yet credited by some People.—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 135.

The continental congress resolves "That the respective states be called upon to furnish the treasury of the United States, with their quotas of the eight millions of dollars for the war department, and civil list, the ensuing year; to be paid quarterly in equal proportions, the first payment to be made on the first day of April next."—Jour. of Cong., VII: 216.

Not a farthing had been paid in on April 1st, during the month thereof, and all uncollected quantities contributed by Rhode Island and New Jersey.—Ind. Gazetteer (Phila.), Jl. 6, 1782; N. Y. Merc., Jl. 15, 1782. William Smith, under date of July 15, cited the Mercury when he wrote: "No part of the Continent has raised a Farthing towards the Taxes of the Gov't but Rhode Island, Pennsylvania & Jersey."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VI.

Smith must have learned from some other source about Pennsylvania's payment of a partial quota during the month of June (see Ind. Gazetteer, Phila., Jl. 20, 1782). New York's quota for the year was 375,589 "dollars," of which she had paid 500, up to Dec. 1 (ibid., D 21, 1782).

The Bonetta Sloop of War, came up this Evening from Virginia, with a number of Refugees, who, we were afraid, had been given to General Washington, as he refused to include them in the Capitulation [see O 13].—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 136.

In and near New York, Sir Henry Clinton has no less than four houses; he is quite a monopolizer. At times, when he is visible, he is seen riding full tilt to and from his different seats; in this, he is the Ape of Royalty.—Man. Com. Coun. (1790), 846, citing the Political Mag. (London), N. 1781.

'BE IT REMEMBERED!'—N. Y. Packet (Fish-Kill), N. 1, 1781.

Samuel Bayard, Jr., receives from the ship "Warwick" three cases, containing all the books which, on Dec. 4, 1775 (q. v.), except that of Indian cessions to the Crown, had been ordered put for safety on board the Duquesnoy. For further particulars, see D 6 and 9, 1775; and also Ap 10, 1783 (the date of Bayard's report to Gov. Robertson on the subject).

The inhabitants of New York "are so affected by the defeat of Lord Cornwallis, that many merchants refuse to open the goods received by the last fleet; some will not even sell without ready money."—Letter from New York, in N. J. Jour. (Chatham), Ap 17, 1782.

"Arnold shows me a Pasquinade taken down this morning from the City Hall purporting that he [Clinton] had sacrificed Ld. Cornwallis to his Envy."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"General Clinton came ashore at the Narrows yesterday, and dined at Rouhaut, with some of his Suite this Day."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 176.

The fleet returns to the Hook. It is reported that "Washington & Rochambeau are going agt Charles Town... Sir Henry came up on Monday [5th]."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), II, under date of N. 8.

Sir Henry Clinton, writing from New York to Lord Germain, says: "Had it been possible for the fleet to have sailed from hence at the time it was first imagined they would have been able to do, I have not the least doubt that Lord Cornwallis would have been relie,ved, by the joint exertions of the navy and army."—Lloyd's Post (London), D 17, 1781.

Smith writes in his diary: "Digby came up last Night having sent Sir S Hood away with 19 Ships. Thus ends a most inglorious campaign for I believe Sir H Clinton] means nothing, this year.

"The Disorders under the misrule of the Army add to Discontents for Neglect in the Operations of the War.

"The Distresses are general and very great for want of Fuel. The Kings Barracks indeed are full, but the Citizen suffers. The main Causes are two 1. The want of Guard Ships in the Sound & 2. The order forbidding any to come from Staten Island till the Garrison there is supplied. Thus the Innocent bear a Punishment that ought to fall upon the Staten Island Delinquent who should be made to perform what is most necessary to the Garrison.—I have spoken my mind on this Subject to General Robertson. But he said wood coming to Town on Contract is seized & given to Favorites Mr John Livingston & Jacob Watson have suffered by this Partiality."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"Brooklyn Hunt. The Hounds will throw off at Denyce's Ferry, at Nine o'Clock on Thursday morning. Dinner on the Table at Three o'Clock at Brooklyn Hall. A Guinea or more will be given for any Pet to describe the Agonies I endured prior to my Arrival here in June last, since which my personal Property has been confiscated, and my Family banished [for the Increase of my Distress in my Separation here from my Estate and Funds]."

"What I had in this Town I have indeed been put into Possession of by the Kindness of General Robertson, but it is with Truth an extreme Mortification, that I can assure your Excellency, it yields me no more than 4.140 Currency £ Annually, so that I am every Day at Straights, for the bare Necessaries of Life to subsist a Family of Six adult Persons and four Children in all the Meaness of an unbecoming Economy: It does not become me to add what your Excellency will more [easily] conceive, than I can express, I will therefore say no more Sir than that unaccustomed to want, and in the insatiable Expensiveness of Living in this Garrison we have wanted even Fire to warm us, and with a Zeal for the Interest of the Crown and a Readiness to serve his Majesty by all the means in my Power, I cast myself and my distressed Family, upon your Excellency's Protection, for such Assistance as other Loyal Sufferers of Condition have experienced from your Goodness."—American Loyalists Transcripts. Memorials, Correspondence, &c., II: 215-15.

Rivington publishes a declaration of independence by Loyalists. It embodies part of the American declaration, but asserts their allegiance to Great Britain.—Royal Gaz., N. 17, 1781. It is reprinted in Van Tyne's The Loyalists, Appendix A.

A "Charity Sermon," it is announced, will be preached on this day in St. George's Chapel for the benefit of the "Charity School," which at this time "consists of 86 Scholars viz. 56 Boys and 30 Girls." The boys are taught "reading, writing, arithmetic and merchants accounts; the Girls—reading, writing, arithmetic, and needle-work;—They are all amply Cloathed, and furnished with books, paper &c. The School is visited once a month and the Children are carefully examined by a Committee, consisting of the Rector, and three or four Members of the Vestry of Trinity Church. When any of the Scholars are of age, and properly qualified, they are put out to suitable trades or services; and others are taken into their places."—Royal Gaz., N. 14, 1781.

"Lord Cornwallis arrived this Morning from the Chesapeake, and had a Meeting with General Clinton."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 137. See also N. Y. Merc., N. 26, 1781. Wm. Smith's observations are: Lord Cornwallis arrives & visits and dines at Head Quarters. He will sail in the Fleet to England before Christmas. —Many Officers come with him—The Rebel Papers which I have seen are 14 Ins are bilaterally severe, agt the Earl & show that they are displeased at the Terms of Surrender. I perceive that a writer in one of the last admits the authenticity of the Letters now published by Rivington to be Deane's—They republish those to Robt Morris & Duer.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.
While England is anxiously waiting for news concerning Cornwallis, the following item appears in a London paper: "Nothing is more likely than that the letters to and from General Washington, which were intercepted by Sir Henry Clinton [see, e.g., My 21], . . . were written for the purpose of being intercepted, and deceiving our General. The attack upon New-York, said in those letters to be intended, was certainly nothing more than one of those feints, so common in every war, which are calculated only to divert the attention of our enemies from the places where the real attack is to be made . . . No more than 1000 men were employed to force the strong lines round the head quarters, defended by innumerable batteries, ships, and at least 15,000 regular troops: The whole was clearly a feint; and we have yet to learn by the next dispatches from the Chesapeake, whether we have not reason to lament, that the whole was in vain. The officers served only to lull the fears of our Commander in Chief, for every part of our army, except that which lay at New-York: These letters begat security in the minds of our troops for every other post. God grant that Lord Cornwallis be not the victim of that security."—Lloyd's Ev. Post (London), N. 21-23, 1781.

The letter of Cornwallis (see O 20) must offend—proves that he disapproved of that Establishment! That he would not have been found there if he had not relied on unperformed assurances of Relief and how sharp the implied censure in talking of coming to N Y with that little Army since we could have March'd from thence with 12,000 more!—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. See also N 26.

"Lieutenant Krafft establishes quarters "at the 5th mile stone, below a tavern named The Dove."—Van Krafft's Jour., 154.

The "disagreeable intelligence of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis" reaches London.—Lloyd's Ev. Post (London), N. 23-26, 1781.

"From 12 till 4 P M. on a visit to Sir H Clinton—He very properly at Parting apologized for boring me so long, for he talked almost in a denunciatory justification of his own Conduct & a Censure of every Body else—Lord Amherst the Secretary of State Sir Geo: Rodney Lord Cornwallis General Robertson Gen'l Knyphausen General Tryon Adm'1 Arbuthnot M' Graves the Fleet &c. He is a distress'd man, looking for Friends and suspicious of all mankind & complain's of the number of his Enemies—Believes the Ministers wrote the Paper which so severely censures him and was published lately in the English Papers with the Signature of Milo. He wished me to know what had passed between him & Lord Cornwallis, & beg'd me to take the Trouble of perusing the Correspondence which he send for that Purpose . . . ."

"In talking of Lord Cornwallis's Letter [see O 20] I could not help observing to him that the impression it made was (1) that his Lordship was clear of establishing an unfavorable connection. (2) That he was lost by a Promise of Aid not given & (3) Those who thought well of him & that his little Force could have come here, would ask why Sir H Clinton did not go to him with 10, or 12,000 Mro. This touched him seriously & brought on a Continuation of the long Discourse in which he several Times said he had a good Mind to call upon Lord C for an Explanation in writing, with a View to its Publication here. He is very angry at the Letter & says Robertson is abusing Lord Cornwallis very freely—When he spoke of Robertson & Tryon he apologized to me for taking Liberties with my Friends."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"Lord Cornwallis, who arrived on the 19th (g. u.), makes the appearance on the street "attended by Several Officers."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, II: 138.

"Joseph Corrê, pastryc cook and confectioner, "has re-commenced making pastry," etc. at 17 Hanover Square. "Dinners or suppers dressed abroad; he likewise will provide and furnish entertainment for the young gentlemen."—Y. T. Merc, N. 26, 1781.

"America, who is able to be independent of Great Britain," says a London writer, "cannot be free, France has claims on her which interest as well as ambition will induce them to think can only be liquidated by a footing on the continent, and the old fable of the Horse calling Man to his assistance against the Stag will once more be verified. America must be blud and infatuated indeed, if it does not foresee these consequences from the French connection."—Royal Gaz., Mr 9, 1782.

A letter from New York states: "Lord Cornwallis's disaster has indeed dragged our affairs, much; but this was done by the French. The rebellion is still languid, and the King's friends in Dec. America are as numerous as ever, if not more so. I hope that alliances will be formed in Europe to take the French off, in which case the rebellion must infallibly sink."—London Chron., F 12-14, 1782.

A New Yorker writes: "It is entirely a matter of astonishment for the garrison of Charleston in South Carolina. If we should now enter into the French army, it is to be feared, will be totally lost to Great Britain; and if that be the case, it will be of no advantage to the Americans; the French are only making a cat's paw of these poor deluded people, to gratify their own thirst for domination . . . . The French are already shewing them what they may hereafter expect; for in whatever place the French army is, there it must evidently be understood that nation only by the real friends; if a fortress is surrendered to, it is always in the name of the King of France; and when taken, French colours are immediately hoisted."—London Chron., Ja 29-31, 1782.

"Lord Cornwallis imprisons this Day in the Robust Man of War—The Fleet is to sail to morrow."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. It did not actually sail until the 15th, and also carried Benedict Arnold, to whom Chief-Justice Smith gave "Notes for Answers to Questions that may be put to him—gave a Hint to Gen'l Tryon to get him examined by the King & in Parliam—He will concur with Lord Cornwallis in all Measures of Vigor—He will oppose him in the Exaction of N Y in a War of Posts & in his Attachment to the Military Governors—He will concur with Gen'l Clinton in the Call for Reinforcements & the Retention of N Y; and the Practicability of restoring the Kings Interest in this Country. He will censure his want of Enterprise. I hope his Representations will be useful."—Ibid. Von Krafft in his journal states erroneously that Cornwallis departed on the 10th, some ships with inhabitants of New York ("who probably expected nothing good here in America"), and also the Hessians in vain.—Van Krafft's Jour., 155.

This date is found on one of Archibald Robertson's drawings (see Jl 12, 1776), entitled "View of the North River from the Beach near Lispenards Brewhouse 10th Dec. 1781."

Sir James Lowther moves in the house of commons that resolutions be passed purporting: "That it is the opinion of this House, that the war carried on in the colonies and plantations of North America has proved ineffectual either to the protection of his Majesty's loyal subjects in the said colonies, or for defeating the dangerous designs of our enemies," and "That it is the opinion of this House, that under the present circumstances of the country, all further attempts to reduce the revolted colonies to obedience are contrary to the true interests of this kingdom, as tending to weaken its efforts against its ancient and powerful enemies."

Sir Fletcher Norton refuted Lord North's arguments and defended the resolutions on the grounds that the ministers could no longer be trusted and that the people ought to have a "specific declaration of the House, that this mad and impolitic war should be no longer proceeded in."

Mr. Welbore Ellis declared that if the house adopted the resolutions it would be guilty of "political suicide," and that it was necessary to have posts in North America for the prosecution of war against France and Holland.

Mr. Townsend "reproached, in most severe terms, the Washington writes from Philadelphia to the president of congress on the subject of naval prisoners. It appears that there are not enough naval prisoners in the hands of the Americans to exchange for those in British hands. He says, also, "... for above two years, we have had no reason to complain of the treatment of the Continental land prisoners in New York, neither have we been charged with any improper conduct towards those hands." He considers the sufferings of the American seamen, confined in the prison-ships (see Ag 3 and 21), as largely due to want of such American regulations, as would require "all Captains of private vessels to deliver over their prisoners to the Continental Commissioners upon certain conditions;" for then "the numbers taken and brought into the many ports of the United States would have amounted to a sufficient number to have silenced those taunts from us."—Writings of Washington (Ford ed.), IX: 423-24. See, further, ibid, IX: 443-45; and Banks' David Snead, 59, et seq. (embracing official correspondence through April, 1782, from the papers of the continental congress on the subject of the exchange of prisoners).

During the British occupation of the city, there was completed, probably in this year, an elaborate survey of Manhattan Island, known as the "British Head-quarters Map of New York & Environs," which shows in detail practically all the topographical features, including batteries and redoubts, of the island. It is reproduced and described in Pl. 50, Vol. I.

The four roads in the vicinity of the present Murray Hill which appear on this map are described in the 22nd Ann. Rep. of the Am. Sociey & Hist. Pres. Soc. (1917), 152-53. In the same account, the history of this section of the city, including Kipsbush and Indenberg, is reviewed. (In the description, on p. 152, Vol. I, the reference to "Landmark Map, Vol. II, Appendix," should read Vol. III, Appendix.) On this map, Ellis Island appears as "Oyster Island."—cf. O 19, 1776.

In this year, also, John Hills completed his survey for the map of the lower part of Manhattan Island, which was presented to the common council by John Lister, Esq. in —, but which is now in bad condition, and has been placed for safe-keeping in the N. Y. H. S. It is reproduced in Man. Com. Cown. (1848), opp. p. 291, and in ibid. (1887), frontispiece; an engraved reduction of this map is in Emmet Coll., 19990. See also Mr 24, 1776.

A diagram was drawn this year, showing the defensive works on the country estate of Nicholas Bayard, established as a line of defences on the outskirts of the city. A sketch made from this diagram, showing these works adjacent to the Bayard mansion, was published in the Man. Com. Cown. (1860), 611.

A list was prepared (probably in 1782, or possibly 1783) of barrack houses in the garrison of New York, showing street, number of house, and by whom or how occupied. The following, "selected at random," are all that are printed in the condensed record in the work cited:

Broadway,
No. 3 "Commander-in-Chief's Secretary's Office."

" No. 24 "Royal Artillery Hospital."

" No. 82 "Mr. Cox of the Board of Refugees."

Great Dock Street, No. 8 "Doctor North."

Hanover Square, No. 10 "Admiral Digby."

Water Street, No. 17 "his secretary's office."

" No. 52 "Jacob Hart, a refugee."

" No. 103 "Mr. Law, Captain of the Port."

" No. 203 "Mr. Lorentz, Hessian Paymaster."

Mill Street "seems to be devoted to stores and stables."

Wall Street, No. 7 "General Loshberg."

" No. 10 "Colonel Morse, Chief Engineer."

CHRONOLOGY: THE REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD: 1776-1783

1781: total misconduct, ignorance, and mad obstinacy of his Majesty's Dec. ministers, and accused "the disgraces that had attended his Majesty's arms" to the weakness of the administration. He advocated the adoption of the resolutions as "the only practicable means of putting an end to the accursed war."

Sir Edward Deering expressed his entire confidence in the present ministers. He would not impute the war to them, but dated it from the repeal of the Stamp Act.

Viscount Maitland compared Britain's former power and glory to her present decay and attributed her fall to the present ministers. In an impassioned appeal he urged the House "to do that at last which they ought to have done at first, to hold a bold, constitutional law to those ministers, and tell them, Thus far you have gone, but no further. We dare not provoke us farther: if you reject our advice, you may feel our vengeance."

Mr. Calvert argued against the motions because he thought they "would at once not only prove her [Great Britain's] incapacity to reduce her rebellious colonies to obedience, but be an act of political despair, that could not fail to increase the ardour of her natural foes and lend a spirit to their hostile enterprises against her."

Gen. Burgoyne declared that the impracticability of the war was sufficient justification for the present motions, and that he now thought the principle of it was wrong. He said: "I am convinced, upon comparing the conduct of ministers, as time has developed their errors, that the American war was part of a general design levelled against the constitution of this country, and the general rights of mankind. I have further demonstration, the conviction of a whole people. Passion and prejudice and interest may operate suddenly and partially; but when we see one principle pervading the whole continent, and daring, through difficulty and death, for a course of years, it must be a strong vanity and presumption in our own minds to suppose they are not right. It is reason, and the finger of God alone, that implants the same sentiment in three millions of people."

Mr. Burke "spoke with great force in favour of the motions as necessary to be adopted for the satisfaction of parliament and of the people; and adverted to the relaxed and shameless system of government throughout every part of our dominions."

Lord George Germain objected to the motions because they meant "a total relinquishment of the American war, which he conceived to be a project equally weak, impracticable, and dangerous," and declared that if they were passed, he would resign. He maintained "that the moment the House acknowledged the independence of America the British Empire was ruined."

A John Westley "advised the House to come to no resolution on the subject till Lord Cornwallis returned to represent the real state of the country, and give them some authentic information to the practicability of the war."

Mr. Turner "spoke in favour of the motion, and said, he had always wished the Americans success, and was pleased when he heard of Lord Cornwallis's defeat and capture as he hoped it would put an end to our further persecuting our fellow subjects."

At two in the morning, Lowther's motions were lost by a vote of 320 to 179.—Parl. Hist. of Eng., XXII: 822-24.

Exhibitions of travelling menageries afforded diversion at this period. One is advertised on this day, to be seen at No. 20 Great George St.—Royal Gaz., D 19, 1781. Another made its appearance on May 12, 1789, at 28 Wall St., fronting the Coffee-House.—N. Y. Packet, May 14, 23, 1789.

Roger Morris, accused of disloyalty, is exonerated by the governor and council after a hearing.—Cal. Coun. Min., 509.

"Ordered that the Rector and Mr Shaw wait on Doctor Mallet and Doctor Doth to request the payment of the Ground Rent due to this Corporation for the Lots at Vauxhall during the Time the House has been occupied as a Hospital for His Majesty's Troops being upwards of Four years."

—Trin. Min. (MS.).

The following advertisement appears: "The Managers beg leave to inform the Public, that the Theatre is now repairing, decorating, and airing, and they propose opening the House in the course of a few days, of which proper notice will be given."

It is further announced that "no Advertisements for this Season, will be printed in Mr. Rivington's Paper, and no other."—Royal Gaz., D 26, 1781.

18 Our friends in New-York," says a London writer, "may safely stand their ground—Government here does not intend to give up the contest, and I am convinced they will send out all the force that can be spared from this country and Ireland, early in the spring; but the war will be conducted on a new system, and so confident am I, that this country will strain every nerve for the recovery of America, that I shall not think of any arrangements in my concerns, which some panic struck creatures might be induced to adopt after the cheerful appeal" (Cornwallis's surrender at Yorktown—see Nov 19, 1781).—Royal Gaz., Mr. 6, 1782. Extracts to the above purport from two other London letters are printed in the same issue of the Gazette.

12 James Robertson, having returned to New York (see Je 27, 1780), forms, with his brother Alexander, Nathanial Mills, and John Hicks, the firm of Robertsons, Mills, and Hicks, for the publication of The Royal Am. Gaz. They continued as its publishers up to the last-known issue, that of July 31, 1783 (Vol. IX, No. 604).—Brighampton, A. S. Proc. (1917), 450-92. See, further, Ap 5, 1783.

14 Some 50 Loyalists held captive at West Point break the "strong stone Rebel prison," garrisoned by McDougall with "about 600 rebel troops," and "upwards of twenty of those unhappy people are safe arrived in this city."—N. T. Merc., Ja 14, 1782.

11 A long loaf of bread "made of sweet flour, of the first quality," must now weigh 23 pounds and sell for 14 copper; while the round loaf, of inferior quality of merchantable flour, must weigh 23 pounds, and sell at the same price.—Royal Gaz., Ja 12, 1782. Cf. N 20, 1780. See also Van Tyne, The Loyalists, 250-52.

17 What was known as the "Garrison Assembly" opens for the season at Roubale'ts Tavern (the present 115 Broadway), and continues once a fortnight. Officers of the army, navy, and public bodies are requested to send the subscription price (two guineas) to Major Brigade Amiel, 37 Hanover Square.—Royal Gaz., Ja 16, 1782.

18 The queen's birthday is celebrated in New York. Chief-Justice Smith writes that he dined "at the Admirals with the Prince . . . and attended him to the General's Ball in the Evening . . . . The Prince is lively & sensible."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII, under Ja 19, Jan 18, 1777.

Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

25 Cornwallis is back in London after an eventful voyage from New York. His countrymen appear to have forgotten the unfortunate circumstance at Yorktown (see O 19, 1781). "In his way to town, [he] was complimented by the Mayor and corporation of Exeter, with the freedom of that City; and so pleased were the People with his arrival, that he was carried from the London Inn to Guildhall on men shoulders, accompanied by an incredible number of spectators."—Royal Gaz., Ap 24, 1782.

30 The publication of Abbe Raynal's The Revolution of America is advertised. "The author of this publication," it is stated, "displays such a depth of observation, such a political penetration, and such an animated zeal in the cause of freedom as are rarely to be found. Here liberty appears in the most captivating garb, and philosophy contends to speak in the language of common sense, and though the author discovers an ardent partiality to America, he appears never to be regardless of candour and equity and reason. Vide the Reviewers." This book was burned by the Hangman, and the Author obliged to fly from Paris for protection from the civil power."—Royal Gaz., Ja 30, 1782.

3 Philip Kissick, "intending for England," offers all his property for sale as well as his stock of liquors, groceries, etc.—Rivington's Royal Gaz., F 3, 1782. Kissick was a tavern-keeper as well as a merchant, and was for several years proprietor of the tavern later famous as Montague's. See Ap 5, 1754.

3 Von Krafte records his being "on field picket in the so-called Red house on the North River, behind St. Paul's church."—Von Krafte, Jour., 1753.

The public is informed that "The Rev. Mr. Sayre having been solicited to exhibit a Course of Electrical Experiments in this city, presents his respects to the gentlemen of the Navy and Army, and begs leave to inform them, that having joined forces with Mr. Thomas Medenham . . . and having been politely encouraged by his Excellency Lieutenant General Robertson, Governor of this Province, and by Brigadier General Birch, Commandant of this City, in the accommodation of a convenient and capacious apartment in the City Hall, he, assisted by Mr. Medenham proposes to give a Course of Lectures on Electricity.

The first Lecture will be on Thursday next [Feb. 14], to begin precisely at Eleven o'Clock in the forenoon, in the centre room of the City Hall.

"Ladies and Gentlemen will be pleased to observe, that there are two stairways leading to the room, at each of which attendance accounts of the experiments will be given in. The room will probably be that next the Commandant's House; as there will be less interruption from the passage to the Guard Room." Each lecture to be repeated in the evening of the day when it occurs; admission, one dollar.—Royal Gaz., F 9, 1782. An analysis of the first lecture was published in ibid, F 13, 1782. The second lecture was advertised to be given Feb. 23, after postponement on account of moist weather in the air, which, it was stated would prevent the operation of the experiments "with the wished for beauty,"—Ibid, F 20, 23, 1782. The fourth exhibition was advertised for March 2.—Ibid, Mr 2, 1782.

The first news arrives from England since Oct. 29 last, and the content of the king's speech at the opening of parliament, on Nov. 27, 1781, is made public. The portion relating to the American colonies reads thus: "No endeavours have been wanting on my part to extinguish that spirit of rebellion which our enemies have found means to foment and maintain in the Colonies, and to restore to my subdued subjects in America, that happy and prosperous condition which they formerly derived, from a due obedience to the laws; but the late misfortune in that quarter [the surrender of Cornwallis—see O 19, 1781] calls loudly for your firm concurrence and assistance to frustrate the designs of our enemies, equally prejudicial to the real interests of America, and to those of Great-Britain . . . ."

"In the prosecution of this great and important contest in which we are engaged, I retain a firm confidence in the protection of Divine Providence, and a perfect conviction in the justice of my cause; and I have no doubt but that by the concurrence and support of my Government, by the valour of my fleets and armies, and by a vigorous, animated and united exertion of the faculties and resources of my people, I shall be enabled to restore the blessings of a safe and honourable peace to all my dominions."—Royal Gaz., F 13, 1782.

The king's speech pleasing, says Smith, "but not so much as one would imagine—This is Proof of the extreme Dejection into which the Minds of the Loyalists have been plunged—They want strong Cordial—Confident Expressions great Promises & hoped to have heard of formidable Alliances.

"There are few or no Expressions of a Note for even the Govt—I believe the General & Admiral have ungrateful Intimations. Nothing transpires from them—but the Papers shew that Ld Denbigh in the upper & Lord G Jermaine in the lower House charge all the Distresses upon the Commanders & talk of Trials. Genl Robertson suspects he has Letters & that the Warrants are within. If Warrants are drawn, Locke takes it that Clinton is recalled & confesses me to the Devil for the Deovation [sic], sensible as he is of his own Insufficiency that he may begin to get the army in order which is now utterly neglected.

"Not the least Intimation of a Change in the Ministry. The Opposition have not attempted even a Riot among the Pot wallapers, nor has the American engravings been introduced to another department, in both Houses but a word directly of yielding to the Independence of America."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII, under F 13.

A. S. Proc., (1917), 459. See, further, Ag 15, 1783.

Smith writes of a meeting at “Head Quarters” to which he was summoned. Mayor Mathews and Col. Beverly Robinson "had reported Houses & Stores for which the Proprietors demanded Rent. The Sum amounted to £20,000. Elliot was for the Paym’ of £10,000. —I was at the Expense & set his Face agst the Principle as drawing after it Demands of £200,000. The Commander in Chief saw a Choice of Difficulties—I advised to give up as many of the Houses as possible—State the Matter to the Govr as to the back Rents & make advancements as Prudence & the Condition of the Sufferers might require pro Bono publico to prevent civil Reports and a bad Spirit.

"It came out that the giving up of 12 Houses might still Clamours & ‘tis agreed that the Command’ report the whole Stock of Property and its condition before any further Measures be taken as to the back Rents." He adds: "I believe the King’s Interest suffers by too great Partialities to the Army. Why so great a Collection of Soldiers & Officers in Town all winter when many of them might be distributed in the Eastern Parts of Long Island!"

—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

Rivington feels compelled to make answer to "Mr. F. H.," who, in the Penn. Packet of Feb. 9, declares "three and twenty lies" in one issue of the Royal Gazette to be "a thing not unlikely." He says: "I am far from denying that my Gazette does sometimes contain articles of Intelligence which afterwards appear to be not well grounded. But when it is a misfortune or事故 to all such publications, in which our readers expect to find, not only the facts but the reports of the day. But I defy you and all your host of rebel Typographers, to point out a single instance of my ever publishing, as a serious fact, what I knew to be false at the time, as you have in the instance above quoted; and as they have all, in innumerable instances, to serve the wicked designs of a traitorous faction.

"I likewise hereby offer and engage, that for every falsehood you will point out in the Royal Gazette since the commencement of the rebellion, to produce at least a dozen in any of the rebel newspapers published in the same period; or forfeit all that stock in trade which you so much envy me for, and which you have had the stock of impudence to advertise for sale.

"Till that is accepted, you ought to hold your peace; but if you will not mend your manners, I shall think myself perfectly excusable hereafter if I handle you and your abettors without mitten.”—Royal Gaz, F 20, 1782.

A sloop which left New York on this day brought intelligence to Greenock that "there were no King’s ships lying there [New York], but the Rotterdam and two or three frigates. The troops were all collected, every place was strongly fortified, and a cut made across York Island, and a long line along the narrow spot. The French had no ships at Rhode Island, but a strong fleet from the Southward and a number of troops were daily expected there; and after their arrival, it was imagined that Gen. Washington would make an attack on New York. The troops were in high spirits and had plenty of provisions."—London Chron., Ap 13, 1782.

"The Americans," says a satirical London writer, "advance rapidly to independence. At the beginning of the contest they were independent of principle, independent of credit, and independent of all gratitude to the mother country, for having raised them into political importance, and protected them from the encroachment of their enemies. Since which time thousands have been independent of cash, clothing, law, liberty, domestic comfort, and every social enjoyment that can be valuable to a reasonable creature. Besides "General Robertson said that whenever we could not meet the Enemy in the Field & fight them this Plan must fail; he therefore could not see the use of a closed work or closing the line—but would give his advice against it.

"All the General officers, however, except General Robertson, agreed to the Propriety of having a closed work & closing the line, to prevent the sweep of a Fire from the Main, for the reasons specified in Chief."—From "Memorandum of the Debates in Council," among Sir HenryClinton papers, in possession of W. The governor's council is convened to consider the expediency of revising civil government in the province. The members advise against it, Chief-Justice Smith dissenting. The minute reads as follows: "As the direct Object of all military Operations ag' the Rebellion is the Restoration of the King's Government there can be no Expecency of the General or Civil Authority as soon as a Legislature can be convened to frame Laws suited to the present Condition of the Colony and disposed to promote the Success of his Majesty's Arms. But since the calling of an Assembly could avail to none of the Ends to be expected from their Councils Example & Assistance if it should be his Majesty's Pleasure to remove his Forces now here and it remained unknown (to them at least) that any authentic Intimations of the National Councils for the Operations of the Year have as yet been received they therefore unanimously advised his Excellency to defer the Measure to a more eligible Juncture or until there he some further Communication of his Royal Intentions and Commands."—Wm. A letter to a correspondent in London, a New Yorker says: "General Clinton has lately had a visit from Ethan Allen, the Chief of the Vermont Association, offering to become the allies of Great Britain under certain circumstances. He had every attention paid him by our Commander; but unluckily, on his return, he and his party, except one or two, fell into the hands of the rebels, who lodged them in goal at Albany, and sent an account to General Washington of the circumstance; mean while the Vermontese came in a large body, who were opposed by the rebels and Albany militia, some of which, however, joining the Vermontese, a bloody action ensued, in which many fell, but the latter were complete victors, and rescued their chief, Ethan Allen, who has sent fresh assurances to General Clinton of the most firm resolutions to espose the British cause, with about 7000 fine troops."—London Chron., My 16-18, 1782. 28 From his headquarters at Morristown, Washington issues the following instructions to Col. Matthias Ogden: "The spirit of enterprise, so conspicuous in your plan [see March] for surprising in the keeping and bringing off the Prince William Henry and Admiral Digby, merits applause; and you have my authority to make the attempt, in any manner, and at such a time, as your own judgment shall direct. I am fully persuaded, that it is unnecessary to caution you against offering insult or indignity to the persons of the Prince and Admiral, should you be so fortunate as to capture them; but it may not be amiss to press the propriety of a proper letter or copy of the party you command."—Military Pursuits, My 27, 1782.

"In case of success, you will, as soon as you get them to a place of safety, treat them with all possible respect; but you are to delay no time in conveying them to Congress, and reporting your proceedings with a copy of these orders. Take care not to touch upon the ground, which is agreed to be neutral, namely, from Newark to Rahway and four miles back."—Writing of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), IX: 466-67. The original of this letter was sold at The Anderson Galleries, May 6, 1920, with the Library of the late Chas. L. F. Robinson, of Hartford. I must beg leave to take this opportunity of informing your Excellency that unless they [the privateers] are kept within bounds, it will be impossible to carry on the King's service." Robertson laid this letter before the Chamber of Commerce, and in its answer the Chamber praised the work of the privateers and declared that "however difficult it may be to carry on the King's Service, unless Privateers are kept within bounds, it will be found much more so if these bounds be reduced to too narrow a compass. . . ."

"If . . . there were Ten Thousand men instead of only One Thousand in Privateers from this Port, it were far less an Evil considered in the most unfavorable light, even supposing not one of them could ever he got to enter on Board the King's Ships, than to have them in Privateers acting against us, which would certainly be the alternative. . . ."

"The late unfortunate disasters, the few arrivals, and the peculiar dulness of Trade, all conspire to render the want of Seamen more than usual; for when it is considered how many Vessels have been purchased and manned for the Public Service, besides the King's Ships of various denominations, and the great number of Seamen which this Port has constantly furnished, We rather wonder whence they could be collected than that no more have offered, and in this important View we are confident this Port can be exceeded by none upon this Continent, and perhaps is not far below the second in Great Britain."—Col. Smith writes that Sir Guy Carleton has told him "he wished to put our Affairs on such a footing that when the Army left the Country it should be because they were no longer of use from such a Settlement as was perfectly pleasing to the People & useful to Great Britain."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

The British and Hessian troops in New York, and those "cantoned in its vicinity" are reviewed by Geo. Carleton, the new commander-in-chief; and on the following day, the Grenadiers, the 25th Light Dragoons, and other corps on Long Island are reviewed.
The "appearance of the troops on both days infinitely surpassed every exhibition hitherto presented in America."—N. T. Merc., My 25, 1782. The review on the 20th was "near the Jews' Burying Ground."—Jour. of Hugh Gaine, III: 150.

Joseph Corre begs leave to acquaint his friends and the public in general, that he has removed from No. 17, Hanover-Square, to
No. 19 Wall-Street, next door to Messrs. Taylor and Bayard's venue store, where his friends and customers may be supplied, as formerly, with all kinds of confectionery and pastry, &c.—
Royal Gen., My 22, 1782.

From his conversation with Carleton, Smith says he has "discovered very clearly" that the new commander "had been all along with the Opposition & that the old Ministry had as I conjecture cast their Eyes upon him to please the Opposition & upon the same Principle listened to my Instances for the Peace Bill."—
Wm. Smith's Diary (M.S.), VII.

The inhabitants of the city of New York present an address to Sir Guy Carleton, congratulating him on his appointment to "the Chief command of his Majesty's armies in America," and on his safe arrival. They believe "that the pacific disposition of the parent state will abate the prejudices of the deluded inhabitants of America." The address is signed by Mayor David Mathews. In reply Sir Guy expresses the belief that such a sentiment from this country cannot fail to re-unite the people of England and America "on the principles of common liberty and general advantage."— Royal Gen., My 25, 1782.

A quarrel occurs on one of the ferry boats between a seaman and the ferryman. "The latter was has had before certain Officers on Wednesday—k on Friday brought out to whipp'd 200 Lashes & flogging under a heavy sentence at Roulalt, where it's were sworn & that Gen'l Patterson had confirmed the Judge's of a few Officers as a Sentence of a Court Martial. It is said the Ferry-man is a worthy Loyalist of Maryland."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII, under Je. 4.

"Before Dinner at Headquarters Sir Guy Carleton took me aside and talked of Courts to decide by Grand Juries & Petty Juries excluding all referring Decisions to Courts Martial or as he expressed it in his Diary (MS.) VII, unparallel'd cruelty to the Principles of the Law than the present Mode by Police & Military Discretion but said it would require a consult how best to effectuate his wish—On which Mr Ch't[ef [Justice] Smyth and Mr Kemp were called in & it was agreed we should consult & report it to the Subordinate Board.

In some notes written on the proposal, Smith states that if the success of the British forces in any colony is such "as to render it peaceable to reestablish its Legislature, it ought to be immediately convened; because there will then be a Power, as well to aid the Military operations, as to give the People the Protection of the Crown." He thinks that "infinite Confusion would be created, by a partial Re Establishment of the Judicial and other Branches of the Executive, without the Legislative authority." He adds: "There are Difficulties in the Choice of any Models, to be proposed for the Government of the Districts in the British Possessions..."

"Under the Military Government there must needs be a Defense of Justice in the Criminal Department; for the Power of Life & Death, when not authorized by the Laws, wears too formidable a Complexion, to inspire the Confidence of any Magistracy, who are to depend for Safety upon the... Crown or the Legislature.

"If to such a Judicatory we prefer the Opening of the Courts... the Course indeed will be legal; but it is necessary to be appointed, that the Judges may walk by no Rule than the Laws of the Land, without Deference to Power of any King, being bound by Oath to disrepect even the King's Letters to the Contrary, if any such should be sent to them..."

"They must also act with equal Freedom in the Dispensation of Justice in Civil concerns until the Law is changed... It seems to be deduce... that previous to the Moment which will admit of the Restoration of the Legislature, little more can be done, than to bind the Hands of Criminals, especially when the Punishment extends to Life or Limb; and that for the great objects of preserving Order, preventing Oppression, & compelling to substantial Justice, as far as the Situation of the Country will permit it may be proper to constitute a Board or Judicatory of persons only to be appointed of Amercan or British origin, to form a Code of Rules for general Conformity & to meet Monthly & hear all Complaints & Appeals from Subordinate Departments of Power & to afford effectual Redress according to their Discretion as nearly as possible according to the Measure and Spirit dictated by the Laws & Constitution."—Wm. Smith's Papers (MS.), folio 194.

"In celebration of the victory of the British fleet over the French in the West Indies, "the Artillery Company with their field pieces and the two battalions of the Kingston regiment of foot militia" assemble on the parade, and after going through the manual exercise, fire a "Feu de Joie." In the evening, the town is "most splendidly illuminated."—Royal Gazette, My. 29, 1782.

A report or sketch bearing this date shows Sir Henry Clinton's plan "for securing the peace, interest and trade of the inhabitants in the three Islands [Manhattan Island, Long Island, and Staten Island]; Establishment of the police; landed estates of the rebels parcelled out amongst needy refugees under certain restrictions, and granted during pleasure; arrangement for trade of the garrison."—See Report on Am. M.S.S. in the Royal Inst. of Gt. Brit., II: 452.

The "loyal Refugees of the Province of New York" present an address to Sir Guy Carleton. They state that their "dispersed situation" prevented their congratulating him when he arrived. They give the following account of themselves: "Many of the King's friends, in this province, have suffered ignominious deaths, for their uniform attachment to Government; many have been persuaded to stript and banished from their estates and families, while others of us, a great number of us, were stripped by violence and oppression, were stript of our property, and obliged to seek an asylum here and in Canada. Thousands are now in actual service, and numbers have perished nobly in defence of their King and the constitution." They are ready to hazard their lives, as they have sacrificed their fortunes, "to assist in bringing the Colonies to a re-union with the Mother-Country." He replies that he wishes most warmly "that peace and union may be restored on such generous and liberal terms, as may insure greatness and security to the whole, as well as happiness and freedom to all its parts."—Royal Gazette, Je. 1, 1781.

An open letter to Sir Guy Carleton appears in the Pennsylvania Packet. It is subscribed "Agricultor," and reads: "The united states of America, heard with pleasure of your appointment to the command of his Britannic majesty's troops in America. Your birth in a land of freedom and urbanity, has secured you from the prejudices and restrictions of a Briton. An Irishman is a traitor to his native country, when he becomes the enemy of liberty.—You were once, we told, the master and afterwards the pupil of the immortal Wolfe. Your behaviour in Canada and your general conduct, have procured you the character of a gentleman and a hero.

"It is your misfortune to be called as a solemn witness of the dissolution of the British empire.—Your predecessors in command have left you nothing to work upon. They have expended the whole strength of your nation in fruitless sieges, battles, marches, and even victories. A Marlborough or a Eugene, could do nothing in America, in your present situation.

"You have but one thing left and that is to be HONEST. Tell your master that the time for making the least impression upon this country. The people are uniting daily, more and more, in support of their independence. The French alliance they now see to be founded in interest, and the once deluded adherents of the crown of Britain, now expose for sale in our city, cargoes of goods manufactured by the hands of Frenchmen.

"The royal standard has been raised in every state to no purpose. Crown officers and a few vagrants called by you Refugees have crowded to it. The rest of the king's friends would not take up arms to rescue their Saviour, and there is no government so obnoxious to their principles, to which they would not swear allegiance.

"Beware of the company of Billy Smith. He deceived sir Harry Clinton, who distrusted the late ministry. He likewise deceived governor Johnson, who afterwards deceived the British house of commons. His ambition and avarice have blinded his understanding, and with all his pretensions to loyalty, he is in heart a staunch republican.

"Put an end to the tortures of the Prison-ships. Let sir William Howe, and sir Harry Clinton, feel in their consciences All the punishments inflicted on seamen to death in cold blood. Let not your name and laurels he stained with any of their crimes."—Penn. Packet, Je. 3, 1782.

Commenting on the reference to himself in this letter, the chief-justice says: "It appears to attack me & yet may come from a Friend to the general Reconciliation. It is but lately Mr. Donaldson writes that an English Gazette censured me as the Projector of Arnold's expedition to New London & this supposes me a Republican."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

Smith writes: "General Robertson Genl Birch & Elliot are gone Home [following a conference at headquarters] with little Credit & much Anxiety—They have all been vehement advocates for the Military Power, which they see will no longer be countenanced & Genl R in particular must have felt greater Restraints, for having hidden his real sentiments from the Ministry & the Pains he has taken to mask them before me."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

The king's birthday is celebrated. "At noon a royal salute was fired from the guns of Fort George, and answered by the ships of war, adorned in a distinguished manner by an infinite variety of colours, presenting a beautiful exhibition. His Excellency the Commander in Chief, attended by a numerous procession of principal officers, waited on his Royal Highness Prince William Henry, with their compliments of congratulation.—Very elegant entertainments were given by his Excellency Sir Guy Carleton, Rear Admiral Digby, and Lieutenant General Robertson. A Feu de Joie was fired in the evening, amongst many thousands of rejoicing inhabitants, and the night was closed with amusements and a charitable banquet."—Royal Gazette, Je. 5, 1782; Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

In an advertisement of the "Brooklyn-Hall Charity Lottery", at the tavern of Charles Looosly (see My. 7, 1779), beginning on this day, the public is notified that tickets may be had at the printer's (Rivington's) and at the following taverns: Mr. Strachan's City Tavern and Coffee House (Merchants Coffee House); Mr. Rourke's Tavern, Broadway (City Tavern); Mr. Kirk's Tavern in the Fields (Montague's); Mr. Hearne's Tavern in the Fields; Mr. Bryan's Tavern, opposite the Coffee House; Mr. Campbell's Tavern in Irish Street; Mr. O'Brien's Tavern, Fly Market; Mr. Hays Tavern, Broadway; Borden's Queen's Head, Jamaica; Mr. Ralphey's Tavern, New Town; and Mr. Griffin's at Howard's Half Way House, Long Island.—Royal Gaz., My 25, 1782. This list probably includes most of the popular taverns of the time in and about New York.

Washington writes to Rear-Admiral Digby concerning a visit he has received from Capt. Daniel Aborn and Dr. Joseph Bowen in behalf of the American naval prisoners. He states that, as he has "no agency on naval matters," the application was made upon "mistaken grounds." In addition he declares that the prisoners chief complaint is about overcrowding, and that he is sure Digby's "feelings for fellow men" will induce him "to proportion the ships (if they must be confined on board ships) to their accommodation and comfort, and not by crowding them together in a few, bring on disorders which consign them by half dozens in a day to the great air." Digby answered this letter briefly by suggesting that Washington could mitigate the sufferings of the American naval prisoners by exchanging some of the British soldiers in his hands for them.—Royal Gaz., Jl 3, 1782. See also Ag 21, 1781; Je 11 and 24, 1782.

"General Orders" are issued—a first step toward the restoration of exchange in these words:

"Whenever it should be found necessary to confine any officer not military he is to be immediately reported to His Excellency L. Gen. 1. Robertson who will take the necessary steps for his being brought to Tryal."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M's), VII, under Je 9.

A "neat Brick House, With a Store, three rooms a good Cellar-Kitchen, and Yard, in Great George Street, opposite the Artillery Park," are offered on lease. "For particulars apply to John Amory, Whip-Maker, No. 229 Queen Street, near the Fly Market."—Rivington's Royal Gaz., Je 8, 1782. This was the old Montague tavern, on Broadway, between Warren and Murray Sts. See Ap 5, 1754.

David Sproat writes a letter from New York to the prisoners on the "Jersey," informing them that Capt. Aborn and Dr. Bowen, their representatives, have conveyed to Gen. Washington (see Je 5) the appeal concerning their "disagreeable situation," and have solicited him to grant them relief by exchanging captured British soldiers for them. Sproat informs the prisoners that Aborn and Bowen are now bringing to them Washington's reply, which is a "flat denial," and encloses copies of three letters that have passed between them and the American commissary (see Je 24), "which will convince you that every thing has been done on the part of Admiral Digby, to bring about a fair and general exchange of prisoners on both sides."

"As a result, the prisoners on the "Jersey" address a letter to "Friends and Felllow Countrymen of America," which closes thus: "What is to be done? are we to live here and share the fate of our unhappy brothers who are dying daily? No, unless you relieve us immediately, we shall be under the necessity of leaving our country, in preservation of our lives."—Royal Gaz., Je 12, 1782; Recollections of the Jersey prison-ship, from the MSS. of Capt. Thomas Drum, by A. G. Greene (ed. by Dawson, 1865), 138-42; Banks, Daniel Sproat, 73-6. See, further, Jl 3.

City Tavern and Coffee House (Merchants Coffee House) writers write to the secretary of war, Benjamin Lincoln: "I am solicited by our naval Prisoners at New York and the British Commissary to obtain a permission for a Boat to fish on the Jersey Coast—this Boat they propose to man by some of the Prisoners, and some persons to be employed by the Enemy, and the Fish to be appropriated to the Use of the Prisoners on Board the Prison Ship and other places where they are confined."

"The British Commissary has also proposed to purchase within our Lines a Quantity of Wood for which he will pay the Cash and it shall be for the Use of our Prisoners solely—the Applications are founded on these Principles; The Fish will afford the Prisoners two or three fresh Meals a Week and the Price of Wood being so much lower within our Lines than at New York, the greater allowance will be given the Prisoners.

"I am extremely sorry to inform you that the Situation of those Men is truly deplorable—my Hopes of their Release is frustrated.

"Exchange can take Place. I owe the Enemy a Balance of 1,000 Men in the naval Line, and they will not consent to exchange those they now have unless we give them an equal Number of Seamen or Soldiers and pay off the Balance—I would therefore wish to be authorised to contribute towards the Comforts of those Prisoners and that if you think proper that they should be indulged with the necessary excursion to fish and that the British Commissary be allowed to purchase Wood for the Use of our Prisoners."

Lincoln sent the letter to congress on June 28 recommending a compliance with the requests, and on July 1, congress referred the matter to Washington for execution. The secretary of war's report of the transactions is indorsed: "General Heath and General Knox will endeavour to make arrangements for carrying the indorsed propositions into execution without improper use being made of the indulgence."—From a copy of the report in Emmet Coll. (No. 8778) of N. Y. P. L.

"The New-York Freeholder Number 1" appears. The writer says: "I am bora feed, a New-York Freeholder; my farm, which lies at a small distance from the City, and within the British lines, hath always enabled me to live in abundance: and thus I am interested in the welfare of America. Twenty pounds currency would pay all the debts I owe in the world; and I have no pension from Great-Britain, France, or America; so that it is impossible that any bias on account of these should hang on my judgment. I never received any personal insult, nor material injury in my estate, from the active friends of Congress; therefore I cannot have any personal resentment against them. It is possible I am mistaken, though I anxiously wish for the day when I shall embrace them as friends. In fine, although I am a hearty friend to every part of the British Empire; yet my prejudices are peculiarly in favour of America, and my interests are inseparably connected with her's."

This circumstances, and with this disposition, I propose to examine some points of the last moment to America. I dare not promise that I shall throw much light on them—that must be left to the determination of others. They shall at least be discussed with calmness and impartiality.

"Whether America is likely to be happier and more flourishing by independency, than by a continual union with Great-Britain—Whether independency is really attainable at this time—Whether America should not accept of the accommodation proposed by Great-Britain, provided the terms are generous, honorable, and advantageous to America—Whether the present alliance between France and America is beneficial to the latter—And whether the Americans should not be justly alarmed at the designs and efforts of France, all circumstances considered—These, besides literary, moral, and political objects, are the present topics of treat. I shall assign my reasons for the opinions I adopt concerning each of these; and as I wish, like Montesquieu, rather to make people think, than make them read, I hope they will consider these reasons with candour and impartiality.

"The present period calls loudly on every friend of America to lay aside passion and prejudice, and to dismiss every narrow, selfish, and party principle. The state of things is greatly changed from what it was lately. Matters are now brought to a most interesting crisis, when the conduct of my countrymen must determine whether America is to continue a theatre of war and desolation; or whether peace with its attending blessings shall revisit us, and whether we shall become once more a free, flourishing and happy people. My earnest wish is, that wisdom, virtue and cool judgment may prevail in their deliberations, and regulate their conduct."

Royal Gaz., Je 15, 1782.

Commenting on the article, Smith says: "I suspect it to be sent from Head Quarters and that it is one of a Set sent out from England to prepare the Way for correcting the Vindictive Spirit of the Refugees."—Wm. Smith's Diary (M's), VII, under Je 18. Additionally, there are numbers of "The Freeholder" appeared in Royal Gaz., Je 22, 28, Jl 16, 19, 27, and Ag 5, 1782. See Jl 20, for a conjecture by Smith as to the identity of "The Freeholder."

A New Yorker writes: "Our new Commander in Chief [Sir Guy Carleton] goes on retropecting—not ground—but excuses. The arrangements he has already made will occasion a saving of near a million in the annual charge. He sees everything with his own eyes, and hears every body: he is up and about before fourin the morning: Before the quarter-part of his army have opened their eyeholes, he has perhaps rode ten or a dozen miles; he comes almost every day to the parade, which is a signal that immediately after he will have a levee, where every one may tell their story, or request a private hour, which I am told is generally fixed for that day or the next, and those who have had conversations with him go away very much satisfied with his patience and condescension: In short, his conduct, as appears from every one, has procured him the respect of the army, and the love of the Loyalists.

"The newspapers will inform you, that the rulers of America are not in the least disposed toward peace, unless independence is acknowledged, and their great and good ally included in the treaty."

"The whole army is now under orders to encamp beyond Kingsbridge, it is said, with intention to cover some miles of the country, in which forage can be collected together. Washington is drawing together his force at New-Windsor, where the greater part of the French troops from Chesapeake are to join him."—London Chron., Jl 20-21, 1782.

"Weir's Tavern, the Sign of The Grand Master, below the Coffee-House, Will be Opened on Tuesday next [June 18] for the reception of company, where an Ordinary is intended to be kept up in the genteelst manner."—Royal Gaz., Je 15, 1782. When Sarah Bolton Loftus offered her property for sale on Jan. 6, 1783, one of the items listed was a house "on the corner of the Old-slip, next to the house wherein Mr. James Wier lately kept tavern."—N. Y. Gaz., Ap 14, 1783.

Court is held in the city hall for the trial of piracies by a commission acting under a statute of King William III.—Royal Gaz., Je 19, 1782. Gov. Robertson presided and the beach included the governor and council of New York as well as the council of New York. "We proceeded," says Smith, "upon the Record of a Commission issued in 1762, and when sworn signed & sealed a Warrant to the Military Provost Marshal to deliver & to Ludlow as Marshal of this Court to receive and bring before us John Clarke—James Wigmore & Joseph Royan. The Court assembled at 10 A M & sat till Dusk—We unanimously found Clarke guilty, & sentenced him to be executed 28 Ins—Wigmore was also found guilty by a great Majority—but intending to recommend him for Pardon, we ordered his Execution on the first Monday in June 1783—A great Majority acquiesced Joseph Royan & he was instantly discharged.

"The Coms unanimously agreed to admit the Prisoners to have Counsel, & it was declared to them, but they said they were not able to procure any.

There were several Witnesses on the Part of the Crown. viz. John Gaine, Richard Magrath, James Iain, Francis Smith & James Bruce.

Twelve masters and one surgeon of American vessels which have been captured by British cruisers and brought into port, having obtained the "enlargement" of their paroles from Rear-Admiral Digby, to return to their homes, have appointed six of their number to inspect the prison-ships in the harbour, including the "Jersey;" and, accompanied by David Sproat, the British commissary-general for naval prisoners, and by George Rutherford, the surgeon of the prison hospital-ships, they visited these ships, and then prepared a written report, of this date, with considerable detail added, to the effect "that they have found them in as comfortable a situation as it is possible for prisoners to be on board of ships at this season of the year, and much more so than they had any idea of, and that anything said to the contrary, is false and without foundation."—Royal Gaz., Je 31, 1782. Sproat, Recollections of the Jersey Prison-ships, from the original manuscripts of Capt. Thomas Dring, one of the prisoners (ed. by Dawson, 1865), 143-45; Banks, David Sproat and Naval Prisoners in the War of the Rev. (1909), 81.

The publication of this report had a certain limited influence in effecting a much needed exchange of prisoners (Greene, op. cit., 111); but, for the motives that are said to have prompted or forced the report itself, see Ag 7.

"It is with great satisfaction that I now unscrew the lid of my Diary and produce for the public, the important evidence of my communications with the present Ministers of the French Republic; having seen the published letters of June 11 (q. v.), writes to the British commissary, David Sproat, giving a long and earnest exposition of the American position and claims in the matter of exchanging prisoners for the relief of the many Americans crowded into a few ill-kept British prison-ships. He reviews the British principles and policy which he conceives actuate Sproat's superiors, who, he says, are trying to induce the Americans to join the king's forces by assuring them that they are neglected by their countrymen, and that all their miseries are due to Washington's disinclination to exchange them. Skinner declares that it is impossible for Washington to do this because the exchange of naval prisoners is under the direction of the secretary of war, also because the Americans have not enough British naval prisoners and the exchange of soldiers for seamen is contrary to the original agreement which specified that officers should be exchanged for officers, soldiers for soldiers, citizens for citizens, and seamen for seamen (see Mass. Hist. Soc. Proc., 1866-67, p. 334). He adds that Abore and Bowen (see Je 5 and 11) "appeared to be sensible of the force of those reasons, however repugnant they might be to the feelings and wishes of the nation who had destruction and death staring them in the face," and that if better accommodations were not provided, Washington would retaliate "by confining the land prisoners with as much severity as our seamen were held."

Sproat answered this letter by recapitulating the British position, by referring to the declaration of June 23 (q. v.) by American shipmasters concerning the favourable condition of American naval prisoners, by again offering to exchange the American seamen for British soldiers, and by attacking the treatment accorded to British prisoners in Philadelphia and Boston. These letters, together with those referred to under June 5 (q. v.), were published at Sproat's request in the Royal Gaz., Jl 3, 1782. See also Greene, Recollections of the Jersey Prison-ships, from MSS. of Capt. Thomas Dring (ed. by David Banks), 147-55.

The financial statement of the New York Theatre, covering the general account of receipts and disbursements for the last two seasons, and showing the balance in hand at this date, is published as a broadside. It is taken from the books of the theatre, in the possession of the treasurer, and is shown to enable persons, until Aug. 31, to present any outstanding demands against the theatre, after which the surplus will be given to charity. It is signed by four managers. It shows gifts of £49150, and of £827716, in the two seasons respectively, to the widows and children of 35 military and naval organizations, to refugees, and to inhabitants of New York and vicinity. The receipts include large donations from the government and the several British generals in the city. There were ca. at the doors of the theatre, in the two seasons, £4,38017.6 and £33517.8 respectively.—From original broadsides, in N. Y. P. L.

He is anxious to hear from England & fearful that the Ministry may strike Hands with the Congress Agents in Europe under too high an Estimate of their Power here. If this is true Sir G [Carleton] will not object...”—Virm.—We are all impatient for the arrival of the Commissioners that the whole Work may proceed upon American Ground: I intimated to the Com: Gen1 as I have to Sir Guy Carleton that I thought the Congress already in the Project of preparing the People for a Reunion & looking to the Crown for Favor to themselves. I shewed him at the same time that it would be the Ruin of them if this Country were to have too long abstained from holding general Esteem in it.”—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

A man who left New York in the beginning of August reported on his arrival in London that "he saw and conversed with the Deputies from the New England Colonies, that were then at New York with Sir Guy Carleton, to know what terms had been proposed by this Country [Great Britain] to Congress, and what terms the Colonies were disposed to publish Embassies. Adhering to the Congress in withstanding the Congress laws subsisting to the Southward of New York, to prevent all communication between them and the King's garrison, there was an uninterrupted intercourse between New York and the Colonies to the Eastward; that vessels had gone out loaded with British goods into Connecticut, one of which had to the amount of 1500 l. others of less value; and a vast number of horses loaded with every species of goods, that was portable by such conveyances, went out of the line into the country.”—London Chron., S 14-17, 1782.

An elaborate ceremony takes place in New York on this day when Prince William Henry delivers to the "King’s American dragoons" the standards of their regiment. It is thus described in a letter dated Aug. 17, 1782: "The regiment formed on very advantageous ground in front of their encampment, with two pieces of light artillery on their right. About 60 yards in front of the regiment a canopy was erected 20 feet in height, supported by 10 pillars; on the east side of which was a semicircular bower for the accommodation of the spectators. The standards were planted under the canopy on the right and left of the center pillar. At one o’clock his Royal Highness Prince William Henry, with his Excellency Admiral Digby, General Birch, and many other Officers of distinction, came on the ground at the right of the regiment, and having passed along both in front and rear of the line, receiving the usual salute, trumpets sounding, and music playing ‘God save the King!’ posted themselves in the canopy, when all the officers of the regiment saluted together. The regiment then formed into half troops... and the whole passed in review before the canopy, performing the usual marching salutes. After having returned to their ground they dismounted and formed as a battalion, and then marched in close order, and formed a semicircle in front of the canopy. Their Chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Odell, advanced and delivered a pointed and elegant Address calculated for this purpose; after which the whole regiment, officers and men kneeling, laid their helmets and their arms upon the ground, held up their right hands, and took a most solemn oath of allegiance to their Sovereign, and fidelity and attachment to their standard, the whole repeating the oath together. This being finished, the Chaplain pronounced a solemn benediction, the regiment still kneeling. The regiment then returned to their ground, and again formed as a battalion, with their artillery on their right, and fired a royal salute; being again mounted, the whole saluted the standard together, and again marched by the canopy saluting the standards as they passed.

As soon as the consecrating and saluting the standards was over, the regiment formed, his Royal Highness Prince William Henry, attended by Admiral Digby and Gen. Birch, and followed by the Hon. Lieutenant-colonel Fox and Lieutenant-colonel Small (bearing the standards), came forward to the centre of the regiment, where his Royal Highness, receiving the standards from his Excellency Admiral Digby, presented them with his own hand to Lieutenant-colonel Thompson, who delivered them to his eldest Cornet; upon a signal given the whole regiment, with all the numerous spectators, gave three shouts. After this followed the music played ‘God save the King!’ the artillery fired a royal salute, and the ceremony was concluded.”—London Chron., O 5-9, 1782.

obstacles to that Peace which he so ardently wishes to restore, has commanded his Ministers to direct Mr. Grenville, that the Independence of the Thirteen Provinces should be proposed by him, in the first instance, instead of making it a condition of a general treaty, however, not without the highest confidence, that the Loyalists shall be restored to their possessions, or a full compensation made them for whatever confiscations may have taken place

Transports, they state, have been prepared to convey American prisoners to this country, to be exchanged here. They urge, "by every consideration of humanity, the most speedy exchange." A proposal has been made that the British soldiers, so exchanged, shall not serve in or against the Thirteen Provinces for one year.

requested to appoint delegates to meet at Rousble's Tavern on Aug. 9, to consider this communication and adopt suitable measures.—Ibid. Commenting on the news, Smith writes that it is "Evidence of great internal Deity—or of Menaces from other European Powers.

were printed in the Royal Gazette, July 17 (p.7). His diary discloses that Smith wrote these "observations."

A letter written from New York contains the following: "The climate of this place with the country is so agreeable, &c. from Philadelphia, Boston, and all the northern provinces, are admitted without flags of truce to come in and purchase goods, &c. without molestation. The troops are encamped between King's armies remain quiet, and [there is] no appearance of hostilities."

One "Captain Rover" publishes the following letter, dated at Boston, Aug. 5, and addressed to "Mr. Printer:"

"Happening to be at Mr. Bracket's tavern last Saturday, and taking two gentlemen conversing on the surprising alteration in regard to the treatment our prisoners met with in New-York, and as I have had the misfortune to be more than once a prisoner in England, and in different prison ships in New-York, and having suffered everything but death, I cannot help expressing some sympathy for our brave seamen met with on board the prison ships in New-York. One of the gentlemen observed that the treatment to our prisoners must certainly be much better, as so many of our Commanders had signed a paper [see Jr 22] that was wrote by Mr. David Sproat, the Commissary of naval prison ship in New-York. The other gentleman answered, and told him he could satisfy him in regard to that matter, having seen and conversed with several of the Captains that signed Mr. Sproat's paper, who told him that aloth they had put their hands to the paper, that Mr. Sproat sent them on Long Island, where they were upon parole, yet it was upon these conditions they did it, in order to have leave to go home to their wives and families. The other gentleman asked him if he had the information of the proposition to admit their Independence, creates as much disgust to them, as it does in the Loyalists, who always thought this imaginary blessing, the heaviest curse that could befall this country.—The objections that arise, are as various though one might have imagined, that nothing could have given more joy to the Party of Independents in the different Colonies, than the consent of Great-Britain to their having, as they stile it, a Name among the Nations, yet the truth is, that the late intelligence of the proposition to admit their Independence, creates as much disgust to them, as it does in the Loyalists, who always thought this imaginary blessing, the heaviest curse that could befall this country.—The objections that arise, are as various 1782 as their apprehensions of its effects upon their interests and Aug. views.

17 Some of the reasons given are: "The American soldier perceives it would be impossible, even with a more extensive dominion, to raise the immense sums requisite to satisfy the Loyalists..."

"Others are alarmed at the demands that are to follow for the debts to the French Governors and Merchants, as well as to other nations..."

"The American soldier perceives the vanity of the promises of the past arrests of pay, and of the land premiums they have been led to expect, in the luxury of Eberty beyond the Blue Mountains."

"The Congressional creditors are in pain both for their interest and principal..."

"Still less do the herd of purchasers of confiscated estates see ground to hope for an indemnity, to restore what they are to give up as a general tax..."

"The merchants too are under the keenest anxieties, as they have no kind of a claim upon the community at large for what they owe abroad..."

"Perhaps no class of men feel greater apprehensions than those who have been the chief instruments in gulling on their countrymen to contend for this phantom [of Independence], the clearest evidence of the general aversion to their quadram [sic] and ruinous policies, by the refusal of all the provinces but three, to contribute to the monstrous taxes they have imposed for the protraction of the war."—Royal Gaz., Ag 17, 1782.

22 Probably the most complete records of court martial proceedings during the British occupation of New York are those for the trial of Col. Cosmo Gordon, of the Third Regt. of Foot Guards, who was charged with neglect of duty before the enemy on June 21, 1780, near Springfield, N. J. Beginning on this day, in New York, the trial continued until Sept. 24. The proceedings were published in London in this year.—See Bibliotheca Americana (Cat. of the John Carter Brown Library), item No. 2866.

In this month, The New-York Evening Post, a tri-weekly newspaper, was established. The date is determined from that of the only issue located, that of Mar. 21, 1783, which is No. 86 of Vol. II. This was a paper of qarto size, published by the firm of "Sower, Morton, and Horner," consisting of Christopher Sower, Jr., William Morton, and Samuel Horner. It is in the archives of the N. Y. H. S.—Brigham, in A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 410. See, further, Ap, 1783.

4 Lieut. Von Kraph, on a "Work command," states that "Men were sent out to dig wells," but "could not find anything but the faintest and poorest springs, even at a depth of 90 and 40 feet." All "the wells and ditches round about were dried up."—Von Kraph's Jour., 1783.

10 In a letter to ex-Gov. Tryon, William Smith expresses the opinion that it is still not too late for England to effect a reconciliation with the colonies. If the ministry will "send authority to drive the Compact here, and discontinue the Negotiations at Paris, your American Affairs are still recoverable, and I flatter myself now they are rid of the madmen of the Rockingham Heresy that all will still go well... New York is now moving Congress to amend the Confederation—This I think imports much good & [we] shall soon know what is meant by those who would gladly be 10 Against the Peers."—Sept. 10.

Writing to a friend in England, a New Yorker says: "The refugees have abandoned their post at Bergen Point; many of them, perhaps all, are going to Halifax, where lands, according to their merits, are to be assigned them. The army here is encamped in two lines across the island; one at Macgowan's Pass, nine miles off. Col. Robinson's Corps and some Hessians have charge of the city. I suppose the march of the French troops from the southward to this neighbourhood, has occasioned these movements."—London Chron., O 29-31, 1782.

A British officer on board the "Prince George" man-of-war writes from New York to a friend in Edinburgh: "Every necessary here is beyond imagination dear; beef and mutton from 2 s. to 2 s. 6 d., and some under a General or Commissary can get a fowl for 3s. 1 yesterday gave three dollars for a pair of shoes. The political situation of things here, by the enquiries I have made, has continued much the same as after the unfortunate affair of Cornwalls.

"The Prince went to sea in the Warwick the day before we arrived off the hook. Admiral Digby's cruisers have been very successful."

An officer in Admiral Pigot's fleet writes from "off Sandy Hook": "We arrived off here on the 4th instant all well, and were immediately joined by the Warrior and Invincible, who, after undergoing their repairs pushed after us, from Jamaica... Our fleet at present consists of 26 sail of the line, 1 fifty, and 7 frigates... We have shifted our station, 13 sail of us being now moored at Staten Island, and in the evening the fleet lies abreast of New York. We find great plenty of provisions, and are abundantly supplied with fresh beef twice a week. Vegetables are scarce, owing to the dryness of the season, which is universally complained of on this coast. We found 8000 British troops encamped at King's Bridge, and about 4000 in different small encampments round New York. The Rebel army, under Washington, are at the White Plains, and have lately been joined by a considerable body of French troops."—London Chron., O 22-24, 1782.

Another letter from New York states: "Savannah is abandoned; Charlestown will share the same fate in a very short time; and we suspect this place will scarcely remain in our possession this winter.

"There has been a disorder here similar to your influence; few families have escaped it."—London Chron., O 26-29, 1782.

Carleton left town this morning, says Smith, & went into 15 Westchester County with 3000 Men & brought in before Night near 1000 Loads of Forage. He was doubtless apprehensive that it would be carried off by Washington as soon as joined by Rochambeau who is at last [he now] about crossing at King's Ferry. Washington at Verplanck Points with all his Forces—He will probably go out again for more."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

A horse-race is announced for this day "at Mr. George Mason's, at the end of Harlem Lane," the prize a "very neat Saddle and Bridle."—N. Y. Merc., S 28, 1782. The next month, a similar prize was offered to the winner of a race to be held Oct. 2, "at the Bully's Head Tavern, Bowery."—Ibid., S 20, 1782. This custom of racing on the public roads was deemed very dangerous, and on Ag 30, 1783 (p. v), the sport was interdicted.
1782 Oct. Capt. Alexander Coffin, Jr., an American naval officer, captured by the British, wrote later an account of his experiences on the "Jersey" prison-ship, which was in part as follows: "... We arrived about the beginning of October at New-York, and were immediately taken on board the prison-ship. It was a small vessel, called, ironically enough, the Relief, commanded by one Gardner, an Irishman. This schooner Relief plied between the prison-ship and New-York, and carried the water and provisions from the city to the ship. In fact, the said schooner might emphatically be termed the Relief, for the executable water and provisions she carried relieved many of my brave but unfortunate countrymen by death, from the wounds and savage treatment at which they were subjected. Before I go on to relate the treatment we experienced on board the Jersey, I will make one remark, and that is, that if you were to rake the infernal regions, I doubt whether you could find such another set of D.EMONS as the officers and men who had charge of the old Jersey prison-ship. ... On my arrival on board the old Jersey, I found there about eleven hundred prisoners; many of them had been there from three to six months, but few lived over that time if they did not get away by some means or other. They were generally in the most deplorable situation, mere walking skeletons, without money, and scarcely clothes to cover their nakedness, and overrun with lice from head to foot. The provisions, Sir, that were served out to us was not more than four or five ounces of meal per day, and we would be satisfied. It was a small portion, and the prisoners from their ships of war, which no doubt were supplied with crew in their stead, and the new in all probability charged by the commissions to the Jersey. They, however, know best about that; and however secure they may now feel, they will have to render an account of that business to a Judge who cannot be deceived. This fact, however, I can safely aver, that both the times that I was confined on board the prison-ship, there never were provisions served out to the prisoners that would have been eatable by men that were not literally in a starving situation. The water that we were forced to use was carried from this city; and I positively assert, that I never, after having followed the sea thirty years, had on board any ship, (and I have been three years on some of my voyages) water so bad as that we were obliged to use on board the old Jersey; and there was, as it were, to tansalize us, as fine water, not more than three cables' length from us, at the mill in the Wallabout, as was perhaps ever drank. "There were hogs kept in pens on the gun-deck by the officers of the prison-ship for their own use; and I have seen the prisoners watch an opportunity, and with a tin pot steal the bran from the hogs' trough, and go into the galley, and when they could get an opportunity, beg some of the enjoyment of persons who had the good soup when hungry. This I have seen more than once, and there are those now living beside me who can bear testimony to the same fact. ... I reflect how many hundreds of my brave and intrepid brother seamen and countrymen I have seen in all the bloom of health, brought on board of that ship, and in a few days numbered with the dead, in consequence of the savage treatment they there received; ..." "In early March, 1783, again a captive, Capt. Coffin was once more confined on the "Jersey," where, he says, the greater number of his former fellow-prisoners "had taken up their abode under the surface of that hill ..., where their bones are mouldering to dust. ..." The "Jersey" being crowded, he was transferred with other prisoners to the "John," which was a transport of about 300 tons. "There we were treated worse, if possible, than on board the Jersey; and our accommodations were infinitely worse, for the Jersey being an old condemned sixty-four gun ship, had two tiers of ports fore and aft, and air ports and large hatches, which gave a pretty free circulation of air through the ship; whereas the John being a merchant ship, and with small hatchways, and no ports, and the hatches kept down every night, and no man allowed during the night to go on deck; ... was enough to destroy men of the most healthy and robust constitutions. All the time I was on board this ship not a prisoner eat his allowance, bad as it was, cooked, more than three or four times; but eat it raw as it came out of the barrel. ... Almost (and I think I may safely say) every morning a large boat from each of the hospital ships went loaded with dead bodies, which were all tumbled together into a hole dug for the purpose, on the hill where the national navy-yard now is; ..." -From The Destructive Operation of Foul Air, Tainted Provisions, Bad Water and Personal Filthiness upon Human Constitutions; exemplified in the unparalleled Cruelty of the British to the American Captives at New York during the Revolutionary War on Board their Prison and Hospital Ships, in a communication to Dr. Mitchill, dated September 4, 1807 (citing the Medical Repository, XII: 669-75). A Gentleman to the Tammamany Society upon the same subject, by Captain Alexander Coffin — A Gentleman Character in England that the "army is still encamped towards King's Bridge, and that of the Rebels and French near Crom-Pond. The latter does not exceed 8000 men, so that there is no danger of an attack on New-York. The Rebels are still up in the three middle colonies, who have paid more taxes than all the others, and the leaders are still very violent: ... The post at Lord's Neck is abandoned, and what is to be done with the wretched Refugees I know not; the door is shut against their return, and they have no hopes from Britain, where men, they think, are more inclined to their enemies than to them. The panic that we had on the first news, occasioned alarming desections in some of the provincial corps, but it is getting over, as those who deserted did not find the reception they expected, but the late removals we have had, (the battalions are now encamped at New-York,) will in part continue it. ... Admiral Pigot with his fleet is still here; the French at Boston; the Admiral has fortified the islands in the bay, with an appearance of fear of an attack, and the Brigadiers of militia are ordered to have the militia in readiness. Shays has set out to bring off the garrison of Charlestown, a second division follows in a day or two; an evacuation of New-York is expected, and many are preparing accordingly." — London Chron., N 16-19, 1782. "To day the Prince [William Henry], the Admiral [Digby] and all the Generals reviewed the whole army which was in camp drawn up in three lines of battle, in the neighborhood of Harlem." — Von Krafft's jour., 169. The first convoy of Loyalists sails from New York for Nova-Scotia. It consists of "a fleet of transports, having on board a number of Loyalists with their families, amounting to all but to 600 persons." Previous to embarking, "they were supplied from the King's stores with provisions of all species, sufficient for their support for a full year, besides an allowance of 21 days rations for their passage; they were also furnished at the expense of Government with comfortable clothing for men, women, and children, with a proper assortment of medicines, various kinds of husbandly tools and arms and ammunition for hunting and defence. They are to have liberal grants of lands in that province, surveyed and laid out for them at the public cost of such of these Loyalists as were in the American army; grants of innumerable allowances from government, received also a full year's pay in advance. They are mostly Farmers who have been driven from their dwellings and possessions by the enemies of Gt. Britain, and having families to support and seeing no prospect of a speedy peace, petitioned to be allowed a settlement in Nova Scotia." — Royal Gaz., O 19, 1782; Winsor, VII: 199. The entire company of refugees in America was concentrated in New York, by the gradual reduction of the number of British posts. See the chapter on "Expropriation," in Van Tyne's The Loyalists (1902), 286. Col. John Roberts, lately sheriff of New York, is allowed £50, "in lieu of rent of houses used as goals for rebel prisoners," from July 1 to Sept. 30.—Report on Am. MBS. in Royal Inst. of Gt. "A great number of refugee families are preparing to leave New-York; and the best informed gentlemen on the lines assure us, that great preparations are making, which they suppose for a general evacuation.—David Mathews, the mayor, and several other active loyalists, have taken vessels for the transportation of themselves and families." — N. A British officer writes from New York to a friend in Cork: "The Congress have treated the offers of Independence, made to them Oct. by Great Britain, with the utmost contempt. . . . The offer of 24 Independence has not been of the smallest interest; on the contrary, it has been of much mischief. It has made the rebels very 26 violent.

"The hard money tax has been collected with more ease than it otherwise would; indeed it appeared that the rebels could not have collected one-sixth part of the stipulated sum, had it not been for the unfortunate offer of Independence. Every thing seemed to be at a stand with them, and I am fully convinced, that if nothing was done by us, except that we held New York and Charles- town, and ruined their commerce, in a very little time they would wish for peace; while whilst Independence is agitation, and evacu-ation talked of, it is no wonder they are in high spirits."—London Chron., 4-7, 1783.

The following letter is written by a privateer officer imprisoned on the “Jersey”: “The deplorable situation I am in cannot be 9 expressed. A young Irishman, recently arrived in New York in a cargo 11 brig from Cork, records in his journal: that, “being a Presbyterian,” he “enquired for a meeting House, but was informed there was none, that Profession being as much distrusted as possible since the Commencement of the War.” He comments on this: “Is it not terrible to think that English Subjects on this side the Atlantic cannot enjoy that Liberty of wch they boast so much on the other, but are depending on the Capricious tempers of governors—who deprive them even of the exercise of their religion. . . .”—From the original MS., printed in N. A fleet of “twenty-three sail of victuallers and transports” armed with six guns. They had sailed from Quebec on Oct. 10. 11 “under convoy of his Majesty’s ships Albermarle of 28 guns, Horatio Nelson, Esq. [later Lord Nelson] commander, and the Pandora, of 24 guns, . . .”—Royal G., N 13, 1782. Nelson was at this time a captain, 24 years of age.

In a private letter, written on board the “Albermarle” on Nov. 13, he told of meeting Prince Wil Henry in these words: “I had the honour of an introduction to the Prince on board the Barfleur by my Lord Hood, was much pleased with him he will make a good sailor or I am much mistaken we shall be proud of him.”—From facsimile in Man. Com. Coun. (1800), 873; N. Y. Genealog. and Bic. Rec. (1871), II: 35.

In later years, the prince described this interview which had left a vivid impression upon him. He said: “I was then a mid-shipman on board the Barfleur lying in the narrows off Staten Island, and had the watch on deck; when Captain Nelson of the Albermarle came in his barge alongside. He appeared to be the merest boy of a captain I ever beheld, and his dress was worthy of attention. He had on a full-faced uniform, his b lack unpowdered hair was tied in a stiff Hessian tail of extraordinary length: the old-fashioned flaps of his waistcoat, and his red and white collar of his figure, produced an appearance which particularly attracted my notice, for I had never seen anything like it before, nor could I imagine who he was, nor what he came about. My doubts were, however, removed, when Lord Hood introduced me to him. There was something irresistibly pleasing in his address and conversation; and an enthusiasm, when speaking on professional subjects, that 11 shewed he was no common being.”—Water s, Life and Times of Nov. William the Fourth (1851), 16. The Creators of Mr. Charles Loosley, are requested by the Trustees, to meet this Evening, at Six o’Clock, at the Widow Todd’s Tavern, near the Ferry-Stairs. —Royal G., N 16, 1782. Loosley had taken over the tavern at the Brooklyn Ferry in 1779 (q. v., My 7). His house furnishings were sold for the benefit of creditors on N 26 (q.v.).

An advertisement announces the auction sale of Loosley’s 26 effects. The list of goods reveals somewhat the character of the furnishings of a high-class tavern of the period. His furniture and effects include: “all the genuine Household Furniture, consisting of Mahogany and other Bedsteads, Feather Beds and Mattresses, Chintz and other Curtains, Blankets, Sheets, &c. Mahogany Drawers, Dining, Tea, and Card Tables; an elegant Clock in a Mahogany Case; a curious Collection of well chosen Paintings and Pictures; a large Pier and other Looking Glasses, in gilt and plain Frames; Table and Tea Sets of China, Plate, &c. A capital well toned Organ, made by one of the first Hands in London. A Billiard Table, lately put in thorough Repair. Near twenty Globe Lamps, fit for Hall or Passage. A large quantity of Damask and other Table Linen. Kitchen Necessaries of all Kinds. Waggon, Horses, Carts, &c. Tenements adjoining the House. Provisional articles “for treating of peace” between Great 30 Britain and the United States are agreed upon and signed in Paris by Richard Oswald, the British commissioner, and John Adams, B. Franklin, John Jay, and Henry Laurens, four of the commis- sioners of the United States. These articles are “to be inserted in, and to constitute the Treaty of Peace, proposed to be concluded, . . . but which Treaty is not to be concluded, until terms of a Peace shall be agreed upon between Great-Britain and France; and his Britannic Majesty shall be ready to conclude such Treaty accordingly.”—Published with the Acts Passed at the Second Session of the Congress (1790), 101-84. See also an address delivered before the N. Y. H. S., on Nov. 27, 1834, by John Jay, on The Peace Negotiations of 1782 and 1783, pub. by the society, 1834; and Winson, VIII: 87, 144; VIII: 414, 455. The announcement of this event, which later culminated in the signing of preliminaries to a general peace on Jan. 20, 1783, was made in New York on March 25, 1783 (q. v.). For the Definitive Treaty, see 3.

Joseph Stevens, a livery-stable keeper, advertises that he has provided a four-horse carriage to make regular trips from his house, No. 16 Broadway, near Fort George, to Fort Knox and return.—Royal G., D 4. 1782.

In a speech to parliament, King George says: “I have pointed all my views and measures, as well in Europe as in North America, to an entire and cordial reconciliation with those Colonies.

“Finding it indispensable to the attainment of this object, I did not hesitate to go the full length of the powers vested in me, and ordered to declare the independence of the United States, to take effect whenever terms of peace shall be finally settled with the Court of France.

“In thus admitting their separation from the Crown of these kingdoms, I have sacrificed every consideration of my own to the wishes and opinion of my people . . . Religion, language, in- terest, affection and friendship, and I hope will at once prove a bond of per-manent union between the two countries: To this end, neither attention nor disposition shall be wanting on my part . . .

“Having manifested to the whole world, by the most lasting examples, the signal spirit and bravery of my people, I conceived it a moment not unbecoming my dignity, and thought it a regard to the lives and fortunes of such brave and gallant subjects to show myself to the public an example of fair and honourable terms of accommodation with all the powers at war.

“I have the satisfaction to acquaint you, that negotiations to this effect are considerably advanced, the result of which, as soon as they are brought to a conclusion, shall be immediately communi- cated to you.”—N. Y. Merc., F 17, 1783. See F 25, 1783.

Carleton informs me, says Smith, that he has “written for Leave 1782 to come Home & that he expected it by the next Packet.—I told him with Emotion that then the Business of America was up & every Man would as soon as this was known look to himself. That the Whigs would impute his Resignation to a Discord between his Liberty & the Designs of the Government & believe the worst of the latter as they did the best of him & his Intentions. He then allowed the Government Ministers had planned his Plan & sought others which he believed had been treated with deserved Contempt.—That he did not want the Profits of his Place & he could [not] pursue Measures he did not approve. . . .

He said he was importuned from all Quarters to know what he had to offer to America—and felt himself very unhappy to be able to give no Answer to the Expectations of the People.

He complained at the same Time of the Restraints upon his Arms tho' he wished he said not to use them nor thought any Thing more was necessary than to have it known that he was not restrained to give Success to proper Overtures.

He agreed with me that as no Accident had weakened our Navy the Disposition of America became daily more favorable to negotiations & would continue while we maintained a Naval Superiority.—I remarked that this proved no Time had elapsed to our Detriment and that the news we had this Day of the Repulse of the Enemy & the Relief of Gibraltar, were Grounds for high Confidence had he his expected and requisite Powers.

"I believe on the whole that his Request of Leave to resign is a Strong Argument to serve Lord Stormont in the Cabinet & please the King, as well as to exalt his own Character. He seems pleased at all my Fears of the Event of his Departure and as I rose to leave him beg'd me to take Reference of Compilations for the Non Restitution of Property and said he would support my Opinions & Reports."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

"A Fleet of 80 or 90 Sails leaves the Hook for England. It is probable that Vandereul’s Fleet are gone or about to Sail from Boston & many have anxieties for our. It is strange that they have been here so long. It is intended to Digby’s Desire to employ the Men of War on the Coast.—We are also uneasy for a Fleet expected from Charles Town—Vandereul may think fit to visit that Coast. By the Boston Papers the French Army came on to Boston about 3rd Instant to embark."—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

Carleton tells Smith "he has not his expected Powers—that they do not consent to his Absence—will wait his Reconsideration. Does not seem to like the Implication of Rashness & the Possibility of Changing his Mind.—I express’d my Hope that before his Letter now gone arrived, he would have his wishes gratified by competent Authorities.—He replied they were promised, but he doubted the Fulfilment, because they were now to continue long since. This led me to observe that Lord Sheffield was unimpressed by his Engagements when in Opposition and then to shew that tho' accidents might have happened to render the Detention of the Powers censurable, yet that nothing was lost but matters mended by the 12 April & Relief of Gibraltar. He spoke ag’ the Negotiations at Paris, and I replied that they gained Time & this gave Place to the abatement of the Frenzy of Party. He censured the Mutability of Temper in England, express’d astonishment that the Rockingham’s should be popular for backing the Independency, & now be ruined for contending for what the People then approved."

"The Masonic Lodge, No. 210, has its quarters "at Brother Kiff’s Tavern, in the Fields." (See O 22, 1784).—Royal Gaz., D 25, 1782.

27 John Delafons, "Agent Victualler," publishes the following: "Notice is hereby given, to any Person or Persons, inclinable to enter into a Contract for supplying Fresh Beef to his Majesty’s Ships at this Port, to send in their Proposals to me, in Writing, sealed, on or before the 15th of January next, on board the Cen- tury Victualler, at Halley’s Wharf, or at No. 217, Water-Street."—Royal Gaz., Jan. 1, 1785; De Voe, Market-Bk, 1781.

28 In this year, Pelatiah Webster wrote and published a tract entitled A Dissertation on the Political Union and Constitution of the Thirteen United States, which the Provincials had composed by a Citizen of Philadelphia, in which he proposed that the federal government have a congress of two houses, a federal judiciary, and heads of departments. This having started discussion, Noah Webster, in 1785, wrote and published Sketches of American Policy, to express the need of a stronger government.

A manuscript judgment-roll, consisting of the names of loyalists, arranged alphabetically, against whom judgments have been found under the Confiscation Act (see O 24, 1779), shows their names, addresses, occupations, dates when indictments were found, and dates when judgments were given (most dates are 1783). This roll occupies the latter half of a thin folio ledger (MS.), the first half of which consists of naturalization statistics (1740–1769), and a list of immigrants (1802–1814). It is preserved in N. Y. P. L. (MSS. Div.).

The following description of the eastern shore of Manhattan Island, from Corlaser’s Hook to Kipps’ Bay, as it was in 1783, was published in 1835 and signed "Joshua."—

"At the point of Corlaser’s Hook were the ruins of an old house, and the remains of a fortification thrown up by the Americans in 1776; to the northward of the point were the houses of Abraham Cannon, of Caspar Miller, and a Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Cannon kept a tavern, and ferry boats to carry passengers over to Bushwick. The houses above mentioned were the only dwellings which stood near the river, between Corlaser’s Hook and the house of Mr. Kipp at Kipp’s bay. The house of Mr. Kipp was dreadfully shattered by cannon balls when the British landed at that place. Between Corlaser’s Hook and Brande Molen Point, lay a small island. The flat itself contained about two acres of land, which on the easterly side had an elevation of about fifteen feet. Between Corlaser’s Hook, the Island, and the Point, lay the meadow called Stuyvesant’s Meadow. From the Point northwesternly, the land gradually descended to a hard shore, which connected the Point with the Stuyvesant Farm. On the bluff of the Point were the remains of a small breastwork, also thrown up in 1776. Two heavy pieces of ordnance, from this point, booted the Rose frigate (Captain Wal- lace) with seventeen balls in eighteen discharges. The ship would have been sunk if the darkness had not saved her; she was removed in the night. . . ."

"Between Corlaser’s Hook and Brande Molen Point, lay the Corlaser’s Hook Fishery. The fishermen erected their shanties on the small Island before noticed. A flat lay between the Hook and Point, whereon the scines were drawn.

"On the north-easterly side of Brande Molen Point, lay Stuy- vesant’s Fishery, in the cove bearing the owner’s name. From the Point towards the Cove, the bottom and shore was hard, with a few rocks for about two hundred yards then began an extensive mud flat, which continued beyond the Stuyvesant Farm."—N. Y. Gaz. Gen. Ado. 10, 1835. For further description by "Joshua," see 1783.

The street commissioner’s report of Feb. 6, 1809, to the common council, respecting the high-water mark on the Hudson River from the Battery to the State Prison (see L. M. R. K., III: 973) states that "A map in the possession of Trinity Church made in or about the year 1785, . . . pretty distinctly delineates the line of high water along the property of Trinity Church from Partition [Fulton] Street to the extremity of Anthony Lispenard’s possessions."—M. C. C. (MS.), XIX: 395.

At this time, the mansion of the Philippines, on the corner of King (Pine) and Smith Sts, was kept as a lodging-house. Later it became the Bank Coffee House, under the famous host, William Niles (1784).—Duer, N. Y. : as it was during the latter part of the last century, 9–10.

St. Jean de Crèvecoeur writes from Caen to Benjamin Franklin: "I have been withness whilst I was in America of a Circumstance which I think, it imports Your Excellency to Know; my Good Intention will I hope, apologize for the Liberty I am taking, if your Excellency is acquainted With it; if unknown, it is Certainly my duty as a good Citizen of that Country to Inform you of what Follows—"

The General does a very popular Act in ordering 35 Suits of Cloathing for the Naked Prisoners—Upham when [went] upon the Business yesterday & they were in an Extasy at the Relief. Many of these are Naval Prisoners who wish'd themselves under the Genl & not confined to theyard. He says he shall think all that Summits of his Care—This is adopting what we in our Report suggested as his Intention—viz that there should be no Misery in the House which Justice and the public Safety did not require.

"The Dinner to Day is another popular Act—I found there several Connecticut Refugees & several more just come in to drive Schemes of Commerce and among them a Pierpoint Edwards who has been a popular Leader—He is a New Haven Lawyer—Son of the celebrated Minister of Northampton—married Robert Ogden's Daughter of Elizabeth Town—They will sing Sir G's [Carleton's] Fame thro' Connecticut on their Return."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"This is the date of the first of three monthly lists, published by Valentine, signed by William Cunningham, "Captain and Provost Marshal" at New York, showing the names, birthplaces, residences, crimes, and dates of confinement of prisoners in the provost. The names are divided into "Civil Prisoners," "Naval Prisoners of War," and "Land Prisoners of War," and following each list are annotations, showing the number of prisoners released since the last return, casualties (some being recorded), and newspaper extracts celebrating them. The list is designated by Valentine's name and the reference to the Crown. Among these extracts is that regarding John Paulding, one of the captors of Major Andre, who was himself captured in the attempted kidnapping of Col. De Lancy on Jan. 25 (see Royal Gaz., Jan 29, 1783).—Man. Com. Curr. (1888), 906-11.

"A House to be let, on Whitehall Dock, the sign of Lord Hood; and another in Little Dock street, No. 5, known by the name of the London Tavern.—Enquire of Patrick Blancheville, at No. 1783, Water-street, near Burlington's slip."—N. T. Merc., F 3, 1783.

The large and commodious tavern, No. 110, Water-street (see Jl 1, 1783), which has been run by John Cochran, is offered to let on May 1. The advantages of the house are numerous, "having long been used and resorted to as a public house," while the water from a pump in the yard is considered superior to the common tea water.—N. T. Merc., F 3, 1783.

"It is matter of Joy to some to find Sir G Carleton constituting Courts Martial for the Trial of Citizens, after the great Reluctance he has expressed to this Measure. . . .

"French as a Coyn & Both of America.—Carleton's Paper this Day—Does not leave to the Court as formerly Civil concerns and is meant to procure the Discharge of the Prisoners from the Stash of Cash Commitments & check the Police by exposing them when they are precipitate.

"The same Paper publishes the List of all Prisoners in the Provost agreeable to our advice.—The Adm't will not like it as to his Naval Prisoners—Sir G Carleton has distributed among the Naked there forty odd Suits of Cloaths, which they rejoice at with much Gratitude."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

"The king issues at St. James's a proclamation, declaring the Cession of Arms, as well by Sea as Land, agreed upon between his Majesty, the Most Christian King, the King of Spain, the States General of the United Provinces, and the United States of America; and orders, and old them to take effect, on Monday Evening [the 15th] that he expected to return to England on the arrival of another Mail. He is plainly displeased at the Want of the promised Powers & grows more so as he perceives the Probability of his Success in the Use of it—I ventured to Suggest that the present ministry had committed themselves to him—that if they did not secure the Reunion he could ruin them by disclosing that it had been in his Power—he said if they effected it he should content himself."—Wm. Preliminary articles of peace between Great Britain and France and Great Britain and Spain are signed at Versailles by representatives of the three nations.—London Chron., Ja 28-30, 1783. See N 30, 1782; also Winson, VII: 87, 138. The preliminary treaty, however, does not affect the relations between the United States and Great Britain while the war continues between England and France.—Tbid, VII: 155.

1783. Military Party; 18 Months after the said Samuel Bayard, Contrary to ye oath he had Taken to ye Convention, found Means of Sending Three false Records which obtained the Grant of 3400. to Govr Tryon then on board the Dutches of Gordon; Since then, that they have been Conveyed to the Tower of London, where they now are; those papers, fortunately become useless to G. Britain, at the return of the Peace, must be of the Greatest Consequence to that State, because, as you well Know, they Contain not only the Title of Lands but the Copy of Wills also—that occur, Letters will be provided every day at 3 o'clock precisely."—N. Gov. Robertson issues a proclamation appointing Jan. 25 as a day of thanksgiving. In it he says: "It hath graciously pleased Almighty God to bestow signal Victories on his Majesty's Arms, and to defeat the united efforts of combined nations, whose powers, even when separate, have been formidable to all Europe." He recommends that prayers he offered "that these events may not only prove advantageous to our nation, but conducive to the Peace and Happiness of mankind. . . ."—N. T. Merc., Ja 20, 1783. Feb. 12. The Congress is in his Deft for Naval Prisoners about 4000—that 10000 Came from England—He has paroled 1000 & put in the Prison Ships about a 1000. No argu'ms can persuade Morris Marine agent to exchange cloaths or substis them—They die here now 50 of a Week. A letter from the Courrier de l'Europe of Nov. 29, giving the articles of peace as settled in London, is published in New York. It contains an "acknowledgment of the independence of the thirteen United States." By a particular article between Great Britain and the United States, "liberty is given to the Loyalists to remain in America without molestation, or to dispose of their property if it has not already been confiscated."—N. T. Merc., F 17, 1783.

The following orders, signed "Ol. De Lancy, Adjuntant-Genral," are issued from "Head-Quarters, New-York:"

"Should there be any Persons, at present within the Lines, whose Houses or Lands have been witheld from them on Account of offences or supposed Offences against the Crown, they are desirous to make their respective Claims to the Offices of Police in New-York, on Long-Island or on Staten-Island, who will report to the same to the Commander in Chief.

"All Persons without the Lines, who have abandoned Estates within, are desired to send their Claims to the Offices of Police aforesaid, and all persons occupying Estates with the above Descriptions, are strictly enjoined to take due Care thereof, as they 1783. will be made answerable for any Damage, Waste, or Destruction, that may henceforward be committed on the same. They will likewise permit any Person authorized from either of the above-mentioned Offices, to visit the said Estates, and take Inventories of all Effects therein belonging."—N. Y. Merc., F 24, 1783;

Mr. C. Garnet, 1783, p. 277. In regard to this, Wm. Smith says:

"The Adjutant General Colo [D]aley [a]cally calls to show me a Change in the two orders for Restitution of Property [see F 15] and to know whether I object. He says he carried the first to General [R]obertson who suggested that the appointment of Ch. Justice Smyth and myself implied Censure upon the Police & that the Commander-in-Chief thought so himself. I replied that my Consent was to oblige the General & the Release could not but be a great Relief to me from a great deal of Trouble

"Both orders I find are united in one and the Polices of N Y & Long Island are to report to the Commander in Chief. I am satisfied in escaping the Wrath of the Loyalists and shall nevertheless as consulted on the Reports and ultimately have power to prevent Injustice; But I don't believe Genl Robertson acteduate by the Motives that incline me to approve of this alteration in the Orders which Col [D] said if I had no Objections would he believe he out to Day in general orders."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

In consequence of this order, and another similar one on March 27, "many persons (who had been very active during the rebellion) were admitted within the British lines & in conformity to the new plan, which enabled them to make their Estates, take inventories & unmolested or insisted to return."

I sent Rivington to for Morrow's Gazette conjectures on the King's Speech (see D 5, 1782) which I showed yesterday to Mr Mealing and he wished to be thrown out [i.e., published] as instrumental to meet the Congressmen that go into a Distress of estate and a Temptation towards the Loyalties and to bear up the sinking Spirits of the latter, and reconcile them to the Whigg Leaders as engaged in promoting the Reunion—If it stimulates the public Creditors Washington's Army and the Holders of confiscated Estates to foresee in a Reunion the best Hope of Satisfaction & Safety the Effects will be friendly to the common interest."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. This extract from the diary reveals the authorship, hitherto unknown, of the column printed in heavy type in the last day's issue of the Royal Gazette. It reads as follows:

"To all that are not in the Secret of the Articles, agreed upon by the British Ministry, and the American Agents, the King's Speech to Parliament on the 5th of December last, or to speak more properly, what the Gazettes have given us for it, must be mysterious.

"The dismemberment of the Empire is depreciated, and yet an Independence offered to the Thirteen Colonies;—offered as the means to obtain an entire and cordial reconciliation—is a term of the pacification which the King trusts Parliament will see just cause to approve, and yet the grant nevertheless, his Majesty still holds out for a permanent between the two countries."

"How happy if the revelation of the mystery, shall offend none but the enemies whom it is perhaps for the common interest to find offended—the enemies both of Great-Britain and America! Eternal Glory to the contrivers! if the investiture of the Provinces with Independence for a moment, is the instrument of enabling them, as a contracting power, to settle fundamentals to reunite them for ever."

"Well do we recollect the day, when the wisest and best men of America, dreaded Great-Britain's abandonment of her Colonies as their utter destruction; and that too was the day of their most elevated prosperity and coolest reflection—and can it be less tragical for this event to befall her in the hour of her extreme poverty and complicated embarrassment and distress? Mistaken advocate for the fatal separation! think you that Felicity and Independence are two words for the same thing?—anticipate the possession of your wish—thirteen petty nations with jarring interests controlled by a majority that leaves real sovereignty to none, with power to oppress all of them! and at the same time, suppose Canada, Nova Scotia, and the two Floridas, to monopolize the fostering care of the Mother Country, once divided among all her Colonies, full handed as she is, to make them and such others as she may be induced to plant all along the Western Frontiers, the objects of your envy, and perhaps of your dread; and then condemn if you can, that plan of wisdom, which by the extinguishment of all animosities in America, shall restore even the authors of the general ruin to the confidence of their countrymen.

"Ambitious Delegates! will your thirst for office dare to sit in Congress at that perplexing Crisis, when the debt to France shall be exacted—when the army already Glamazon under misapplied tax-money, in courses of private commerce, shall insist upon millions more; and when the thousands of families that are ruined by the Paper Money Bubble, with the whole host of your other creditors, will compel you to the alternative of risking their resent- ment; or the more formidable vengeance of the rest of the Con- tent, all interested against your creditors, and neither able nor willing to be taxed any longer for their relief. May discordi- tives perduris misero! Merciful Heaven! Avert the scenes of horror in prospect—but where are the Funds adequate to the wants that must be satisfied, to prevent fellow-citizens from falling upon each other? Fortunate Americans! if your leaders have at last led you back to the only connection that can insire the redemption of your country, from such delages of misery, that what you have already experienced, may be pronounced to be as it were only the beginning of sorrows."—Royal Gaz., F 26, 1783. A New York letter contains the following: "A large quantity of shipping are preparing here, which rendezvous at the Hook, for the purpose of transporting his Majesty's garrison and effects to England; there are now 37 sail of large transports here for that pur- pose. How soon the business may commence, it is, however, impossible to say, as we do not hear that the negotiation with Con- gress goes on at all briskly. America has her old doubts and fears, a circumstance which causes many obstructions, besides being highly disagreeable to the persons engaged in the business."—London Chron., M 18-50, 1783. An item of Fishkill news reports that a number of "determined Whigs" have agreed that any Tory printer in New York who, after March 1, uses the term "rebel" in his paper ("in contradic- tion to the declaration of their king, in his late speech to the con- trary"), shall have his "ears cropt."—Penn. Packet, M 4, 1783. Several prizes are brought into port. One is a ship of 22 guns, another of 16 guns, etc.—Penn. Packet, M 5, 1783. The "Diary of the Mayor of the City of New York" says that "The soldiers have been lately employed in filling up and raising the grade in Trinity Churchyard, it having grown too shallow for the graves, whence injurious effects were apprehended..."—Penn. Mag., X: 444. New York State passes a law to permit people whose buildings have been destroyed by the enemy to secure timber for rebuilding from the forfeited estates.—Laws of N. Y., 6th sess., chap. 21 (printed by Holb, 1783). The Philadelphia Papers arrived this morning contain Robt. Morris's Resignation of the Office of Financier on the 24 Jan'y & 26 Feb last. It is a Confirmation of the Bankruptcy revealed in the Ann. of Congress to the Pennsylvania Memorials 50th Jan'y... If Morris's Letters of Resignation had been 4 or 5 days later than the last of the two I should have thought him stimulated by the Pubs. in Rivington's Gazette of 26 Feb'y—However that Publication must be seasonal in the Country at large and espe- cially in the Army—Nothing was known in Phila of this Resigna- tion till the 1 Ins.—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. Carleton is "inquisited for my Opinion," says Smith, "whether Washington had Hopes of setting himself up [as king]. I men- tioned it as Arnold's Suspicion but that I thought Mr Washington was very ignorant of this Country if he had any such Ideas of Royalty as Arnold supposed." Carleton is "in a growing Disapprobation of the Negotiations at Paris—He said firmly—America is the proper Ground—He added that he was in perfect Ignorance of what was doing on the other Side of the Water & assented to my Conjecture that Lord Shelburne could not but wish to connect [his] own Name with the glorious Event of restoring the Empire.—Sir G doubtless is desirous of that Honor for himself."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. Carleton discusses with me, says Smith, the idea of intimidating "beyond the Lines that he will receive the Rebel Army into his own." However, he suggests "no Particular Gratifications." He would "receive Washington to a College with a large Separation in their Standing, & give a Bounty as some Compensation for lost Pay, but not undertake the Discharge of Arrears."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII, under M 5 and 8.
A memorial, presented to Sir Guy Carleton by the commanding officers of 14 provincial regiments, is printed as a broadside. One 1783 of the sale was sold with the library of Henry F. De Puy, Esq. at The Anderson Galleries, New York, Nov. 18, 1919. In the same sale was a manuscript list of "His Majesty's Provincial Corps in N. America, from 1775 to 1783," dated June 12, 1783.

The legislature of the state passes an act "for granting a more effectual Relief in Cases of certain Treason passed upon any who are, or were inhabitants of this State, and who, by reason of the invasion of the enemy, left his, her, or their Place or Places of abode, and who have not voluntarily, put themselves respectively, into the power of the enemy, since they respectively left their places of abode, . . ., to bring an action of trespass against any person or persons who may have occupied, injured, or destroyed his, her, or their estate, either real or personal."

In a copy of Gaine's New-York Packet Almanack, For the Year 1783 (now in the N. Y. H. S.) is the following MS. memorandum of this date reading: "Packet Capt. Bolderson arrived with 3 Mails & Articles [of Peace] between Brit'n & America. N. B. much such a conclusion, I had long ago expected. great distress will be experienced by many—many thousands [and] faithful subjects, and I suspect no good eventually to this my native country. please God I will remain, whig & Rebel violence notwithstanding." A very comprehensive compilation of papers relating to the evacuation of the city by the British, commencing with this date (on the subject of "a general peace"), and ending Nov. 25, has been published (without, however, the citation of authorities) in the Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 722-944. Sir Guy Carleton receives letters via Philadelphia "importing that the Preliminaries of a general Peace were signed 21 Jan. to take Place in Europe 20 Feb" & here 20 March. This Day we were called to a Council upon them at the Request of the Adml and were unanimously of Opinion that he ought not to discontinue his Vigilance, but send out the Cruizers immediately—

"It seems probable that there may be what is called Ruse de Guerre. I suspect that D'Eスタインゲ has sailed for the West Indies & that he looks to Supplies from America for his armament.

There are strong Grounds for Suspicion."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS), VII.

An unsigned bulletin is published at New York from Rivington's press, announcing "A General Peace." It states: "Late last Night, an express from New-Jersey, brought the following Account. That on Sunday last, the Twenty-Third Instant, a Vessel arrived at Philadelphia, in Thirty-Five Days from Cadiz, with Despatches to the Continental Congress, informing them, that on Monday the Twentieth Day of January, the Preliminaries to A General Peace, Between Great-Britain, France, Spain, Holland, and the United States of America, were signed at Paris, by all the Commissioners from those Powers; in consequence of which, Hostilities, by Sea and Land, were to cease in Europe, on Wednesday the Twentieth Day of February, and in America, on Thursday the Twenty-First Day of March. The very present present the highest Intelligents was Last Night announced by the Firing of Cannon, and great Rejoicings at Elizabeth-Town.—Regarding the Particu-

The legislature passes an act to supplement that of Oct. 23, 1779 (q.v.), for the government of the Southern District of New York. This enables the council, named in the above-mentioned act, "to make any Convention or Conventions with the Commander in Chief of the British Forces, for the Speedy obtaining Possession of the Southern District of this State, or for the purpose of gaining Possession of any Port or Place occupied by the British Troops; and for giving those Troops the Protection they may be entitled to by any Treaty of Peace, or the Laws of Nations, as the said Persons may in their Discretion judge proper." Such conventions shall remain in force only until the British troops leave this state.—Ind.N. T. Gen., N 24, 1783.

Oliver de Lancy, adjutant-general, issues the following notice from headquarters (see F 18): "In order to save much unnecessary Trouble, Notice is hereby given, That no Persons whatsoever, are to be admitted into the British Lines, without having previously obtained Passports for the Purpose from the Commandant of New-York; any Persons who may have come in without Leave, are directed to report themselves immediately at the Commandant's office, otherwise they will be subject to very disagreeable Consequences, civil or personal.

"The General Officers commanding in the several Districts, will see that particular Attention is paid to this Order by the Officers at the Out-Posts."—N. T. Mect., Ap 7, 1783.

The following announcement of peace is recorded under this date in the headquarters orderly-book kept while Washington was personally in command at Newburgh:

"Altho' the public dispatches from our Commissioners in Europe have not arrived, and the Commander in Chief has it not in his power to announce officially a General Peace to the army yet he cannot resist the pleasure of Communicating the happiness he Experiences from a Certainty of that event and for the Satisfaction of the brave officer and Soldier under his Command he orders the following extract of a letter from his Excellency the Minister of France to be made public.

"Philadelphia 24 March 1783.

"Sir. It is with most lively and sincere joy that I have the Honor to inform your Excellency of the Conclusion of a peace. It crowns in the most happy manner your labours and the efforts of the United States. You will sincerely participate the complete satisfaction that this event gives me and I take the greatest possible share in the pleasure it will afford you.

"I have not this news officially but it is not the less Certain and I pray you to permit me to offer the Officers of your army and all the American Troops my Congratulations and the tribute of respect due to their Virtue and Courage.

"Following this the Commander in Chief is pleased to direct that all military arrangements shall continue the same as at present until further orders, that no relaxation in discipline or Police of the army shall be suffered," etc. See April 8. The general orders of Washington, compiled by Maj. Edw. C. Boynton, one of the trustees of Washington's headquarters at Newburgh, were published in that city in 1838.

In this month, the first issue of The New-York Morning Post was published. Its date is determined from that of the earliest issue found, that of Aug. 5, which is No. 126, of Vol. III. It appears to have been a continuation, without change in sequence of numbering, of The New-York Evening Post (see S, 1783). Morton and Horner were the publishers, the name of the third partner, Christopher Sower, being dropped. The latter had difficulty in adjusting his accounts (see his letter in the Royal Gen., S 7, 1783). The paper was of folio size, and was published semi-weekly.—Brigham, in A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 403, 410. See, further, F 23, 1785.

Writing to a friend in London, a "Gentleman of Character and Fortune in New York" says: "Peace has been proclaimed here this week; but the proclamation brought no peace to the poor Loyalists, who were worse off than they had been in the last ten years of the State's administration. This very present present the greatest Intelligences was Last Night announced by the Firing of Cannon, and great Rejoicings at Elizabeth-Town.—Regarding the Particulars of this truly interesting Event no more are yet received, but they are hourly expected."—From facsimile in N. According to a published notice of this date: "Mr. Lenox's Tavern, in Cherry-Street" was a meeting place for Loyalists.—Royal Gen., Mr 26, 1783.

April 6. Accordingly done. The same day it was read to the naval prisoners in the Provost, and a circular letter sent off express to the prisoners who were on parole on Long Island informing them thereof, and desiring them to hold themselves in readiness to be sent out. The next day I had paroled vessels in the Waldo with word to go out which on the 9th of April took the whole of the prisoners on board and carried them to their respective places of abode to save them expense and the fatigue of long marches—excepting about 18 or 20 sick and wounded who couldn't be removed with safety.

"The provost was cleared of the marine prisoners (without exception) on the 10th of April. And on and after the 7th of same month I had paroled vessels in the Waldo with word to go out, as it suited their convenience."—Rep. on Am. Mss. in the Royal Institution of Gt. Britain, VI: 76-77. April 11. "I must confess though I stood prepared for bad terms, yet I did not think it was in the power of the greatest villains on earth to place us in so humiliating a situation; even the Rebels affect to pity our case from All Her Majesty's subjects; but the country bespeak the utmost violence. Threats are thrown out, and vengeance denounced against all Americans. The town now swarms with Americans, whose insolence is scarce to be borne. Many of the Yorkers are meanly circling and carrying favour; such conduct will only insure contempt not a person from New York is permitted to pass in the country, notwithstanding the great indulgence shown here; should the troops be hastily withdrawn from this place, a scene of confusion and distress will take place that words cannot describe. . . . The French Gentlemen, and there are several now in this city, execute the Ministry; they openly declare, that though pleased with the advantages their Monarch has acquired, yet as good subjects they feel hurt at the humiliating state they see the Loyalists placed in."—London Chron., May 1785.

Another New Yorker writes: "The last packet which arrived here about a week since, brought the distressing confirmation of a peace at last made with America; by which I find the Loyalists in this country are now so shamefully and traitorously abandoned. . . . Our fears at present surpass all description. Never was there upon the face of the earth a set of wretches in a more deplorable situation. Deprived of all hope of future comfort or safety, either for themselves or their unhappy wives and children, many have lost their senses, and are now in a state of perfect madness. Some have put a period to their miserable existence by drowning, shooting, and hanging themselves, leaving their unfortunate wives and helpless infants destitute of bread to support them; and I am afraid many more will follow the dreadful example."—London Chron., June 7-10, 1783.

A humorous item of Boston "news" reads: "We hear from New York, that the Independent Fever rages there to such a degree, among the tories and refugees, that it carries off great numbers weekly; and that general Carleton, in order to prevent the infection from spreading, has ordered many away to New-Scotland."—Penn. A New Yorker writes: "Peace being now restored to the country, our old inhabitants are beginning to come in and mix with us again; and I think matters will terminate here much better than many people may have been led to believe. "The People have flock'd hither from the Country since the proclaiming of the Cessation of Arms [see Apr. 8 and 11] without any Regard to the Authority assumed on the other Side of the Lines. There are now upwards of 2000 in Town. The Dissolution of the American Army is hourly expected to take Place. The Soldiers will consider their Terms as out & go off to their respective Homes—The Officers are obliged to be content to become Creditors for 5 years Pay at 6 per Cent. 23 An open letter to Robert Morris, subscribed "Lucius," appears in the Freeman's Journal; it reads in part: "I have stated your conduct in publishing your letter of resignation, as so daring an instance of depravity deserves. The mortal wound it gave to our credit, both at home and abroad; the dangerous commotions it tended to create in the States, we have to examine out of the enemy, to continue a war from which the desolation of our finances, and the dishonour of our public councils, as stated by you, gave the most flattering prospect of success; were consequences to be apprehended from such a publication, so palpable and glaring, that they could not possibly have escaped you."

"How that august body to whom your resignation was originally addressed, could endure language of such inulence and reproach, is not to be comprehended ...

"Your friends and yourself had the art to excite great expectations from your appointment to the superintendance of our finances. Will you inform us how you have fulfilled our hopes? Tell us what ingenious plans of revenue you have produced; what loans your credit has obtained; what new resources you have opened; what savings you have made; and what debts you have discharged. This surely would have better become you than vain boasts of the sacrifices you have made of property and domestic bliss, while in the bosom of your family, in full enjoyment of your mercantile connections, with splendid appointments, lucrative patronage, and unrivalled power."—Freeman's Journal. Smith's Diary (Mass., IV).

The following letter, signed by "An American," is printed in a New London paper: "To all Printers of Public News-Papers. Tell it to the whole World, and let it be published in every news-paper throughout America, Europe, Asia and Africa, to the everlasting disgrace and infamy of the British king's commanders at New-York, "That during the late war, it is said Eleven Thousand Six Hundred and Forty-Four American prisoners, have suffered death by their inhuman, cruel, savage and barbarous usage on board the filthy and malignant British prison ship called the Jersey, lying at New York. British Officers would not let the vengeanee of Heaven fall on your Isle, for the blood of these unfortunate victims!"—Conn. Gazette (New London), Apr. 25, 1783.

No investigation has been made by the present author to ascertain whether this is the earliest publication of the foregoing letter. That it was reprinted in an almost endless chain appears probable (see, for example, Penn. Packet, Apr. 25, 1783); indeed it seems possible that this very statement is the foundation upon which American historians in later years based their evidently exaggerated estimates of the numbers who perished on the "Jersey" prison-ship.

During the ceremonies of the Tammany Society attending the in-terment of the remains of these martyrs at the Wallabout (Brook-lyn) in 1808 (p. 26, passim), orations, pamphlets, newspaper articles, and banners repeated the tale. An inscription containing these figures was afterwards engraved over the ante-chamber of the vault. Valentine published in the Manual of 1851 (pp. 417-18) an article on the prison-ships, by H. Onderdonk, of Jamaica, L. I., containing the statement: "Even as early as 1783, a reckless newspaper writer estimated (on what authority it is not stated) that perhaps 10,000, aeronauts perished on board the British ships of war, in which many persons were confined, and the conjecture has gradually passed into sober history, for a well-attested fact, as if 10,000 men could have died out of one ship in the space of three years, and been buried on the adjacent shore! The number that perished was doubtless fearfully great, and needed no exaggeration." Nevertheless, as late as 1800, a second appeal to congress (the first being in 1888) was published by the Society of Old Brooklynites "for the Erection of a Monument over the re-mains of 11,000 prisoners who died on board the British Prison Ships during the Revolutionary War." It contained the statement (p. 12): "It is estimated that between 11,000 and 12,000 prisoners perished on these vessels, it being claimed that the mortality on the Old Jersey alone amounted to five a day."

The statement is made in the present work (Vol. 1, p. 128) that "about twelve thousand perished miserably" on these ships. Substantial credence was lent to the report of the large number who died, by the testimony of prisoners (see, for example, Age 10, 1781; Je 11, Oct., and N. 9, 1782), which shows that as many as eleven in one day died during their confinement on the "Jersey;" also by the statement published by Dandridge in Am. Prisoners of the Rev. (1814). "It is well known that twenty hogsheads of bodies were collected in 1808 from the shores of the Wallabout, and buried under the auspices of the Tammany Society. These were but a small part of the remains of the victims of the prison ships. Many were, as we have seen, washed into the sea, and many more were interred on the shores of New York Harbor, before the prison ships were removed to the Wallabout."

A perusal of the official correspondence, regarding conditions on the prison-ships and the interchange of prisoners, printed in the
CHRONOLOGY: THE REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD: 1776-1783

May 1781. Chronology, will probably convince the fair-minded reader that serious injustice has been done the English authorities in connection with this matter. Mr. James Lenox Banks, who published in 1905 David Spratt and Naval Prisoners in the War of the Revolution, states, in a letter to the author, that he has been unable to find in the existing records any facts to substantiate the statement that so many prisoners died during the period of British occupation of New York. Moreover, there appears to be no single official American report substantiating all the charges against the British management of prisoners. Nevertheless, that extremely unsanitary conditions and brutality existed in the provost jail and prison-ships, resulting in a very great loss of life, is evidenced by the testimony of prisoners, too numerous and detailed to be ignored. These have been summarized by Danske Dandridge in a recent work (1911), entitled American Prisoners of the Revolution. See also, concerning the provost jail, S 16, N, and N 18, 1776; and, regarding earlier investigations and observations concerning naval prisoners, see, e.g., Ja 25, F 2, 1781; Je 9, 11, 22, 24, 1783, etc.

26 A "Gentleman of Distinction in New York" writes: "New York is filled with persons from different States. Some have come in about business, others to claim and get possession of their houses, in which they are much disappointed, as none of them will be given up till the army goes off, and that I believe will not be possible for some months. It is said General Carleton will first see the articles of the treaty by which the different States seem averse to, especially that respecting the Refugees. . . General Carleton goes next week to meet General Washington and Governor Clinton of this State [see My 6], and no doubt will do every thing he can for us poor unfortunate Refugees; but I dread the time when the British troops leave us.

I have conversed with many persons from the different States, who declare that almost every body in the country must be ruined, especially those who owe money. Lands, they say, will not rent for more than their taxes, and little or no money among them. All come in very hungry, and expect the Long Island farmers will let their money on interest; but few stay above a day or two, except those who have relations or friends houses to go to. They do not like to pay half a dollar a night for their bed, a dollar for their dinner, without wine or any thing else. Some of them, it is true, have made fortunes; but many more are ruined. General Robertson's going home gave P. V. Livingston possession of his house. He says, that by depreciation of the money, he has lost 20,000 l. and they all make similar complaints."—London Chron., Je 5-7, 1783.

Several vessels from different parts of the United States have lately arrived at New York, "that port being at this time open for the American flag."—Penn. Packet, Ap 29, 1783. This report appears to have been somewhat premature—S 17.

The following garrison order is issued by Brig.-Gen. Birchen, commandant of New York: "To order to prevent any Waste or Destruction in the Houses under the direction of the Vestry or Barrack Office, Notice is hereby given, that the present possessors of Houses under the above description, are on no account to quit them without giving previous notice to the Commandant, that an examination may be made into their state; and on removal, the keys are to be lodged at his Office, No. 61, Wall-street: Any person presuming to take possession of such houses, without permission from the Commandant, must expect the most disagreeable consequences."—N. In a memorial of this date to Lord North, Benedict Arnold gives an account of his treason, and mentions the sum of money he received ($6,000). In addition, he speaks of raising in New York the "American Legion" to be used against his former brother-officers in America. He mentions also Mrs. Arnold and his family, having been driven from his country, and his brilliant prospects in the American colonies. This memorial to Lord North is an appeal to be placed on the British establishment, as his and Mrs. Arnold's pensions would be greatly inadequate for the support of his numerous family. He says, in part:

"Your Memorialist, Influenced by Sentiments of Loyalty to the King, and Attachment to the British Constitution, has sacrificed—a handsome property in America ... and at the most Eminent hazard of his Life, Co-operated with Sir Henry Clinton, Commander-in-Chief of the British Army in America, which will appear by his official letters to Lord Sackville. But his Intention was to be that in Conscideration of his Corps, and Services, he has received from Government only six thousand pounds sterling, one thousand pounds of which he has expended in raising his Regiment.

"Your Memorialist has not only sacrificed his Fortune, but is deprived of Four Hundred and Fifty pounds sterling per Annum, which he was entitled to receive from Congress, as also a large tract of land, and by the decided part which he has taken, his Family have been Banished from America, and he has sacrificed his prospects for providing for them there, which were undoubtedly of equal if not of greater Importance to them than his Fortune, which with that of others has been given up by the late Adminstration for the desirable purpose of obtaining Peace," etc.—From catalogue of the library of Hon. E. D. Pay, sold at The Anderson Galleries, Nov. 17, 1919, quoting from the original MS. Cf. O 9, 1780.

A report is made, commencing with this date, showing the very houses occupied, the names of the occupants and of those who pay no rent, with the reasons for their being exempted.—Stevens, Cat. Because the British have not yet evacuated New York, a number of the city's former inhabitants, who mean to return and have given up their houses in the country, "are obliged to disperse and separate their families, amongst such hospitable farmers who may be able to give them shelter." Their predicament "is more distressing than it has been for the last six years, for having another house, garden, or other convenience than what is obtained by mere favour."—Penn. Packet, My 6, 1783.

The following order, signed by Adj.-Gen. Dr. De Lancey, is issued from headquarters at New York: "As many Claims and Demands have been exhibited to the Commander in Chief for Properties supplied to the British Army, or Officers in the several public Departments, since the 15th Day of April, 1775, and it is expedient that the Nature, Extent, and Validity of such Claims and Demands should be known and ascertained, in order that Right and Justice may be finally administered," a board of commissioners is appointed "to receive and examine all such Claims and Demands, to call for and investigate the Proofs that may be exhibited thereof, and to register the same preparatory to a future Liquidation." It was announced that this board would assemble on May 8, at the city hall, and sit from 10 to 2 o'clock every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.—N. Y. Merc., My 5, 1783. The board met from the time of their appointment to within a very short time before the evacuation of New York, and many claims and demands against the British army and public departments were presented to them.

Nathaniel Cooper advertises his store, which is at 67 Wall St., "between the Main Guard [city hall—see Ag 14] and the burnt church" (Trinity)—N. Y. Merc., My 5, 1783.

Gen. Washington and Gov. Clinton meet Sir Guy Carleton and Admiral Digby at Tappan to discuss "the evacuation, and other arrangements." Entertainment is prepared by "Mr. Francis" (Samuel Francies). His bill, it was said, amounted to £900.—Penn. Packet, My 13, 1783.

William Smith accompanied the British officers and, in his diary, under May 9, gives a vivid picture of the conference: "Yesterday morning I returned from the Interview with Washington for which we set out Sunday the 4th, further, Colleton in the Pernance Frigate Capt. Lutwycke, yet Mr Elliot and Myself in the Greyhound Yacht.

"We reached Dobb's Ferry Monday Evening, when Major Beckwith who had been sent in a Whaleboat a Head in the Morning to announce our approach came on Board with an Invitation to May 6.
and at the next Day to a Dinner at Orange Town.
Sir Guy with his two Aid de Camps Majors Beckwith & Upam Captn. Lutwyncke & Col. Smith who had just come from Washington went a Shore in one Barge—and Mr. Elliot Mr. Secretary Morgan & myself in another. We landed about 11 o’Clock Tuesday 6th & met on the Shore Washington and two other of his Aid de Camps, Col. Cole & Col. Humphreys & I think Mr. Trumbull of the Secy.—
There was a Charriot in which the two Generals proceeded—Horses were offered to the Rest but Mr. Elliot & I walked with Col. Smith the other Aid de Camp.

We met at Mr. Dewints the House of Rendezvous Mr. Clinton Mr. Scott Mr. Duer Mr. Benson and several others; An Hour was spent in Congratulations & seperat Chat in & before the Door, when the two Generals took a Room & Mr. Morgan Called Mr. Elliot & myself in.

There was soon collected a Number Consisting of The Generals Mr. Clinton the Govr. Mr. Scott—One of his Council M. Albert [Egbert] Benson—Att’y General Mr. Trumbull Washingtons Secy. 1st Govr. Elliot Mr. Morgan & My Self.

when all seated Washington opened the Business addressing himself to Sir Guy Carleton and said it respected three Points 1st The Preservation of Property from being carried off and especially the Negroes
2nd The Settlement of the Time for the Evacuation of New-

3rd The extending the Governor’s of the State of Newyork as far as might be convenient before the Intire Evacuation took Place.

Next upon the Supper & Beef which there was a plenty of and delivered himself without animition with great slowness & a low Tone of Voice when he had inlarged upon his Points a little Sir Guy Carleton who heard without Interruption replied That he should proceed to the Evacuation with all possible Expedition but it must of Necessity take Time—that he had sent a Fleet already to Nova Scotia with about 6000 Souls—that to prevent the irregular Embarkation of Property he had appointed Persons to inspect the Ships & as to Negroes to make a Registry that the Owners might eventually be paid for the Slaves who were intitled to their Freedom by British Proclamations & Promises—

Here Washington affected to be startled—already inbarked speak he Sir Guy then observed that no Interpretation could be put upon the Articles inconsistent with prior Engagements hinding the National Honor which must be kept with all Colours, and he added that the only Mode was to pay for the Negroes in which Case Justice was done to all Parties the Slave and his Owner.

Washington observed that the Point of expanding the Governor’s of Newyork was not so immediately the Object of Congress tho’ it fell within his Trust as connected with the General Evacuations & left to Mr. Clinton to add what related to the Object.

Before this not a Word had been dropped by any [but] by the two generals.

The Necessity of Order in West Chester & the Gratification of the Long Island Refugees by a Return to their Estates made up the Request that the Countties of West Chester and Suffolk if not a Part of Queens County might be left to the Govr. of the State of Newyork.

Sir Guy gave Hope as to West Chester—said he had already withheld the Supply of Provisions to De Lancy’s Refugees & he believed he should evacuate the whole county in a short Time.

But as to Long Island he saw too many Difficulties and left one to their Consideration the Prevention of Desertions—He doubted whether it was in their Power to remove that Object Mr. Scott changed the Ground by Intimating that it would be for the Consideration of Mr. Clinton whether it was worth while for Mr. Clinton to call a Council upon Proposals to be made by Sir Guy Carleton—This was strange as the Request came from Mr.
Clinton & must depend upon Sir Guy’s Consent & Mr. Morgan interfered for Openings in the Interior County to the Loyalists here there were several Speakers—Mr. Scott took up the vulgar Idea that the Articles were fulfilled on their Side by Congress & recommending tho’ the States did not comply & drop’d that they could not suffer those to stay among them who had waged war ag’st.

It was observed by Mr. Morgan that ever since the Pacification Acts inconsistent with the Articles were Passed—He menioned the Tropsass Act—Scott justified it but the Rest denied that the Articles were then known—I observed that Mr. Apathor so late as the 10 April was summoned to traverse an Indictm’t—they replied that it was an executive Procedure upon an Act in 1779.
Mr. Clinton said there had been no Legislation since the Articles to stop these Things.

Scotts loquacious Indiscretion chaffed Mr. Morgan. The latter insisted that no subordinate Power could settle the Interpretation of the Articles—Scott did not perceive the Drift of it, and talked of the Council of War & the Right of deciding.—He suggested a Question as between France and Great Britis & thought Westminster Hall would adjudge upon the Treaty—In the Altercation
I was appealed to by Benson & being in Pain for Fear of Indecorum
I cut short the Disputes by observing—that verbal Conferences were not only useless but dangerous. It is a Matter of extreme Delicacy to expound Treaties which are to be satisfactory to both Parties or to be followed by War. I asked whether they would undertake to sign the Opinion that if the States refused what Congress recommended they had right so to do. Clinton replied by no Means & that he would be answerable for Nothing that would be said till he had consulted the Legislature—and here a sudden Stop was put to all further Conversation between the Disputants.

Sir Guy then with liberal Professions of a Desire as much as possible to oblige said he should willingly attend to any Propositions that might be made—

“After a Pause Washington repeated that the intermediate Extension of the Govr. of New York was only Subordito his General Trust of effecting the Evacuation.

“Sir Guy was very full in asserting that no Time could be fixed from the Contingences attending it Winds Weather &c.

Washington took some Watch & observing that it was near Dinner Time offered Wine & Bitters—We all rose with Sir Guy & Nothing more was said except that Washington observed that to prevent Mistakes he should shew his Report of what had passed before he wrote to Congress—Sir Guy approved it well as the best means to guard against Misunderstandings.—We all walked out & soon after were called to plentiful Repast under a Tent.

“We returned to the Landing & on Board Ship in the Evening.

—Wm. Smith’s Diary (Ms.), VII.

According to the expressed agreement to have things in writing, Washington wrote a letter to Carleton immediately after the conference, asking the latter to write him as to what measures were being adopted for the evacuation of the posts now in possession of the British, and when the fleets and armies would probably be withdrawn. Washington called attention to the embarkation that had already taken place, in which a large number of negroes had been carried away. He asked whether this was “consonant to” or “an infraction” of the treaty, and gave his own view that it was totally different from its letter and spirit. —Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), X. 244-47; Man. Com. Coun. (1873), 75; Carton, (1846), V. 716.

Five hundred British prisoners are to march from “the New-"jail” in Philadelphia for New York to be liberated. About the same number will march on May 7—Penn. Packet, My 6, 1783. They arrived at Staten Island on May 9—Ibid., My 15, 1783.

A new police regulation, affecting the quality, weight, and price of bread, requires that a loaf of the best grade shall weigh three pounds and seven for 14 coppers, and the loaf of inferior grade shall weigh three and a half pounds and sell for the same price. Other parts of the regulations are as before (see Ja 11, 1783).—Royal Gaz.

Information reaches New York from London “that William Eden, Esq. Member of the British and Irish Parliament, is appointed to be General to the United States of North America, and is to come with his family to New York; also that the Right Honourable Charles Howard, Earl of Surrey, son and heir of the Duke of Norfolk, and Deputy Earl Marshal of England, is appointed to be the Ambassador of Great Britain to the United States of North-America.”—N. Y. T. Merc., My 12, 1783.

At the "Cantonment of the American Army, on Hudson’s cers of the American army which considers forming a society among themselves. A committee is appointed to revise the proposals and submit them at the next meeting, on May 3. On that day, the representatives met and adopted the plan of an organization or "Society of Friends" to be known as the "Society of the Cincinnati." The name is derived from that of the Roman general, Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus, it being their desire to return, as he 12 In answer to Washington’s letter of May 6 (q.v.), Carleton writes that at present it is impossible to tell when the evacuation of this city can be completed. The quantity of shipping that will be sent to harbor the number that will be forced to abandon New York cannot be guessed. Carleton also says that he has given an order to prevent the carrying away of any negroes or other property of the American inhabitants. He refers to proposals he made, on April 14, in a letter to the minister of foreign affairs,—the naming of American commissioners to assist those appointed by him to inspect all embarkations,—a proposal which Washington had already approved by making appointments.—Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 543; Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 786.

Charles Roubault advertises that he has opened a livery stable and coach house adjoining his inn, which is at No. 18 Broadway (the City Tavern, at the present 115 Broadway).—N. Y. Merc., My 12, 1783. This numbering of Broadway had been changed before 1786, when, according to the first directory published, Mrs. Barham, a tavern-keeper, was at 18 Broadway, while John Cape was proprietor, in this later year, of the City Tavern, which is merely indicated as on Broadway. By 1794, another change had taken place in the numbering, for Alexander Macomb is listed as at No. 18 Broadway.—See Vol. I, p. 423. The Macomb house stood at the present 39-41 Broadway.

15 "Advertisements referred to under My 28, 1781, q.v.) is advertised to become soon the starting-point of "stage-boats" connecting with a stage-line for New. It so appears in an advertisement of "Peter Stuyvesant, who for many years drove a Stage Wagon from Poughkeepsie, to Brown’s Ferry."—N. Y. Merc., My 19, 1783.

16 The first two slopes from New York to trade with Albany since peace came about are permitted by the inhabitants of that city to sell their cargoes.—N. Y. Merc., Je 16, 1783.

17 Certain Loyalists meet at the home of Michael Grass, in the Out Ward (in Chatham St. near the Tea Water Pump), and sign their names "to form a settlement at Fort Frontenac, at the mouth of Lake Ontario, and head of the river St. Lawrence, in Canada, the only eligible place by the late treaty for the king’s subjects to carry on trade to the Indian and fur trade." The commander-in-chief gives them the "encouragement" they desire.—Penn. Packet, Jl 1, 1783; Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 788.

18 A news-letter from Fish-Kill states that "A correspondent observes that he has lately viewed the Churches and Houses in New York, and that all the Churches are, except the Episcopal, the Moravian, and the Methodists, converted into stores or barracks, and appear in a very boisterous condition; the fences which encompass the burying-yards being destroyed, the pews in all, and the galleries in some of them pulled down, the windows broken and otherwise much abused." The letter is a plea that Gen. Carleton will order that these edifices and the streets be cleaned of dirt and filth before he leaves, "to prevent the curses of an injured people."—Penn. Packet, My 27, 1783.

19 The Legislature showed me yesterday Mr. Scott’s Requisition of the Records—agreed a Council be called—I dined at Head Quarters & intimated before Dinner that until the Empire was actually secured the Books ought not to be given up. . . . At the Council all agreed not to give up the Records.—Wm. Smith’s Diary (MS.), VII.

20 Adj.-Gen. De Lancey issues an order from headquarters that "All persons desirous to leave New-York are to give in their names" at his office, before June 7, stating "the Place of their former residence, and where they wish to be removed."—N. Y. Merc., Je 2, 1783. On June 7, the persons who had given their names to the adjutant-general, "for Passages from this Place," agreeable to this notice, were directed to apply to the gentlemen appointed in De Lancey’s announcement of April 15 (q.v.) to examine their claims, who will attend for that purpose at the city hall every day except Sundays from 11 to 2 o’clock.—Ibid., Je 9, 1783.

21 News reaches Philadelphia "that an embarkation of 6000 men is taking place at New York. The British guards, with most of the troops that were under Cornwallis and Burgoyne, with the Hessian and other foreign troops, are going to England."—Penn. Packet, My 27, 1783.

22 To the Mill at the One Mile Stone in the Bowery Lane is to be sold at auction at the Coffee House.—Royal Gaz., My 28, 1783. It was again advertised to be sold on June 19.—N. Y. Merc., Je 9, 1783.

23 A wild beast "The most curious that has been in this city these many years," is on exhibition at the sign of Rodney’s engagement below the Coffee-House.—N. Y. Merc., Je 1, 1783. Lord Rodney’s victory over the French fleet under Comte de Grasse, on April 12, 1782, is the event which was probably crudely depicted on this tavern sign.

24 The king’s birthday is celebrated as usual, "with every demonstration of loyalty and joy." A royal salute is fired from Fort George, and by "his Majesty’s ships" in the harbour. In the evening a feu de joie is fired from the lines, followed by an exhibition of fireworks from the fort.—Royal Gaz., Je 7, 1783. To prevent accidents by fire the inhabitants are requested not to illuminate their windows.—Ibid., Je 4, 1784.

25 By order of the commandant, "Permission is hereby granted to all persons coming from any part of the Country with five Stock for the use of the Markets, to kill and dispose of the same, provided the Stock is slaughtered at such Places as are set apart for that purpose."

26 "Hucksters, or any other persons who may be desired to forestall any Provisions or Vegetables brought to this City for the Supply of the Markets, may depend on being treated with the utmost Rigour."—N. Y. Merc., Je 16, 1783. See, further, 5, 9.

27 A new Map of the United States of America, laid down from the best Authority, agreable to the Peace of 1783, is "sold by the Printer."—N. Y. Merc., Je 9, 1783. An earlier map of the United States, probably the first, 18° x 21", was published April 3, 1783, by John Wallis, Ludgate Street, London. A cartouche contains the full-length portraits of Washington and Franklin. A copy of this now very rare map is in the author’s collection.

28 "The Soldiers of the American Army that were illlisted for the War were discharged last week.

29 Those for 3 Years are not, but daily desert & are not pursued.

30 Those who have Discharges have an Indorsement purporting that it is a Furlough for 4 Months—They red some Pay to carry them Home but it is in Goods which they can’t sell for half the money at which they are debited & the Men cry out all along the Road at this last Chest.

31 I learn this from Col P R. Livingston and Joseph Penny— the latter lives but 7 Miles from the Camp at Newburgh—He says the Horse of the Troop are sold & that they are now daily selling Wagons Boats &c.

32 I am left in Doubt as to Washington’s Design in discharging his Soldiers—Penny says they have uniformly ever since the Peace sworn that there was Peace & should be Peace for that they would neither draw a Sword nor pull a Trigger any longer.

33 The Invention of the Furlough is to get rid of them quickly, for it implies that they are to have pay for the 4 Months—all swear they will never come back again nor ever revisit—it.—Wm. Smith’s Diary (I. B.), VII.

34 The captains of the “City Volunteer Companies and Militia” are ordered to collect the arms issued to their companies, and give notice thereof "to Brigade-Major Amiel, at No. 5 Wall street."—Royal Gaz., Je 10, 1783.

35 Washington writes from Newburgh to Gov. Benjamin Harrison of Virginia, expressing at length his ideals and hopes for the United States as an independent power, while stating his intention to return to "domestic retirement."—Penn. Packet, Jl 15, 1783, citing Virginia Gaz., Jl 5, 1783.

36 Egbert Benson and Daniel Parker, commissioners, assist in superintending the embarkation of 14 transports bound for Nava 1783: Scotia, having about 3,000 persons on board. Among these persons were at least 150 negroes, "who appeared to be the property of the citizens of the United States" (see My 12). The commissioners wrote to Washington the next day, asking whether it was necessary to write further remonstrance to Sir Guy Carleton against his permitting the slaves of American subjects to leave. On June 17, they wrote to Carleton that their object was not to hinder, but to prevent any interruption of the Treaty of Peace. From correspondence pub'd in the Daily Ady., J. 24, 1794. See also J. 18; and Winmor, VIII: 203; 215; VIII: 137.

15 Sir Guy Carleton offers the same encouragement for Loyalists to settle on the island of Abaco, one of the Bahamas, as that given to the Loyalists who have gone or are going to Nova Scotia. They are requested to keep their names at the house of M' John Dawe, on Commissary Leake's dock, at the North River."—N. T. Merc., Je 16, 1795. See J. 5.

17 A line of stages between Elizabeth-Town and Philadelphia is put into operation by Grummam and Mercereau,—the first since peace was declared. The trip was made in one day. A stage from each city goes to Princeton, makes an exchange of passengers there, and returns.—Royal Gaz., Je 14, 1783.

15 Sir Guy Carleton signs a return of British and German regiments for embarkation.—From the original in Emmet Coll, item No. 11064.

16 "After the arrival of the preliminary articles & before the definitive Treaty arrived, from the vindictive & persecuting disposition of the American refugees & other Loyalists were cut off from all hope of remaining in the States after the British troops should be withdrawn. They therefore made application to Sir Guy Carleton to be transported with their families & effects to Nova Scotia, on the same terms as the other refugees had gone there, under the protection of his Majesty's Government, they might find an asylum from the tyranny & oppression of their Countrymen. They were accordingly sent to such parts of that province as they requested. In consequence of such removal many of the derelict Estates became vacant, whereupon the Commander in chief was pleased to issue the following order.

"Head Quarters New York June 16 1783 Orders The proprietors of houses or lands lately evacuated will apply to Lieut Genl Campbell for the possession of those on Long Island, to Brigadier General Birch for those on Staten island. These General officers will be pleased to cause all such estates to be immediately delivered up to the Proprietors or their attorneys unless where they may see sufficient reasons for delaying them some time longer, which reasons they will report to the Commander in chief. In like manner, all estates which shall hereafter be evacuated are to be surrendered up to the proprietors. O. L. De Lancy Adjutant General."—N. T. Merc., Je 23, 1783.

18 "From the 16th of June to the day of evacuation of New York the property which had been from time to time vacated was restored to the proprietors. But many houses & stores absolutely necessary were detained from the Proprietors until the evacuation of the city."—From the "Case of William Butler," in N. T. City during the Am. Rev., 159-61; Public Papers of Geo. Clinton, VIII: 203; Penn. Packet, Je 21, 1783. See, however, J. 10.

1784: George Washington issues his last circular letter to the governors of the states, as follows: "The great object for which I had the honour to hold an appointment in the service of my country, being accomplished, I am now preparing to resign it into the hands of Congress, and return to that domestic retirement, which, it is well known, I left with the greatest reluctance; but, before I carry this resolution into effect, I think it a duty incumbent on me to make this my last official communication, to congratulate you on the glorious events which Heaven has been pleased to produce in our favour, to offer my sentiments respecting some important subjects, which appear to me to be intimately connected with the tranquility of the United States, to take my leave of your Excellency as a public character, and to give my final blessing to that country, in whose service I have some time been a member of my life.

"The Citizens of America, placed in the most enviable condition, as the sole Lords and Proprietors of a vast Tract of Conti-ties many of the Soldiers have received, and the gratuity of one year's full pay, which is promised to all, possibly their situation... will not be deemed less eligible than that of the Officers. Should a further reward, however, be judged equitable, I will venture to assert, no man will enjoy greater satisfaction than himself in seeing an exemption from taxes for a limited time... or any other bounty or compensation granted to the brave defenders of their country's cause...

"It is necessary to say but a few words on the third topic which was proposed, and which regards particularly the defence of the Republic..."

The Militia of this country must be considered as the Palladium of our security, and the first effectual resort in case of hostility: It is essential, therefore, that the same system should pervade the whole; that the formation and discipline of the Militia of the Continent, should be absolutely uniform; and that the same species of arms, accoutrements, and military apparatus, should be introduced in every part of the United States...

I have thus freely disclosed what I wished to make known before I surrendered my public trust to those who committed it to me...

"It remains, then, to be my final and only request, that your Excellency will communicate these sentiments to your Legislature, at their next meeting; and that they may be considered as the legacy of one who has ardently wished, on all occasions, to be useful to his country—and who even in the shade of retirement, will not fail to pursue the Divine Benediction upon it..."—Royal Gazette Extraordinary, Jl 12, 1783.

Commenting on Washington's letter, Smith says: "It would seem as if Washington had resolved to avoid any Loss of Popularity but whether with a View to be useful in the Reunion or to set up for himself is the Question."—Smith's Diary (MS.), VII, under Jl 15. See also Winsor, VII: 746.

Smith writes that he is informed that the "Fleet now going to Nova Scotia is to bring back Coal for the Garrison here... This don't look like a speedy Evacuation."—Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. Elias Boudinot writes from Philadelphia to Benjamin Franklin that the inhabitants of the United States are irritated to an alarming degree by the "cruelties, ravages, and barbarisms of the refugees and loyalists," while the citizens of New York are "kept out of their city, and despised daily of their property, by the sending off their negroes by hundreds, in the face of the treaty" (see Je 13).

In Philadelphia, about 300 American troops with fixed bayonets surround the house in which Congress is sitting, and demand a redress of grievances. Congress, thus "grossly insulted" by a multitude of paid soldiers, adjourns to Princeton.—Journal of Congress, IV: 231. See Je 57, 59, 30.

A newspaper advertisement announces that, "By Permission, there will be presented on this evening, "at the Theatre in New-York, A Tragedy, called the Grecian Daughter. To which will be added, An Entertainment, called the Lying Valet." Mr. and Mrs. Ryan are to be among the performers.—Royal Gazette, Je 21 and 24, 1783. Advertisements of performances appeared in almost every subsequent issue of the paper until Aug. 30. On that day, the announcement included this notice: "On account of the short stay that the Company make here, the Nights of Performance, until further notice, will be on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday Evenings."

Mr. Ryan takes this method of returning his sincere thanks to those Ladies and Gentlemen who have hitherto favoured his attempts; humbly hopes for a continuance of their patronage, which will be gratefully acknowledged."— Ibid., Je 25 to Ag 30, 1783. Ryan's advertisements reappeared on Sept. 13, and continued until Oct. 25. From Oct. 11 to Oct. 25, his company performed alternately with the military players.—Ibid., S 15 to 25, 1783. The theatre was closed from that time until Aug. 12, 1785 (p. 64).

On motion of Lord North, the house of commons voted half-pay to Loyalist officers.—Winsor, VII: 196.

Smith writes in his diary: "Reports from Philad: that the Congress are at Trenton. That 200 of the 3 Years Men of the Pennsylvania Line have entered the Town of Phila last week & beset the Congress & extorted Promises—that the Congress called for the Protection of the Militia but not getting it had written to Washington & retired from the Place of Inust. They dread a Discharge without Pay as was lately the Case of those infested for the War."—Smith's Diary (MS.), VII.

The household effects of the late Christopher Blundell are offered for sale. The house, also, is to he let. It is situated "on the Battery," and is considered "the most eligible one for a tavern keeper on this island."—N. Y. Merc., Je 30, 1783. See also L. M. R. K, III: 949 (Coker's house).

Loyalists who have enrolled to go to Port Roseway with the five companies now embarking, but who cannot go at this time, are to meet this evening "at Grant's Tavern, at the Sign of Lord Cornwallis."—N. Y. Merc., Jl 7, 1783.

A Philadelphia news item reads: "The unnecessary delay on the part of the British to quit the city of New-York, has only served to enrage the spirit and resentment of the people against the loyalists, which, instead of subsiding, seems every day to rise and be more determined against their re-admission among us; inomuch that most of those who had concluded to stay, now begin to think the experiment too dangerous to be tried, and have resolved to go off, which indeed is the most prudent step they can take."—Pennsylvania Packet (Philad.), Je 22, 1783; Man. Com. Coun. (1780), 794.

"Americanus," in an open letter, published in the N.Y. Packet (Fishkill) on this day, says in part: "How general Carleton will be able to reconcile the honor and justice of the British nation, so much arrogated to themselves, with the open acts of injustice so evidently practiced every day, is hard to determine. About the nineteenth of February, the general published in general orders, that all persons without the British lines, having property within, should send in their claims, &c. &c. &c. On the publication of the ratification of the preliminary articles of peace, many of the old citizens of New-York, who had fled from the city at the approach of the British, sold and disposed of their places in the country (thinking as all the world thought besides, that it was actually peace) and went to New-York, but to their utter disappointment, and to the astonishment even of the loyalists, those people were not permitted to go into their houses, the keys of all empty houses and such as should be evacuated, being ordered to the commandant's office—who out of his very great goodness condescended to let such houses, on the party paying, to pay him down three months rent. We need not enquire who pockeats this three months rent, with all the rents within the British lines, unjustly detained from the rightful owners."—Pennsylvania Packet, Jl 22, 1783.

Another correspondent asserts: "A number of houses in New York being now empty, many of the former owners have applied for leave to repossess them, but have in general been refused."—Ibid., Ag 23, 1783. See Ap 29.

Twenty-six "sail of vessels" are to start for Nova Scotia on this day. The Hessian and other foreign troops taken by Burgoyne have sailed for Canada. A number of embattled companies are marching towards the north, where the troops is preparing, among these being the frigate "South Carolina," accommodating nearly 1,000 men. It is expected the city will be clear of the British army in the course of August and September.—Pennsylvania Packet, Jl 15, 1783. See also Winsor, VII: 213, and letter of Wins. S. Smith, in N. Y. Congress resolves that a bronze equestrian statue of Washington be erected "at the place where the residence of Congress shall be established." On report of a committee appointed to prepare a plan of it, congress resolves "That the statue be of bronze. The general to be represented in a Roman dress, holding a truncheon in his right hand, and his head encircled with a laured wreath. The statue is to be supported by a marble pedestal, on which are to be represented, in baso relieve, the following principal events of the war, in which general Washington commanded in person, viz. The evacuation of Boston—the capture of the Hessians at Trenton—the battle of Princeton—the action of Monmouth, and the surrender of York. On the upper part of the front of the pedestal, to be engraved as follows: The United States in Congress assembled, ordered this statue to be erected in the year of our Lord 1783, in honor of George Washington, the illustrious commander in chief of the armies of the United States of America, during the war which vindicated and secured their liberty, sovereignty and independence. It is resolved that a statue conformable to the above plan, be executed by the best artist in Europe, under the superintendence of the minister of the United States at the court of Versailles; and that money to defray the expense of the same, be furnished from the treasury of the United States. At a meeting of Loyalists in Roubatel's Tavern, it is proposed to leave a memorial there, addressed to the commander-in-chief (Sir Guy Carleton), to select the most entitled to settle in Nova Scotia.—Royal Gaz., Ag 1783. On Aug. 15, a committee, appointed at this meeting, presented the memorial to him. It is a protest against making large grants of the best lands in that province to favored groups of persons. It states that the memorialists are informed that 55 persons have joined in an application to Carleton for 275,000 acres in Nova Scotia, and sent agents "to survey the unoccupied lands, and determine the most suitable situations." That application, which has been "studiously concealed," they fear has succeeded. They observe, further, "that the persons concerned (several of whom are said to be going to Britain) are most of them in easy circumstances, and with some exceptions, more distinguished by the repeated favours of government, than by either the greatness of their sufferings, or the importance of their services." They regard such grants, if carried into effect, "as accounting nearly to a total exclusion of themselves and families, who, if they become settlers, must either content themselves with barren or remote lands, or submit to be tenants to those, most of whom they consider as their superiors in nothing but deeper art, and keener policy." They ask that inquiry be made into their own "respective losses, services, situations, and sufferings," to ascertain if they are not equally entitled to "the favour and protection of government" with the former applicants.—N. Y. Merc., Ag 25, 1783; Man. Com. Gaz. (1783), 606. Gen. Carleton's answer is reassuring.—Ibid. Those who signed the memorial were requested to meet on Aug. 16 at Roubatel's to receive the answer.—Royal Gaz., Ag 16, 1783.

Notice is issued from the city hall (the "Main Guard") that all Loyalists within the British lines who desire to emigrate from this Plateau must be present at the adjutant-general's office, on or before Aug. 21, and be ready to embark before the end of the month.—Royal Gaz., Ag 16, 1783. Under date of Aug. 18, Smith wrote in his diary: "The Town is in general Distress by Orders for Emigrants to report their Names by the 21 of this Month."—Wm. Smith's Diary (MS.), VII. See Aug.

Carleton, in a letter to the Elias Boudinot, the president of congress, says: "The June packet lately arrived, has brought me final orders for the evacuation of this place; be pleased sir, to inform Congress of this proof of the perseverance of the court of Great Britain, in the pacific system expressed by the provisional articles, and that I shall loose no time, as far as depends upon me, in fulfilling his Majesty's commands. "But notwithstanding my orders are urgent to accelerate the total evacuation, the difficulty of assigning the precise period for this event is of late greatly increased . . . .

"The violence in the Americans, which broke out soon after the cessation of hostilities, encreased the number of their countrymen to look to me for escape from threatened destruction; but these terures have of late been so considerably augmented, that almost all the Loyalists who have hitherto received the safety both of their property and of their lives depend upon their being removed by me, which renders it impossible to say when the evacuation can be compleated. Whether they have just ground to assert, that there is either no government within your limits for common protection, or that it secretly favours the committees in the sovereignty they assume, and are actually exercising, I shall not pretend to determine; but as the daily gazettes and publications furnish repeated proofs, not only of a disregard to the articles of peace, but of barbarous menaces from committees formed in various towns, cities and districts, and even at Philadelphia, the very place which the Congress had chosen for their residence, I should shew an indifference to the feelings of humanity, as well as to the honour and interest of the nation I serve, to leave (as many of the Loyalists that are dangerous to the country, a prey to the violence they conceive they have so much cause to apprehend.

"The Congress will hence discern how much it will depend on themselves and the subordinate legislatures, to facilitate the service I am commanded to perform, by abating the fears they will thereby diminish the number of the emigrants: but should these fears continue to multiply, as is very probable, you may be assured, that I myself am acquitted from every delay in the fulfilling my orders and the consequences which may result therefrom; and I cannot avoid adding, that it makes no small part of my concern, that the Congress have thought proper to suspend to this late hour, recommendations stipulated by the treaty, and in the punctual performance of which, the king and his ministers have expressed such confidence."—Freeman's Jour. "The inhabitants have formed associations for a nightly watch."—Ibid., O 4, 1783.

There are between 12,000 and 15,000 refugees, men, women, and children, to be embarked at New York, Long Island, and Staten Island, for "Nova-Scotia, St. Johns, and Abaco." Among these "are many persons of fortune and landed estates, who leave nothing but their terra firma behind them. Many of them pretend, that this is not fear of ill treatment, not the departure of the army, that urges them to leave the country, so much as a conviction that the new republics must sink in a short time under their immense national debt, and the exorbitant taxes with which they will be loaded."—Penn. Packet, S 4, 1783. The fleet sailed on Sept. 15 (q.t.).

Writing in London, Lord Sheffield makes "Observations on the Proclamation of the American States," including the following: "The American States are separated from us, and Independent, consequently foreign; the declaring them such, puts them in the only situation in which they can be; all difficulty is removed, nothing is hazarded, no hidden mischief is to be dreaded; but relying on those commercial principles and regulations under which our trade and navy have become to great, Great-Britain will lose few of the advantages she possessed before the American States became independent; and with prudent management she will have as much of the trade as it will be her interest to wish for, without any expense to the State, of civil establishment or protection."—N. Y. Gazette, D 6, 1783. See letter subscribed by "Common Sense" in ibid., D 10, 1783, commenting on these "Observations." It is a fact that 8 days from New York, report that there are 14,000 still to come from New York to the different parts of Nova Scotia; and that numbers from various parts of the continent are coming to New York, determined to seek an asylum in Nova Scotia.—Royal Gazette, O 15, 1783. An officer of the British ship "Duc de Chartres" writes from Nova Scotia: The great emigration of Loyalists from New York to this province is almost incredible, they having few refuges in the Bay of Fundy, and considerably augmented those of Annapolis Royal and St. John's River; they are so numerous at the last mentioned place as to build two towns [Carleton and Clinton]. . . . Numbers of families are also gone to Halifax, but the majority are fixed at Port-Roseworthy, where they have erected a large city [Shelburne] which contains nine thousand inhabitants, among which are about twelve hundred free Blacks, who have served during the war."—Man. Com. Coun. (1780), 814.

Gov. Clinton writes from Poughkeepsie to Gen. Washington, who was at Rose Hill, near Princeton, N. J., expressing the fear that Carleton "may not give me timely Notice, as he promised to do in his first Letter, for the establishment of the Jurisdiction of the State over that District [the southern district] on his Departure, and Disorder will consequently take place, before Measures can be taken by the State to prevent it." He therefore asks "that the Troops on the Lines in Westchester County might have Orders to move to the Neighborhood of the City, the moment the British quit it," subject to his directions.—Public Papers of Gen. Clinton, VIII: 257. Washington replied on Oct. 23 that he had written to Gen. Knox, desiring him to confer with Clinton, "and make every necessary arrangement for taking possession of the city the moment the British quit it."—Writings of Geo. "Sir Guy Carleton, K: B; General and Commander in Chief of His Majesty's Forces, within the Colonies lying on the Atlantic Ocean from Nova Scotia to West Florida inclusive," orders an investigation made concerning the origin of the great fire of Sept. 21, 1776 (q.v.). Three British officers are appointed to take testimony.—From the original commission (MS.) in the N. Y. H. S; Report on Am. M.S.S. in Roy. Inst. of G. Brit., IV: 416. The following is a condensed statement of the testimony taken at the hearings:

Cornelius Bradford announces the evening on this day of “The Coffee House.—See L. M. R. K., III: 797. Bradford had been his death, he was described as “a steady patriot during the late arduous contest for American liberty,” and the Coffee House, “under his management, was kept with great dignity, both before and since the late war, and he revived its credit from that contempt into which it had fallen during the war.”—N. T. Packet, N. 10, 1786.

Firemen are advertised for, to fill vacancies in the engine company.—N. 15, 1783; New York Packet, 728.

The City Tavern is offered for sale. The advertisement describes the property as follows: “Those two elegant and well finished Corner Dwelling-Houses and Lots of Ground, being on the Westerly side of the Broad-Way; one of them formerly Roubale’s Tavern, together with the Assembly-Room, Out-Houses and Stables, adjoining the same. The Houses are in good repair, and every other Convenience to recommend them. The Situation of those other rented, being in an airy and most pleasant part of the city; they now rent together for £500 per Annum.

“—Royal Gaz., N. 5, 1783. Just a few weeks before (see O 13), John Cape had become the new proprietor of the tavern.
In the spring of 1784, the houses were again offered for sale. They were then described as the property of John Peter Delaney, Esq.
“one of the formerly Roubale’s, now Cape’s Tavern . . .” the tenant of Mr. Willard.”—N. T. Packet, M 4, 1784.

Persons having claims against “the Civil Departments of the Royal Artillery” are required to present them at the “Artillery Office, opposite St. Paul’s Church, Broad-Way.”—Royal Gaz., N 8, 1783.

Apparently, the issue of The New-York Gazettes and the Weekly Mercury of this date (issue No. 1673) is the last one, and the paper is discontinued.—Early Newspapers, II: 422; and N 11, 1776.

Cornelius Bradford, at the “New-York Coffee-house,” publishes the following notice: “All Masters of vessels arriving in this Port are hereby informed, that the subscriber who keeps the New-York Coffee-House, has prepared a book in which he will insert the names of such as may please to call on him, the names of their vessels, the ports from whence they came, and any other particular occurrences of their voyages, in order that the Gentlemen of this city, or travellers may obtain the earliest intelligence thereof; particular care will be taken in the delivery of all such letters as may be entrusted to his care.”—N. T. Merc., N. 10, 1783. See also Mr 11, 1784. Bradford had returned with the patriot army, and re-opened the Merchants’ Coffee House (see above, L. M. R. K., III: 951).

On or about Jan. 28, 1784, Cornelius Bradford and Malcolm McEwen entered into partnership in the "plumbing and pewtering" business at No. 70 Water St., nearly opposite the Crane Wharf; but Bradford continued as proprietor of the Coffee House.

Sir Guy Carleton writes to Gen. Washington that he hopes the willingness of British soldiers from New York may be accomplished before the end of the present month. He adds: “At all events, I propose to relinquish the posts at Kingbridge, and as far as McGowan’s Pass inclusive on this Island, on the 21st instant; to resign the possession of Herrick’s and Hempstead, with all to the estoward on Long Island, on the same day; and, if possible, to give up this city with Brooklyn, on the day following; and Paulus Hook, Dennis’s, and Staten Island, as soon after as may be practicable.” He points out the possible need of a free use of the “Shipyard,” after the town is evacuated, if any of the British ships should want repair.—Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 545.

Samuel Loomes re-establishes his newspaper in New York, after publishing it in Fishkill from Jan. 16, 1777 (q.v.), to Aug. 23, 1783 (q.v.), then the first part of 1784. See N 331; “Newspaper,” N 20, 1783;
the title The New York Packet. And the American Advertiser.—

Washington writes to West Point in reply to Carleton’s letter of Nov. 12 (q.v.): “To day I will see the governor of this State, and concert with him the necessary arrangements for taking possession of the city of New York, and the other posts mentioned in your letter, at the times therein specified.”—Writings of Geo.
Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 497. (This letter is not found in the Ford ed.).

Washington and Clinton are expected in New York on Satuday, Nov. 22.—Penn. Packet (Phil.), N. 25, 1783.

Ephraim Smith, inspector of markets, cuts down and carries to his house the bell of the Fly Market, assisted by a party of soldiers, and threatens to tear down “the whole of the erections there.”
This is to deprive the Americans (whom he calls “Dammed Rebels”) from enjoying this convenience. The commandant, on hearing of it, reprimands him and orders the restoration of the bell.—Penn.

Andrew Elliot, the British proprietor of the port, publishes a notice that, by order of the commandant, the business of his ofcice will be finally closed on Nov. 20.—Royal Gaz., N 15, 1783.

Gov. Clinton issues a proclamation at Poughkeepsie, in view of the expected withdrawal of British forces from the southern district of this state, requiring the council, which was constituted under the act of Oct. 23, 1779, to meet at Guyon’s Tavern, at East Chester, on Nov. 21, and requiring all citizens to yield due obedience to the laws of this state, and to preserve peace and good order. The council, as required by Sir Guy Carleton’s wish that the persons so appointed may be in New York on or before Nov. 22d, the day (later postponed) for the evacuation of the city.—Public Papers of Geo. Clinton, VIII: 281. Scott replied, on Nov. 19, that his right had been questioned to have the custody, not only of “the Records belonging to the Secretary’s Office,” but also “those belonging to the City and the other Courts of the Southern district.” He had been notified of this opinion by Mr. Elliot. Col. Van Cortlandt had called upon him this morning, “and offered to deliver up the City Records” to him; but he had shown him Elliot’s letter and the colonel had replied that he looked for Clinton’s order “for the delivery of the papers.”—Ibid., VIII: 286-87.

James Barclay advertises an auction sale, on this day, of a number of American vessels, heads, &c. “at the Friend’s Meeting [see My 5, 1774], upward end of Queen-street.”—Royal Gaz., N 15, 1783; L. M. R. K., III: 928.

James Hallett, coach-maker (who has been in business in New York since 1750, &c.), presents his bill to Sir Guy Carleton just prior to the British evacuation of the city. This document was found by Geo. W. W. Houghton, ed. of The Hub, among the Carleton MSS., in the library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Alhamere St., London. Carleton’s country-seat was at the present south-east corner of Varick and Charlton Sts.—Houghton, Coaches of Colonial N. Y. (1890), 28-29; Man. Com. Coun. (1852), 467. This was the Mortier house, “Richmond Hill.”—L. M. R. K., III: 921.

The following garrison orders are issued at West Point: “The British Army has been concluded, and the city of New-York to be evacuated on the 23d Instant. His Excellency the Commander in Chief proposes to celebrate the Peace at that Place, on Monday the First Day of December next, by a Display of the Fire-Works, and Illuminations, which were intended to have been exhibited at this Post, or such of them as have not been injured by Time, and can be removed.”—N. Y. Packet, N 20, 1783: Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 21, 1783. The celebration actually occurred on Dec. 6 (p. u.)

“Provisions are very dear; the Americans bring in meat, corn, and vegetables, the first and last however but in small quantities, and which they sell at high prices only for ready money, as specie is universally preferred on every part of the continent.”—From a N. Y. letter in London Chron., D 18-20, 1783.

1783 Dec. 7 The following advertisements, The Independent Journal, 01, the General Advertiser, makes its appearance. Webster and McLean, the publishers, advertised the new sheet in Rivington’s paper of Nov. 15, declaring that “Advertisements, Articles of Intelligence, &c. will be gratefully received at their Printing-Office, No. 32 Maiden-Lane.”—Royal Gaz., N 15, 1783. See also Early Newspapers, II: 421. A copy of the first issue is preserved in the N. Y. H. S. See further, Dec. 14.

It is requested of the gentlemen who have served in the American army, now in town, on the arrival of his excellency general Washington, to appear with their union cockades, in compliment to his excellency, and our great and good ally, Louis XVI.”—Penna. Packet, N 25, 1783.

It is too obvious . . . that nothing chagrins the Britons more than the Union Cockades which appears in the hats of the American officers, in honour to our worthy Allies.”—Salem Gaz., D 18, 1783.

At a meeting “of a large and respectable number of inhabitants (lately returned from a seven years’ exile) at Mr. Cape’s Tavern [see 1783, Aug. 1], Broad-Way,” the following resolutions are adopted, Col. Henry Rivington being “Moderator.” “That every person who remained in New York during the ‘late contest’ he requested to leave the room, and not be admitted to any future meetings of this body; that each person will do his utmost to ‘prevent any confusion that may arise, on and after the day when this city shall be evacuated by the troops of his Britannic Majesty,” as required by Gov. Clinton’s proclamation; and that certain named persons be a committee to meet at Simmons’ Tavern on the evening of Nov. 19, to form a Badge of distinction, to be worn on the day of evacuation—appoint the meeting, previous thereto, and agree as to the manner in which this body shall receive His Excellency the Governor, on that day.”—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., N 22, 1783; Holt’s Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 22, 1783. See N 20.

Sir Guy Carleton writes to Gen. Washington: “His Majesty’s troops will retire from Kingsbridge and McGowen’s Past on this Island, on the 20 instant, as notified to your Excellency in my letter of the 12th (q.v.); and I shall resign the possession of Herick’s and Hempstead, with all to the eastward on Long Island, the same day. Paulus Hook will be relinquished on the day following; but, though every exertion has been made with a view to evacuate this city at the same time, which it was my hope and intention to do, I now find it impracticable. Yet, notwithstanding the wids have been lately very unfavorable, if I have proper assurances that we shall retain a free and uninterrupted use of the Ship-Yard and Hallett’s Wharf in New York, and the Brewery and Bakehouse on Long Island (which the admiral represents as indispensable necessary for the shipping and sick seamen), until we can be ready to take our final departure, I shall retire from this city and from Brooklyn on Tuesday next [Nov. 25] at noon, or as soon after as the weather may permit, the enemy’s boards, &c. and the provision above specified Staten Island, with Dennis’s, New Utrecht, and the circumjacent district on Long Island, for such time as may be found absolutely requisite for the troops, that may then remain unprovided with transports.” Carleton warns Gen. Washington that he has learned of “a deliberate combination . . . to plunder this town whenever the King’s troops shall be withdrawn.”—Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 546.

Washington, however, states in his reply on Nov. 22 (writing at Harlem) that this latter intelligence does not appear to him to be well founded, and that arrangements have been made to prevent such outrage or disorder, unless the evacuation is so long delayed that “a much larger number of people shall be collected from the country, than have been assembled as yet for the purpose of going into town.”—Ibid., (Ford ed.), XI: 315.

The “Paquet Le Courier de L’Europe,” after a stormy passage, arrives from Port L’Orient, having as passenger “Thatcher, Esq Secretary to John Adams, Esq; Ambassador from the United States of America to the States General of Holland, charged, by the American Commissioners, with the Definitive Treaty, signed at Paris, (on the 3d of September,) and on the part of Great Britain, by Mr. Hartry, with which he, on Thursday morning [Nov. 20], sat off to deliver it to the Honourable General Mifflin, President of Congress.”—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz. (Supplement), N 22, 1783. See also Holt’s Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 22, 1783.

On this ship also came “Hector St. John, Esq. appointed by the Court of France to be Consul, and Supernintendents of the Paquets now established between this City and Port L’Orient.”—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz. (Supplement), N 22, 1783. See also the issues of this paper of Dec. 10, 17 and 20 for further announcements regarding the five ships of this packet line. Besides “Le Courier de L’Europe,” they are “Le Courier de L’Amérique,” “Le Courier de New-York,” “Le Courier de l’Orient,” and “L’Allegator.” The “design” of the line was “to facilitate the communication between France and America, and the concerns of commerce between both countries.”

At a meeting held this evening at Cape’s Tavern the following resolutions are adopted, Col. Frederick Weissenfels being in the chair:

1. Resolved, That the Badge of Distinction, to be worn at the Reception of the Governor, on his Entrance in this City, be a Union Cockade, of black and white Ribband, worn on the left Breast; and a Laurel in the Hat.

II. Resolved, That the Place of Meeting be at the Bull’s Head Tavern, now kept by Mrs. Verien, on Saturday next, at 9 o’Clock, A. M.

III. Resolved, That if it appear eligible, his Excellency Governor Clinton, and his Excellency General Washington (should he accompany the Governor) shall be received by the Citizens, drawn up in the Form of a Square, and in that manner conducted to his Quarters.

IV. Resolved, That the Field and other Officers, who now 1783; Serve, or heretofore have served, in the Continental Army, be 20 conducting his Excellency.

V. Resolved, That Mr. Samuel Bruno [and twelve otheral.

VI. Resolved, That the Committee do meet To-Morrow, 11 21 o’Clock, To-Morrow Morning, and march in a Column to the Bull’s Head, in the Bowery Lane. None of his brethren of the Exceldes, the Officers will be wheeled by Platoons; and form a Column in the Rear of the American advanced Guard, and in Front of the Governor and General. The Citizens at the same Time, will march by Files, on each flank of their Excellencies, and form a Column in the Rear.

Colonel Weissende is requested to lead a Column of the American Officers."—Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 22, 1783.

Some "staunch and avowed friends to the American cause, living in the vicinity of Chapel-street," on a supposition that Gen.
Washington and Gov. Clinton were to make their “public entry” into the city (they had reached Harlem the preceding day, p. v.), hoist the American flag on their houses," in compliment to those illustrious characters.

In a short time this "procured them a visit from the humane and polite Captain William Cunningham (le Bourreau General) at the head of a party of British Hannibals, in all the pomp of military parade. Monsieur le Bourreau, with his usual politeness, having pronounced some scores of double-headed Danns, besides the gentled epithepts of Rebel Bitches, &c. without number, in the true mileuiae cadence, proceeded with his party, and his train, to tear down the obnoxious colours, and carry them in triumph to his Den, where it is said they were hoisted with the British colours over them."

Also, a "frazett" is reported to have happened at the Coffee House in consequence of a British officer having, unprovokedly, grossly insulted an American officer. "The British son of Bellona received the discipline of the horsewhelp, besides about half a dozen pedes d’affiche and penners."

None of his brethren interfered or countenanced him in the least, as they were eye-witnesses of his being the aggressor."—Salem (Mass.) Gaz., D 12, 1783. See also N 25.

John Holt re-commences publication of his weekly newspaper (formerly the Journal—see Ag 29, 1776) in New York, after its care in Kingston and Poughkeepsie (see J 7, 1777; My 11, 1778).
He now calls it The Independent New-York Gazette, and gives it a new setting, being now printed with No. 1.—Bingham, A. A. S.
Proc. (1917), 443; ibid. (1918), 90. In a letter headed "The Printer to his Customers," Holt says:

"Amidst a Variety of new Candidates for your Favour in the News-Paper Business—I trust my Countrymen will not be regardless of the Interest of an old Friend, who has spent the prize of his Life in their Service, and to the utmost of his Abilities, always acted with Consistency and Uniformity for the Public Good."—For the Truth of this, he relies upon the Evidence of every one who was acquainted with his Publications; they were all calculated to promote Virtue, Religion, useful Knowledge, or innocent Amusement.—When the Differences between Great-Britain and America first arose, he laboured as far as the influence of his Business render it possible, to remove him entirely from Enmity and Conspiracies, which were not till after the British court had avowed the hostile attack at Lexington; there then remained no alternative, but resistance or slavery.

After this, his Publications tended to animate his Countrymen to a vigorous Defence of their just Rights and Freedom.

In Pursuit of this Object, he freely published the Sentiments of Fremont, though in Opposition to the Prowess and Menaces of a powerful Body, Men of Power in high Stations, and though the weak Endeavours of an Individual may only be counted as a drop to the Ocean, yet to our united Efforts, Heaven has been pleased to grant the Success which we are now about to celebrate, and on which we desire to join our Countrymen in reciprocal Congratulations, etc.

"We have only to desire the kind indulgence of our Readers for the Defects in this Paper, which at this Time appears under every Disadvantage—Hastily published, in a House not fitted for the Purpose, nor our printing Letter and Materials, yet come to Town, except a small Quantity, and that in Disorder; nor have our Correspondents had Time to get their Intelligence into a proper Channel of Conveyance. When these Impediments are removed, we hope to give our Customers as much Reason to be satisfied with our Publications as ever they had formerly, nor shall we be Ajustidious to please."—Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 22, 1783. For later changes in name and ownership, see Early Newspapers, II: 424; and D 13.
With the issue of this date (No. 747), Rivington changes the title of his newspaper (see D 13, 1777) to Rivington's New-York General and Universal Advertiser.—Early Newspapers, II: 428.

See further, D 31.

Ruger's brewery, "on Brewster's hill," and the dwelling-house adjoining, are destroyed by fire.—N. Y. Packet, N. 24, 1785. Lieut. Von Krafft, now on shipboard, describes the scene in his journal:

"The city was all full of Rebels, although all the watches in the city were still occupied by the English, ... In the night time between 11 and 12 o'clock a terrible fire occurred in New York. Then the ringing of alarm bells and the uproar made by the disgustingly drunken sailors of our ship who had been in the city until late, made it quite a restless night. The fire continued until 3 in the morning, when we could see no more."—Von Krafft's Jour, 199.

In conformity with the notification given by Carleton to Washing-tion on Nov. 19 (q. o.), he now writes to him: "I purpose to withdraw from this place to-morrow at noon, by which time I conclude your troops will be near the barrier. The guards from the redoubts and on the East River shall be first withdrawn; but an officer will be sent out to give information to your advanced guard when the troops move."—Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 547. For the "barrier," see N. 45.

A broadside bearing this date is circulated, stating that, "The Committee appointed to conduct the Order of receiving their Excellencies Governor Clinton and General Washington, "beg Leave to inform their Fellow-Citizens, that the Troops, under the Command of Major-General Knox, will take Possession of the City at the Hour agreed on, Tuesday next; as soon as this may be performed, he will request the Citizens who may be assembled on Horseback, on the Bowling-Green, the lower end of the Broad-Way, to accompany him to meet their Excellencies Governor Clinton and General Washington, at the Bull's Head, in the Bowery—the Citizens on Foot to assemble at or near the Tea-water-Pump at Fresh-water.

"ORDER OF PROCESSION:

A Party of Horse will precede their Excellencies and be on their flanks—after the General and Governor, will follow the Lieutenant-Governor and Members of the Council for the temporary Government of the Southern Parts of the State—The Gentlemen on Horse-back, eight in Front—those on Foot, in the Rear of the Horse, in like Manner. Their Excellencies, after passing down Queen-Street, and the Line of Troops up the Broadway, will halt at Cape's Tavern."

The rest of the broadside relates to good order during the ceremonies, patrols, night watch, etc.—See Pl. 45-3, Vol. V, where the document is reproduced from the unique original in the author's collection; or see a facsimile in Man. Com. Coun. (1861), 474. See, further, N. 25.

"We are credibly informed that his excellency governor Clinton, will take his public entrance into this city to-morrow. He will certainly be received with every mark of distinction due to so great and dignified a character. The grateful citizens long sensible of his extraordinary virtues, will naturally exult as one man on his return, and anticipate the happy effects consequent on their being subjected to the government of so wise and judicious a legislator. "It is expected that his excellency general Washington, will accompany the Governor. There is no doubt but that the strictest decency and decorum will be observed on the occasion by all ranks of people. They will naturally view him with that pleasing wonder, and heart-felt sincerity, which must expand the human mind on, the appearance of a hero returning crowned with laurels, (after a long absence) whose singular and inflexible probity, constantly commands universal esteem; and whose individual merit as a guardian and protector of public liberty, is unparalleled in history."

The final report of the city vestry during the Revolution continues New York's financial records (see Ap. 30, 1782) from Nov. 1 down to this date, the eve of the evacuation of the city by the Brit- ish. The report is in Proc., Bd. of Ald., LXXXVI: 225-26.

"Last Tuesday evening Nov. 24 the American troops marched from Halsey to the Bowery Lane. They remained there near the present junction of The Bowery and Third Ave. until about one o'clock, when the British Troops left the Posts in the Bowery, and the American troops marched into, and took Possession of the City, in the following Order, viz.

1. A Corps of Dragoons.
2. Advanced Guard of Light Infantry.
3. A Corps of Artillery.
5. Battalion of Massachusetts Troops.
6. Rear Guard.

"After the Troops had taken Possession of the City, the General and Governor made their Public Entry in the following manner:

1. Their Excellencies the General and Governor, with their Suites, on Horseback.
2. The Lieutenant-Governor, and the Members of the Council, for the temporary Government of the Southern District, four abreast.
3. Major General Knox, and the Officers of the Army, eight abreast.
4. Citizens on Horseback, eight abreast.
5. The Speaker of the Assembly and Citizens, on Foot, eight abreast.

"Their Excellencies the Governor and Commander in Chief, were escorted by a Body of Westchester Light Horse, under the command of Captain Delavan.

"The Procession proceeded down Queen [Pearl] street, and through the Broadway, to Cape's Tavern.

"The Governor gave a Public Dinner at France's Tavern; at which the Commander in Chief and other General Officers were present.

"After Dinner, the following Toasts were drank by the Com- pany:

1. The United States of America.
2. His most Christian Majesty.
3. The United Netherlands.
4. The King of Sweden.
5. The American Army.
6. The Fleet and Armies of France, which have served in America.

7. The Memory of those Heroes, who have fallen for our Freedom.
8. May our Country be grateful to her Military Children.
9. May Justice support what Courage has gained.
10. The Vindicators of the Rights of Mankind in every Quarter of the Globe.
11. May America be an Asylum to the persecuted of the Earth.
12. May a close Union of the States guard the Temple they have erected to Liberty.
13. May the Remembrance of This Day be a Lesson to Princes. "The arrangement and whole conduct of this march, with the tranquility which succeeded it, through the day and night, was admirable! and the greatful citizens will ever feel the most affectionate impressions, from that elegant and efficient disposition which prevailed during the whole event."—Rivington's N. T. Gaz., N 26, 1783; Holt's Ind. N. T. Gaz., N. 29, 1783. See also Winser, VI: 746.

John Austin Stevens, writing in 1885, gave the following account of the evacuation, which contains some interesting details: "... On Monday the 24th the British Commander gave final notice that he would withdraw from New York at noon of the following day, at which time he presumed the American troops would be near the 'barrier.' This was a part of a fortified line across the island, originally made in 1775, and later strengthened by the British; it crossed the Bowery on the line of the present Grand Street. The American pickets were already stationed near the Dove Tavern, on the old post road within five miles of the city, near the present Sixty-fifth Street. The commander appointed to conduct the order of reception issued a notice the same day inviting the honorary escort to assemble on horseback at the Bowling Green, near the lower end of Broadway, where Major-Gen. Knox would request them to accompany him to meet the commander at the Bull's Head on the Bowery; the citizens on foot to assemble at or near the Tea Water Pump.

"At eight o'clock on the morning after memorable 25th November, the troops which had been stationed at McGowan's Pass, the light infantry acting as main guard, were marched, to the Bowery Lane in the upper ward, and were then halted until one o'clock, when the British troops left their post at the barrier, and the Americans, consisting of a corps of dragoons, an advanced guard of light infantry, a corps of artillery, a battalion of light infantry,

General Knox commanding, entered the city [Mrs. Lamb says the troops under Knox marched from Harlem "to a point near the Fresh-Water Pond, where they remained seated on the grass until about one o'clock in the afternoon], and marching through the Bowling Green to Chatham street, then through Queen, now Pearl Street, to its junction with Wall Street, thence through Wall to the Broadway, where the main body was drawn up in line in front of Cape's Tavern (later the City Hotel, now 1853 the Boreed Building), while a detail of infantry and artillery proceeded to Fort George at the Bowling Green, where the last British colors were hauled from the flag staff and the act of occupation was finally completed.

"The pageant of the day was now opened. General Knox with the honorary escort of citizens rode back from the Bowling Green to the Bull's Head Tavern, which stood near the site of the late Bowery, now Thalia Theatre. Here the citizens were gathered about the old Tea Water Pump, which stood at the corner (of Baxter and Chatham Streets, and the General and Governor with the civic procession made their public entry."— Rep. of the Joint Com. on the Centennial Ceb. of the Evac. of N. Y.
by the British, with hist. introd. by John Austin Stevens (1888), 19.

It has been related that the column moved slowly and that, as it passed the historic Beekman house on the shores of the East River, "these officers, their staffs and a few civilians accompanied, were entertained in the drawing-room with punch made with lemons plucked from trees growing in the green-house."— De Lancy, Memoirs of James William Beckman (The St.

A letter from New York, dated Nov. 26, stated that the British "cut away the halarys from the flag staff in the fort, (formerly fort George) and likewise gazed the tents so that we were unable to have a ladder to fix a new rope. Invention prevented any delay; for the glorious stripes were fixed in the sod, and a discharge of thirteen fired. The city has been remarkably quiet."—Penn.
Parker, D 2, 1783.

Commenting on this final act of the British, a newspaper contributor said it was a demonstration of "their meanness of spirit and their inability to conciliate the feelings of the Americans; men who have proved themselves their superiors in every virtue, and who may without arrogance be denominated their Conquerors."

—Salem (Mass.) Gaz., D 4, 1783.

Lieut. Anthony Glean, who was one of the officers invited by Washington to march with him into the city on Nov. 25, 1783, states, in 1850, that he joined him near Fort Washington, "and marched with the main army into the city, filling and occupying the different posts that the British evacuated. Gen. Washington halted the army near the old tea-water pump, when the officers of the revolution formed into a line, and marched through the British army, then in the fields, (now the Park) which was on the eve of embarking—while the American army proceeded down Pearl street and all the fleet to Trinity Church, (his burst) and there again met those officers and fired a salute of 13 guns."—N. T.
Gaz., N 26, 1850.

Capt. John Van Dyck, reviewing and criticizing the autobiographical statements of Lieut. Glean, wrote, in 1831: "I first met a troop of American horse in front of our troops, commanded by Captain John Stokes (a native of New York), half way up Chatham-street to Pearl-street, from whence I went down Broadway to Fort George, hearing or seeing no salute of 13 guns being fired at Trinity Church." Referring to other features of Glean's biography, Van Dyck says: "Instead of the flag staff standing on the Battery, it stood on Fort George, on the north end, or bastion; and the fort walls were about twenty feet above the battery. I have known the flag staff to stand there for 66 years. I lived in the vicinity of the Battery and Fort, and I never knew a flag staff on the Battery, until the Corporation of New York had one put up at, or after, the taking down of Fort George. [See also Vol. I. p. 434-35.]

"I was on Fort George, and within two feet of the flag staff.
The halarys were unreved, the cleats were knocked off, the flag gentlemen, we walk down to Rivington's bookstore; he is said to be a very pleasant kind of a fellow." Amazed, as the officers were, at the idea of visiting such a man, they of course prepared to accompany the Chief.\textsuperscript{99} Custis goes on to relate that, arrived there, Rivington took Washington into his private room, the door of which "closed very imperfectly and soon became ajar, when the officers distinctly heard the chinking of two heavy purses of gold as they were successively placed on the table."—Custis, \textit{Recollections of Washington}, 293-94, 296-97.

James Duane, a member of the "Council for the Government of the Southern District of New York," who entered New York with Washington, Clinton, and his fellow-exiles, took possession of his dilapidated property. "He found his houses in King (now Pine) street, and at the corner of Water street and Fly market, almost entirely destroyed. His farm, as he calls it, consisting of about twenty acres, at what is now called Gramercy park and its vicinity, was in pretty good order, the house having been occupied by one of the British generals.

\textsuperscript{99} The council took possession of the property of Trinity church, set aside an election of vestrymen that had been held just before the Americans regained New-York, and ordered a new election, in which Mr. Duane was chosen one of the church wardens, and other whigs vestrymen. This election was afterwards confirmed by act of Legislature, and the persons elected chose as rector of the church the Rev. Samuel Provoost, a whig who had left New-York when the British took possession, and who was afterwards the Bishop of this Diocese. The property was afterwards restored, and Mr. Duane continued to be elected church warden. . . ."—From Hon. Samuel W. Jones's "Memoir of James Duane," in \textit{Doc. Hist. N. Y.} (4to ed.), IV: 650.

"The number of negro slaves taken away by the British from New York in 1783, was upwards of three thousand. The value of each is moderately estimated at 200 dollars, which gives 600,000 dollars for the whole." It was estimated in 1795 that, with 12 years' interest added, this would amount to $1,500,000.—\textit{N. J. State Gaz.}, S 15, 1795.

CHAPTER IV

PERIOD OF ADJUSTMENT AND RECONSTRUCTION

NEW YORK AS THE STATE AND FEDERAL CAPITAL

1783-1811

A BRIEF summary of the principal events of the Period of Adjustment and Reconstruction, from the evacuation of New York by the British troops (see N 2) to the completion and filing of the Commissioners' Map of the city on April 1, 1811, is contained in Vol. 1, Chap. IV.

The Definitive Treaty (signed at Paris on Sept. 3, 1783) was published in New York, the text being taken from English newspapers which arrived in New York on Nov. 23. — Rivington's N. Y. Gaz., N 26, 1783; C. F. N 30, 1782.

The ninth session of the continental congress under the Confederation opens at Annapolis. It adjourned from day to day until Dec. 13, when a sufficient number of delegates were present to proceed to business. — Jour. of Cong., IV: 316.

An address, dated Nov. 22, is given to "His Excellency George Clinton, Esq., Governor of the State of New York, Commander in Chief of the Militia, and Admiral of the Navy," by the "Citizens of New York, who have returned from Exile, in Behalf of themselves and their suffering Brethren." It expresses the good will of the people, and their pledge "to support order and good government in the community," over which he has been elected to preside.

A similar address, dated Nov. 22 (altered to 26), signed by a committee of 13 citizens, "at request of the Meeting" headed by Thomas Randall and Daniel Phoenix, is presented to Washington. These addresses and the replies of Clinton and Washington are published in Rivington's N. Y. Gaz., N 29, 1783; Hist. Mag., 2d ser., I: 42-46, 166-67; Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 327-29. For facsimiles of the original address to Washington and his reply, see ibid. (1880), opp. p. 474, which shows the date of the address "22" altered to "26."

William A. Duer, who, as a boy, came to New York with relatives shortly after the close of the war, wrote in 1849 the following description of the city as it was at this time:

"... The district was extended ... up both sides of Broadway to Rector-street, with the exception of some half dozen houses left standing near the 'Lower,' or present 'Battery.'

"No visible attempts had been made since the fire to remove the ruins; ... The semi-circular front of old Trinity still reared its glittering head, ... But before reaching it, the gloom was cheered by ... the sight of some remaining pickets of a stockade in the lane opposite Velestengen Hill, which once formed a portion of the old city wall, crossed Broadway diagonally, passed down the opposite street, and gave to it its name.

"... The old [City] Hall, before its conversion to the use of the federal government, stood upon open brick arches, under which you passed from street to street, in one direction, and, in another, along the same street in which we were travelling. Nearly opposite, was the modest dwelling of Alexander Hamilton, upon part of the site of the Mechanics' Bank. Beyond, at the intersection of Smith (now William) street, we beheld the effigies of a more widely celebrated, but not more illustrious man. There, erect upon its pedestal, was the statue of the elder Pitt, mutilated and defaced in resentment of his speech against the acknowledgement of our Independence.

"Our family party now wheeled to the left, and passing up Smith-street, till we came to the corner of King, now Pine-street, we took up our abode for the winter at the family mansion of the Philips, then kept as a lodging-house ... but afterwards, before its fall, more renowned as the Bank Coffee House, kept by the inimitable host Niblo, so famous as a caterer for the public taste. ..."

"On the next May-day [1784], ... we arrived at the upper extremity of Broadway, at the utmost limit of the City pavement, where we took possession of the house opposite St. Paul's Church, now [1849] occupied by the Chemical Bank. ... The fields were open to the north, as far as a line ranging eastwardly from Warren-street, where the prospect was bounded by ... the Bridewell, the Poorhouse, the Gable and the Gullows. Towards the west, however, there was nothing to obstruct the view of the North River, but two low houses at the corner of Vesey-street, and the College building, as yet unfurnished with wings, and unadorned with stucco. The 'fields,' as the area comprised in the Park was then called, were green, but neither enclosed nor planted, and the only trees in sight, besides the young, now old, ones in front of the College, were the stripping growth that peered above the tea, and mead and cake gardens along the west side of the fields.

"Although the streets leading from Broadway to the river, had been laid out as high as Warren-street, yet they were but partially built upon, and that, for the most part, with houses of an inferior description. None above Dey-street had been regulated and paved; nor had the ridge, commencing near the Battery, and extending the length of the island, been dog through as far even as Cortlandt-street. Great Dock-street, or that part of Pearl, between Whitehall and Coenties Slip, with the other streets in the immediate neighborhood of Fort George, within which the Colonial Government-house was situate, had long been considered the Court-end of the town; but, even before the revolution, Wall-street was regarded as a rival seat of fashion to which it established an exclusive claim, and maintained it until superseded by Park Place, or Robinson-street, as it had previously been called; whose pretensions in that respect have, in their turn, become [1849] nearly obsolete. Little Dock-street, now [1849] merged in Water-street, and that part of the original Water-street which lay adjacent to the Albany Pier, were occupied by the river trade; while the remainder of Water-street, and such parts of Front-street as had already been recovered from the river, formed the emporium of foreign commerce. This, indeed, was the case as far up as the Coffee House Slip, and gradually extended to Maiden Lane, at the foot of which were the Vly Market, and the Brooklyn Ferry; whilst at the head of it stood the Oswego Market, fronting on Broadway. Above, on the East River, as far as Dover-street, the wharves were chiefly improved by our eastern brethren with their cargoes of notions, or occupied by our neighbors from Long Island, with their more substantial freights of oysters, clams, and fine white sand. Beyond Dover-street, the ship-yards commenced, extending, at first, no farther than to the 'New,' or, as it is now called, 'Pike' Slip." (A foot-note adds: "The Shipyards were gradually removed towards Corlaer's Hook, and now [1840] extend beyond it.")

The Fresh-Water Pond, or Collect (see descr. of Pl. 78-a, I: 431), was lined, on its southern and eastern banks, "with surfaces, potteries, breweries, taverns, rope-walks, and other manufactories; all drawing their supplies of water from the pond. ..."

The ground between the Collect and Broadway rose gradually from its margin to the height of one hundred feet, and nothing can exceed in brilliancy and animation the prospect it presented on a fine winter day, when the icy surface was alive with skaters darting in every direction ...; while the hill side was covered with spectators, rising as in an amphitheatre, tier above tier, ..."

Walter Rutherford returns to his home at the north-west corner of Broadway and Vesey St.—Rutherford, Family Records and Events, 134. He described the location as “far up the street with an open square in front, and good air, as there are but few houses in the neighborhood.” Here he lived until his death in 1804.—Hold, 109. See Pi., 1: 516, Vol. I; Pi., 2: 253.

The operation of Paulus Hook Ferry was resumed by Abraham Meier after the Revolution, during which it was suspended.—*M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 124. See My 1, 1774. On March 16, 1785, the common council allowed the widow of Abraham Meier $50 per annum for the term from Nov. 26, 1783, until May 1, 1785, and ordered a new grant of the ferry issued to her, at an annual rent of $50.—Hold, 1: 124.

The fire engineers of the several fire engines and companies of New York represent to Gov. Clinton, in an address, the condition of the fire apparatus and their desire to conduct themselves so as to gain the applause of the citizens. A list of firemen is appended, showing that there were at this time in the city 14 engine companies, 2 hook-and-ladder companies, 16 foremen, and 223 firemen.—See facsimile reproduction of the original address, in Man. Com. Coun. (1856), opp. p. 328; Hist. Mag., 2d ser., I: 45-46; Costello, Our Firemen, 42-43.

Washington, accompanied by a number of general and other officers, with a detachment of the army, waits “at the water side” to receive the minister of France. The latter, perhaps on account of bad weather, did not arrive.—Ind. N. Y. Gen., N 29, 1783.

The citizens “who have lately returned from exile” give “an elegant Entertainment” at Cape’s Tavern to Gov. Clinton and the council. Gen. Washington, the officers of the army, and about 300 gentlemen “graced the feast.” After dinner the following toasts were drunk:

1. The United States.
2. His Most Christian Majesty.
3. The United Netherlands.
4. The King of Sweden.
5. The Protectors of the Rights of Mankind.
6. The American Ministers at Foreign Courts.
7. May an uninterrupted Commerce soon repair the ravages of war.
8. May the Trade of America center with those who have been foremost to defend her Liberties.
10. May the Spirit which produced our happy Constitution, be its continual Support.
11. May the Faction be chained in the regions of darkness.
12. May the Sun of American Liberty spread its influence to the end of the earth.

“The evening was spent in good humour, hilarity and mirth, becoming the joyous occasion of their meeting.”—Penn. Packet, D 12, 1783.

The council which governs the Southern District of New York (see O 43, 1779) passes an ordinance to prevent extortions and other irregularities on the part of carmen.—Ind. N. Y. Gaz., D 6, 1783.

The post-office is opened by Deputy-postmaster William Bedlow, at No. 38, Smith-street, in the house formerly Judge Horsemanden’s. He informs the public that “After next week, the Southern, Eastern, and Northern Posts, will arrive every Wednesday afternoon, and set out on Thursday, Ten o’Clock, A.M.—Holt’s Ind. N. Y. Gaz., N 29, 1783; Stone, Hist. of N. Y. City, Appendix IV, p. 19. See also Mr 17 and Ap 23, 1779.

Robert R. Livingston, writing to John Jay, says: “...we have been five days in town without the smallest disturbance.” The shops of royalists “were opened the day after we came in, and Rivington himself goes on as usual [see N 25]... the race of Tories will not, after all, be totally extinct in America.”—Corresp. and Pub. Papers of John Jay (ed. by H. P. Johnston, 1891), III: 98.

“The Astraea Frigate, and twenty sail of empty transports are lately arrived at Sandy Hook, the latter to carry to Europe the British troops, &c. at present on Staten and Long Islands.”—Rivington, N. Y., N 17, 1783.

A New Yorker writing on Nov. 30 said: “Last night, at half past ten, we had a severe shock of an earthquake: I was writing in my parlor, when, in a moment, without any apparent signs, either in air (for it was quite clear and star-light), or of wind (for it was rather a calm preceding it), I was thrown off my seat, not forward; the birds in their cages, hanging against a brick wall, thrown off their perches; windows, glasses, china, all shattered. It was repeated, not quite so violent, about half past two this morning. On the island it was felt along the southern aspect with the greatest force. The cattle ran howling in the greatest distress imagin- able: the birds left their roosts, and sought protection in flying about. It is an awful piece of business.”—London Chron., Ja 10-13, 1784.

Sir Guy Carleton, on board the “Ceres” off Staten Island, Dec. 1, writes to Washington: “I hope we shall be able to embrace the remainder of his Majesty’s troops from Long Island and Staten Island, and take our final departure on the 4th instant.”—*Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 47; Emmet Coll., No. 7094. Washington replied on Dec. 2: “I... sincerely wish that your Excellency, with the troops under your orders, may have a safe and pleasant passage.”—Ibid., VIII: 500.

Col. Timothy Pickering, quartermaster-general, writes to Gov. Clinton that he has viewed the barracks and other buildings erected in this state by the British, and has proposed to sell them; but that he finds in New York City that “the proprietors of some of the land on which such buildings stand are desirous of considering them as subject to their claims by way of compensation for the damages they have sustained from the British.” While he thinks these demands “may be allowed by the Government,” he does not feel that the numbers who have suffered by the enemy; nevertheless, to prevent disputes, he asks the advice of the governor and of counsel.—*From facsimile of Pickering’s letter, in Man. Com. Coun. (1859), opp. p. 481. See, further, My 4, 1784.

A “very elegant entertainment” is given at Cape’s Tavern by Gov. Clinton to “his Excellency the Chevalier de la Lorrene, Ambassador from his Most Christian Majesty to the United States.” General Washington, the principal officers of this state and of the army, and over a hundred gentlemen were present, “who passed the day and evening, with great conviviality.”—Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 32.

“In the evening the Grand Fire Works, in celebration of the Declaration of Peace, between Great Britain and the United States of North America, were exhibited at the Bowling Green, in the Broadway.” A complete list of the exhibits, numbering about 135 features, was published in a report of the event. Balloons, rockets, set pieces, and figures of various kinds were shown in great variety. “These magnificent Fire Works indefinitely exceeded every former exhibition in the United States: The prodigious concourse of spectators assembled on the occasion, expressed their pleasure in loud and grateful clangors.”—*Man. Com. Coun. (1870), 532-35. This account published in the Manual was probably taken from *Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 3, 1783, for the issue of Dec 6 makes reference to it. The issue of Dec. 3 is missing from the files of the N. Y. P. L. and N. Y. H. S.; but see another account in Penn. Packet, D 12, 1783.

Washington writes from New York to the Hon. Thomas Mifflin, president of congress, that the evacuation of New York was postponed two days on account of bad weather. When the British troops left, on the 25th, and a detachment of the American army marched into the city, civil power was immediately restored, and “the most perfect regularity and good order have prevailed ever since.”—Writings of Geo. Washington (Sparks ed.), VIII: 505.

Capt. James Duncan of the British navy, writing on Governor’s Island, reports to Gov. Clinton that the remaining British troops are withdrawn from that island. Later in the morning, on board the “Centurion,” off New York, he sent to Clinton “a description List of the different buildings &c. on Governors Island. . . . “The Convalescent’s Hospital” appears to be the principal building on the Gov.”—Penn. Packet, N 27, 1783.

James Hearn conducts an “Eating-House and Cook-Shop” in Maiden Lane “at the Sign of the Chequers, near the Fly Market,” which he announces is to be called “Hearn’s Porter House.”—Departing from the usual tavern method, Hearne advertises that he has added a plan "whereby any person may eat of a variety of dishes for his dinner, if he pleases, or have a plate cut off one joint at a small expense."—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 3, 1783.

Shepard Kollock begins the publication of a weekly paper titled The New-York Gazetteer, and Country Journal.—Early Newspapers, II: 423; Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 431. See J a 5, 1784.

Six weeks after his arrival in New York, Wriggly and his officers are of the army in town assembled at Francesca Tavern, to take a final leave of their illustrious, Gracious, and much loved Commander, General Washington. The passions of human nature were never more tenderly agitated than in this interesting and distressful scene. His Excellency having filled a glass of wine, thus addressed his brave fellow soldiers: 'With a heart full of love and gratitude, I convey to you; in the most devoted manner, the assurance that the days may be prosperous and happy as your former ones have been gracious and honorable.'

The words produced extreme sensibility on both sides, they were answered by warm expressions and fervent wishes, from the Gentlemen of the Army, whose truly patriotic feelings, it is not in our power to convey to the reader. Soon after this scene was closed, his Excellency the Governor, the Honourable, the Council and citizens of the first distinctions, waited on the General and in terms most affectionate took their leaves.

The Corps of the Light Infantry was drawn up in a line, the Commander in Chief, about two o'clock, passed through them, on his way to Whitehall, where he embarked in his barge for Powles Hook, where he took his seat, in the General House, to make a short stay at Philadelphia, will thence proceed to Annanapoli, where he will resign his Commission of General of the American Army into the hands of the Continental Congress, from whom it was immediately after which, his Excellency will set out for his seat, named Mount Vernon, in Virginia, emulating the example of his model, the virtuous Roman General, who, victorious, left the tented field, covered with honour, and withdrew from public life, aequum cum dignitate.—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 6, 1783; The Literary Diary of Ezra Stiles, III: 101; The Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), X: 348, 356; Winsor, VI: 747. See also L. M.
R. k., title "Whitewall Ferry," III: 944; and description of Pl. 167-

The Salem (Mass.) Gaz., D 18, 1783, reports the event with the following additional paragraphs: "The respectable body convened on this important occasion, comprised the courageous soldier, the invulnerable patriot, the sincere friend to the interests of society.
Deeply impressed with a steadfast sensibility of his Excellency’s amiable manners, and conspicuous virtues, an earnest anxiety to acknowledge them was minutely legible thro’out the whole meeting, and excited the sympathy of every heart and mind present.

"An affection so laudable and sincere on the part of the com-community, could not be enhanced by the highest finished eloquence; yet it must in strict justice be allowed, that they received his Excellency’s concise and characteristic address with undescribable emotions of admiration and unforgotten esteem; and replied to in animated terms, which reflect the highest honour on men vying with each other to express their veneration for so dignified a commonwealth, and its illustrious founders.—His Excellency the Governor, the attendant officers of state, and many citizeens of repute, gave the most conspicuous proofs of their regard for the General’s true merit, in a sincere and affectionate farewell."

James Thacher, M. D., enlarging upon the foregoing account of the farewell at Francesca Tavern, said of Washington: “Having drank tea with me, he was added, I cannot come to take my leave, but shall be obliged to you, if each of you will come and take me by the hand.” General Knox being nearest, turned to him. Incapable of uttering, Washington, in tears, grasped his hand, embraced and kissed him. In the same affectionate manner he took leave of each succeeding officer. In every eye was the tear of dignity and sensibility, and a word was articulated to interrupt the eloquent silence, and tenderness of the scene. . . .”—A Military Journal (1821), 422–23.

In a letter to Lafayette, Washington stated that on Dec. 7
the harbour of New York “was finally cleared of the British flag.”—

We are informed that their Excellencies the Commanders in Chief of the British fleet and army, in America, with the last division of troops on board, have left the island on their passage to England. General Sir Guy Carleton, Dean Poyntz, Esq.; Postmaster-General, Brook Watson, Esq; Commissary-General, William Smith, Esq; and a number of Gentlemen were passengers in the Ceres frigate, commanded by Captain Hawkins. In the Cyclops frigate, by Captain Christian, were Hugh Wallace and James Jaunsey, Enquires, and many other Gentlemen.—Rivington’s N.

The Whig members of the New-York Assembly (see Aug. 6, 1781), resumes its deliberations at Simmons’s Tavern, and adjourns to meet in the long room of the Coffee House.—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 10, 1783. John Simmons’s tavern was on the w. c. corner of Wall and Nassau St. (see 1779, O 8), and the “Coffee House,” at this time run by Cornelius Bradford, was on the s. c. corner of Wall and Water Sts.

Rev. John H. Livingston, D. D., after serving the Reformed Dutch Church in Poughkeepsie (see Aug. 6), 1781, resumes his pastoral work in New York.—Reed, Rev., VII: 4390; Demarest,Hist. of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, 97; Jour. Presbyterian Hist. Soc. (1917–8), IX: 355–67. Services are resumed in him in the Dutch Church in Garden St.—Dissoyay, The Earliest Churches of N. Y., 28–29. This church had not been occupied and damaged as the other churches had.—De Witt, Discourse, 41–42.
The North Dutch Church, where he formerly resided, was not reopened for worship until Dec., 1784 (p. v.), and the Middle Dutch Church until July 4, 1790 (p. v.). See also N 18, 1776, and Memoirs of Rev. John H. Livingston (1829). In 1810, Livingston became president of Queen’s (now Rutgers) College, at New Brunswick, N. J.

Gov. Clinton issues a proclamation requiring the senate and assembly to meet at the Hall, on Tuesday, Jan. 6, 1784.

Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 13, 1783.

In accordance with Washington’s proclamation, issued at Poughkeepsie on Nov. 16, this Thursday is celebrated as a “Day of Public Thanksgiving, for the final establishment of American Inde-dependence, and the long desired restoration of Civil Government, in the blessings of an Honourable Peace.” Sermons are preached at St. Paul’s, by the Rev. Mr. Moore; at the Chapel, by the Rev.
Dr. Rogers, and at the Old Dutch Church in Garden St. by the Rev.
Dr. Livingston.” The clergy of other congregations also were heard.—Rivington’s N. Y. Gaz., D 13, 1783 (where the texts on which their sermons are based are printed); DeWitt’s Discourse, 41–42.

1783). A copy of the latter work is in the John Carter Brown Library, Providence (Cat. No. 2998); the author was chaplain to Gen. William Heath’s brigade, and afterwards a member of the council of safety.

Holt prints a page-long ordinance, presumably of recent date, which has been passed by the council that governs the Southern district of this state (see O 3, 1779), regarding the holding of elec-be held in New York County to choose senators and assemblymen shall be held on Dec. 29 next in the city hall.

The inhabitants voting for aldermen and other city officials shall hold their election on Dec. 15 at the following places:

In the East Ward, at the “Coffee-House”

“Market, or Peck’s Slip”

“Out Ward”

The act requires, further, that persons elected shall take the “Oaths of Office and Allegiance, prescribed by the Laws of this State; and that the act of March 27, 1778, to regulate elections, shall apply

The council which governs the Southern District of this state (see O 23, 1779) passes an ordinance supplementing that published on Dec. 17 (q.v.) concerning elections; this sets in motion again the municipal government of New York City, which was suspended during the British occupation. It provides that it shall be lawful for the Aldermen and assistants, so elected, to "hold, use, exercise and enjoy, until the Legislature shall further provide, all and singular the rights, powers and authorities, which were at any time before the commencement of the late war held, used, exercised, and enjoyed, by the body-corporate, hereby corporated by the name and title of the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York, by virtue of the charter of incorporation to the said body corporate, and the laws of this State: And that the said Aldermen and Assistants shall, at their several meetings, elect, from among themselves, a person to preside at such meetings.

"Provided, That it shall not be lawful for the said Aldermen and Assistants, to hold a Mayor's Court, or General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, within the said city. And provided further, that it shall not be lawful for the said Aldermen and Assistants, to grant, convey, or alien any of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of the said body-corporate, except to demesne the same until the first day of May next.

"And be it further ordained, That it shall be lawful for any and every two of the said Aldermen to exercise the duties, powers, and authorities, by law appertaining to the office of Wardens of the Port of New-York, until further provision shall be made."—Ind. Gaz., D 20, 1783.

In accordance with the ordinance published on Dec. 17 (q.v.), the election of seven aldermen and seven assistants is now held.

On the next day, these officials were sworn in before the secretary of state.—Ibid. They comprised the common council, whose engrossed minutes begin Feb. 10, 1784. Some activities of this board prior to that date are summarized in the introductory pages to the first volume of the printed minutes.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: xiv. The first record of their financial transactions occurs on Dec. 17 (q.v.).

The council which governs the Southern District of the state (see O 23, 1779) passes an ordinance "for preventing intrusions on forfeited lands, and giving remedy in cases where possessions are tortiously withheld from persons who removed from the southern district, on the invasion thereof in 1776." It empowers the commissioners of forfeitures for this district, or any one of them, to take possession and have charge of all the lands and tenements forfeited to the people of the state. If such custody is refused by any person in possession, seizure may be made by the commissioner, and proceedings taken before the chancellor or a justice of the supreme court, "upon the statutes of forcible entry and detainer, in like manner, as near as may be, as is provided in behalf of purchasers of forfeited lands in and by an act of the Legislature, entitled 'An Act for the amendment of the law directing the sales of forfeited lands.'—Passed the 7th day of October 1780." These proceedings are further described, as well as the duties of the commissioners therein.—Ind. Gaz., D 20, 1783.

A considerable number of the Whig Inhabitants of this City and County meet at Cape's tavern in the evening, and nominate candidates for state and assembly. A committee is appointed to have the same printed in hand-bills, and the public papers.—Ind. Gaz., D 20, 1783. Whig sentiment is at once strongly prevalent in the Ind. Gaz.

The first dancing assembly since the evacuation was announced on the 17th to take place on this evening at Cape's Tavern.—Rivington's N. T. Gaz., D 13, 1783. It is now postponed until the 23d.—Ibid., D 17, 1783. On Dec. 24, James Rivington advertised that he had on hand, "For the Dancing Assembly," the following arithmetical gloves: Dancing N. Gloves, Ladies and Gentlemen's elegant Stone and Gilt Shoe Buckles, Silk Stockings, Fine Shoes, first London Manufacture, Dress Swords, Elegant London Cock'd Hats."—Ibid., D 24, 1783.

Washington surrenders his commission to congress at Annapolis. Dec. 23.

The first item of expense under the newly organized city government (see D 9) bears this date. It is entered in Journal A, 1783 to 1794, Chamberlain's Office, now preserved in the comptroller's record-room; and has been printed in the M. C. G. (1784-1811), XXXII (1784), App. No. 11, (q.v.). Further, D 26.

A New Yorker writes: "Ever since the British forces quitted this city, the government has paid a particular attention to the establishing a well regulated police, for the well governing of the city; and the repair of all the public edifices is the next grand object. "A Dutch irigate of 20 guns, La Bellona, which brought over some families to settle here, left the town. The Congress will certainly fix this as the seat of American government."—London Chron., Ja 27-29, 1784.

Connauld W. Ham publishes a notice that he is advised by the attorney-general that the act of the provincial legislature of April 3, 1775, to prevent the exportation of unmerchantable flour, and the false taring of bread and flour sacks, is in full force as a law of this state.—Ind. Gaz., D 27, 1784.

Y., and all those who subscribe to the free and equal principles of the Universal and Independent Order of Odd Fellows, (see D 26) be permitted to enter any of the lodges of the society in New York, or wear any part of their regalia.—Ind. Gaz., D 27, 1784. See further, F 3, 1784.

The second entry in the city's Journal A (covering the chamberlain's accounts after the Revolution) is a payment "by Warrant from Alderman Randall President of the Common Council dated 26th Instant." The entry shows Randall to have been the first to hold this office in the city government as organized on Dec. 17 (q.v.). This and a few later entries have been printed in M. C. C. (1784-1811), XIX: 743 (Appendix C). They show frequent change in the office of president.

An essay signed "A Whig" strongly condemns Tories, particularly Rivington, of whom it states: "... he is a dealer in curiosities, and is himself a greater curiosity than is to be found among all the Bijouterie in his shop... The sudden transition of Mr. Rivington from his most excellent Majesty's printer, to being a republican printer, and several other circumstances, has given cause of suspicion to many, that he is still a printer to the British court, and a secret emissary."—Ind. Gaz., D 27, 1784.

With the issue of this date (No. 750), Rivington's newspaper has ceased to be "The XXII. Instant."—Ind. Gaz., D 27, 1784.

A letter from New York, dated Jan. 1, 1784, states: "Yesterday [Dec. 31] Rivington, who has had the audacity to continue his obnoxious publications was waited on by General John Lamb, Colonel Willett, and Colonel Sears, and forbid the prosecution of any further business in this city: in consequence of which, he has discharged his hands, and obeyed the order. To the joy of everyone in the United States, Jimmy Rivington's political existence terminated last Wednesday, the 1st ultimo."—Penn. Packet, Ja 15, 1784. See also N. Y. Jour. & Gaz., My 6, 1784.

J. F. D. Smyth, an English traveller who visited New York during the British occupation, wrote in a published account of his travels: "Amongst the multitude of elegant seats upon this island there are three or four uncommonly beautiful, viz. Governor Elliot's, Judge Jones's, 'Squire Morris's, and Mr. Bateman's. "And opposite upon the Continent, just above Hell-gates, there is a villa, named Morrisiana, which is inferior to no place in the world for the beauties, grandeur, and extent of perspective, and the elegance of its situation."—Smyth, A Tour in the U. S. (London, 1784), II: 376.

In this year, Gen. Steuben, having resigned his commission, returned to New York, "where he first rented a country house in the middle part of the island. It belonged to Mr. Provost, better known at the time as the 'ready-money Provost', ... and was situated in the Fifty-seventh street, in Jones's Wood. It was called the 'Louvre' by its proprietor.—Kapp, Life of Steuben (1899), 578. 'Poverty soon compelled Steuben to give up his deserted and deserted residence, and to surrender the 'Louvre.'"

His old friend and aide-de-camp B. Walker, who had married in the meantime, and taken a house in Maiden Lane, . . . nearly opposite its junction with Liberty street, invited him to stay with him. When Walker afterwards removed to Courtland street, Steubu engaged rooms in the present Fulton street, at a Dr. Vaché's, and took his dinners at the celebrated boarding-house of the Misses Dabeny, in Wall street, nearly opposite Hanover. Having lived there a year or two, he went to the house of a Dr. Tillyor, at the south-east corner of Broadway and Wall street, till he finally, in 1791, took a house opposite Saint Paul's church, the present [1859] 216 Broadway, which he occupied down to his removal to Steuben, in 1794.—Ibid. 530.

Soon after the revolution, David J. Clarkson erected a residence in the east side of Broadway between Leonard and Franklin Sts.—the first improvement in that block. He had married the daughter of the last proprietor, Madam Margarette de Peyser, who used the pasture-land for its original purposes. This was a portion of the original Kalkzhouk, south of the Van Cortlandt's property. Clarkson's house was about 30 ft. wide and two stories high; it stood 50 ft. back from the street, and was surrounded by a large garden extending along the present Leonard St. to about the line of Elm St. Mr. Clarkson, after residing here some years, sold the whole property to Rufus King and John Lawrence for $70,000. Its extent was about 160 ft. on Broadway and 380 ft. deep. In 1868, King and Lawrence partitioned the lots between them. A map of the property, with the above description, is given in Man. Com. Gr. (1867), 35.

Strong feeling is prevalent against the Society of the Cincinnati (see My 16, 1783), due to misgivings that the order may develop into an hereditary military nobility.—Winor, VII: 219; McMaster, Hist. of the People of the U. S., I: 167 et seq.

There appeared, in this year, from the press of Samuel Louden A Letter from Phocion to the Considerate Citizens of New-York, On the Politicks of the Day. The author was Alexander Hamilton. "At the close of the Revolutionary War, the popular feeling against the Tories was so strong that it was next to impossible for them to obtain justice. At this time Hamilton rendered them great service . . . in the Letters of Phocion."—Ford, Bibliotheca Hamiltoniana (1856), 9. They replied to "_mentor" (Isaac Ledyard).

In a letter, dated "Jan' 12th 1783" (error for 1784), from Col. Ben Walker to Gen. Steuben, it is said: "On my arrival here [on Jan. 14] I did not find the city so peaceable as I wished—the violent party had stopped Rivington's press [see D 31, 1783] and I yet doubt if he will be able to start again in the violent beating in the street."—Steuben Papers, Vol. X (MS., in N. Gov. Clinton having issued a proclamation on Dec. 9 last for convening the legislature in the city of New York on Jan. 6, several members met on that day; but, a sufficient number to proceed to business not appearing, the house adjourned from day to day until this day, when a quorum being present, the business of the first meeting of the seventh session began. These representing the city and county of New York were: Marins Willet, John Lum, Henry Rutgers, Isaac Sears, John Stagg, William Malcolm, Robert Harpur, Peter Van Zandt, and Hugh Hughes. John Stagg was the only one of these absent. Gov. Clinton's message to the assembly contained the following clause: "While we survey the Ruins of this once flourishing City, and its Vicinities; While we sympathize in the calamities which have reduced many of our virtuous fellow-Citizens to Want and Distress . . . how our hearts overflow with Love and Gratitude to our adorable Creator, thro' whose gracious Interposition, Bounds have been set, and probably forever, to such scenes of Horror and Devastation . . . our Ports so long withhold from us, are at length open to all the World." At a special meeting of the "Aldermen and Common Council of the city of New York," Mr. Simon (inholder), Alderman Broome, the president of the board, reads a letter from James Duane in which Duane informs them that the council of appointment has conferred upon him "the Mayoralty," and that he has, this morning, received Gov. Clinton's commission under the seal of the state. He adds that, although it has been usual with his predecessors "to give a public entertainment on the investiture of the Mayoralty," there is so much want and distress prevalent that he presents 20 guineas instead toward the relief of suffering in the various wards of the city.

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

written pages, gives particulars of conversations Van Dam has already had with friends on the subject. The following portions of this important topographical document, hitherto unpublished, are given in the full topographical original. Van Dam states:

"The object in view for the West Ward was to have a free and more desirable access into the City from Greenwich Road, so far as the Church Corporation could go to accomplish this design was to widen the Streets from the North River to Broadway. There are a few of the Church Leases unexpired that may in some measure defeat this purpose for the tenants are refractory. But I do apprehend if the Church Corporation or Legislature view these improvements as candidly as you and I can, there will be no difficulty in gratifying the Leases for their supposed loss.

"To make you better acquainted with what is wished to be pursued, I have copied part of the Map of the City (upon a large scale) that I took an opportunity of showing you at my house in some of your visits before my departure. Where it is observable that Partition—Vasey—Barclay—Murray—Warren—and Chambers Streets were originally only 40 feet wide—All leases granted since 1778 in these directions leave the streets 60 feet wide, where it is already and hereafter must be taken off, is shaded in the map with Green. In conversing with some of the Governors of the College they appeared at the time to have in their mind where it was intended with South Land, contending that if an equal quantity was taken off each side of the Street it would have been more just. I showed them that there was the like loss of ground to the Church in the two Streets leading from the broad way upon which they are bounded.
Upon Murray streets they have granted leases near the River confining the street to its original breadth of 49 feet, But on Barclay streets they have granted to be 60 feet wide. The reason of it is to lead the carriage of goods to the Battery. It is a plan that means are not pursued to continue Murray Street the breadth proposed the object must be defeated that will otherwise give an air of grandeur to it.

"Neither Barclays—Robinsons—Murrays—or Chambers Streets are yet paved. When the Corporation thinks proper to order it to be performed, It will be an amelioration and of peculiar use to foot passengers that live in Murray and Barclay Street, as it will extend the street at its present breadth of 82 feet, and thereby will make the street more convenient for carrying on trade.
Louder is the object of painting the street, as it will be frequent from the number of people that walk the street in a thorough way.

"Again the attention of the Corporation will lead to direct that the descent shall begin immediately on the broad way, that the craft of Carts or Carriages may be equal in all parts of these Streets leading from Greenwich Street, thereby avoiding that great evil so very discernable in those to the southward of them.

"It is observable that Crown Street—Cortlandt Street and Dye Street, are both wide, and their length is about 300 paces from the Broad way to the River. An addition can be made of 15 feet at an Easy purchase of a strip of land that belong to the widow Shaw, lying in the rear of the lots between Cortlandt and Dye Streets formerly a ropewalk. All the injury that can produce is to effect the two Corner Houses, built or to be built on the south side of that street. But in order to extinguish fires that may hereafter happen when Houses are erected on these Streets I have endeavored to prevent and (with some success) Houses being built in the direction of Church Street which you will observe in the map is shaded yellow. A Mr. Ward had purchased two Lots of the widow Meadam who discovered the reasonableness and great utility that would be derived to the publick readily assented to erect his buildings to answer so desirable a purpose, in an hope that he would be recompensed for his loss of Land by the generous Public—Labor my friend to have Church Street continued through the three blocks to Crown Street . . . it is an object well worth the public attention. The purchase of the Ground to be laid into an intended street will not come very high, and if there are not Funds.
—much of the utility may be dispelled.

"From Samuel Ellis's new buildings to the northeaward of the Market to Peter Mesier's former front the street was originally only 40 feet wide. Trinity Church Vestry began to widen Greenwich Street at Ellis's Corner to 66 feet which is continued through their Lands. It is to be wished that the City Corporation would continue the Street to the southward, the same breadth, even to the flat rock Battery. To do which it will appear at first sight to effect in a high degree the landed estate of Peter Mesier's Family—John Thurman—Peter Rutgers—Samuel Ellis's and Nicholas Ruggers ® owners by continuity through their Property—But on a little reflection it is obvious to discernment that by closing the passage that formerly was occupied as a street nearer the River and placing the street in lieu thereof to commence at Abraham Mesier's corner and extending it to the corner of the Range of the street back of Trinity Church, it will take but little more ground than was formerly allotted to go round the Docks as it was called, and even if there be any lack of soil for what the proprietors surrender for the street, the City Corporation will doubtless extend their grants into the River to their utmost bounds to make a compensation.

"In laying out the water lots to be made Land, belonging to the Church and Collèges corporations to the southward of Chambress Street, It will appear upon the Records of the City Corporation that the water lots granted to those Corporations shall be similar to those that appear in a block of the Map to the westward of Skinner's distillery in which an useless street is described—and It was as absurd to lay down each lott with a Bevil. To remedy that inconvenience and disagreeable appearance, it was thought proper by the committees of the Collèges & Church corporations to make them more uniform and have they adopted a more eligible plan as described in the above plan by red lines in the front of Cap Robert Dales buildings where the building lots on the west side of Greenwich Street and fronting Hudsons River only are out of Square. All the water lots to the southward of Roosevelts Estate are unimproved to the extent of their Grants and therefore with facility may be regulated by the plan; where the desired alterations are designed the line is marked with a red line.

"It is very remarkable that from Thames Street (at the bottom of which there is a spacious slip 100 feet wide & near 300 feet into the River) until the Battery—there is not a Cartway into the City distant one from the other 1600 feet. If only one street should be thought proper to be opened for the accommodation of the Public, a lane, opposite to Verlageson will be the properest, because it is in the center of the area and equal distance from all part of the City. And the purchase of Mr Lambart Moore's and that in the rear of his will be the most eligible to lay upon a Cartway. If it is alleged that the high Bank will prevent it. The answer is that the proprietors of the water lots will necessarily require all the Bank to fill up the water to be made land. Their Grants it is supposed restricts the proprietors to improve the lots as is usual in a certain time and that period it is supposed nearly expired. Besides which it may be also proper that the land opposite Mr. David Johnson's House and another Robinson's Street to the southward of Trinity Church should be widened.

"Prevent as much as in you lays the water lots to the westward of the Market on the North River from being rented on building loans [7]; they ought to be reserved for the Market Boats, whether the Market is continued where it is or that the broad way remains established.

"A reform is much required in Stone Street; it was anciency about 20 feet wide and latterly few or no reputable Inhabitant chose to reside in it.—On the North side the lots in general extended to pottery lane; if it is again rebuilt upon the same foundations of a narrow street no man that hath a desire to live in some degree desirablle will erect a good habitation there. But it will rather be filled with Huts or buildings of little consequence. To remedy which, if each proprietor surrenders 25 feet of his front there then will be a loss of the two corner lots only, to compensate the proprietors of the said two lots. Those on the south side may be assessed to pay the value thereof. And it cannot be considered that those on the North side suffers any diminution by the surrender when it is so evident that their estates will be rather improved. For reputable Inhabitants of that Street when made 45 feet wide will cover to reside therein when it is open—airy—and admits the kind influence of the Sun. Were it possible to regulate the two southern streets that are parallel to this now described it would prove useful for the occupiers. Pottery lane is only mentioned; it must take its fate.

"While I am removed at so great a distance from your Metropolis, I cannot reflect with unconcern on the singular advantages that may be derived to the order and splendor of its buildings—every disagreeable object that can possibly be removed which may hurt the eye of the Citizen, or particularly of so many strangers that will naturally resort to your City is wished to be corrected. I have pointed out such only as be effected with little expence from the 1775.

Situation of the Premises—Should wisdom predominate and they are adopted shall think myself well compensated for the little pains I have taken to promote the design that must ultimately fall to the share of you and your dependants.

"Be pleased to recollect that I pointed out to you a most lovely situation capable of the highest Improvement to enlarge the City. I mean upon Mr. Rutger's and Mr. DeLANCEY'S Land. It is the most beautiful Site that can possibly be described upon the Island. I hastily drew some rude lines upon one of Ratoz's maps left with Mr. Pintard. The proprietors of lots on Rutgers Ground may surrender them upon the plan that was laid down by Marxschall, which is too much confined as to the breadth and direction of the streets. You will discover that I have laid down a street from Peter Earls to Byvanks; some part takes in the River where it interferes the City Corporation will demand a small amount, which the proprietors in front may well pay. Or if it surrender some of their lots to be laid into the streets where will be the impropierty of granting one water lots to be made land in lieu thereof [?] I see none and where the public are hemicited why not meet each other half way [?]."

From the original letter, in metal file No. 11, city clerk's record-room.

Anthony Van Dam, the author of this survey and opinion, served as one of the port wardens of New York for ten years or more prior to this letter—Col. Hist. MSS., Eng., 745, 746, 747, 751. He was one of the merchants transacting business in Dock St. in 1775-6, his trade being principally confined to wines and liquors—N. Y. City during the Am. Rev. (1861), 35. The charter of the Chamber of Commerce, dated March 13, 1770, shows him then to be secretary of that body.—See Laws of N. T. (1784), Chap. 30. He was also a member of the general committee of one hundred citizens, or "a commercial committee."

In 1786, his place of business was at No. 13 Nassau St.—City Directory. He died in London in 1807.—Sabine, Loyalists of the Am. Rev., II: 177.

Henry Rensselaer, to whom the letter was written, appears to have been the Rensselaer of the fifth generation, known as "Henry the Whig" before the Revolution, and "Henry the Patriot" afterward. He became a merchants' and a bankers' man. He was a member of the great committee of two hundred—and, as president, of the committee of the whole—(See PI. 43, Vol. IV.).

The following notice is published: "For Sale, that agreeably situated Island, known by the name of Blackwell's Island, On the East River, about four miles from this City. It is without exception one of the most healthy situations in this state. It is remarkable for the number of fish and fowl that is caught there in the different seasons. There is on the premises, two small Dwelling houses, a Barn, Bake and Fowl House, Cider Mill; a large Orchard, containing 450 of the best grafted fruit trees, such as Newton & golden pippins, spitsinburgs, peimans, bow apples, pears, peaches, plums. There is a number of small dresser and above ground ready cleared to begin breaking immediately; and the subscriber has a complete set of quarry tools, with all his farming utensils and stock to dispose of at the same time. The Island abounds with running springs of most excellent water. The above contains 107 acres, eight of which are salt meadow, and the whole has been considerably improved with manure, and in good fence. Any person inclining to purchase the whole or half of the said Island, may be further informed by enquiring at Mr. Joseph Hallett's, No. 204, Water Street, New York, or on the premises of James Blackwell.—N. T. Packs, Mr 8, 1784.

For an historical account of Blackwell's Island, see Mr 25, 1685.

But apparently nothing came of this offer to sell the Island, and the reason for offering it may be judged from a subsequent notice in the newspapers of 1785 which states that James Blackwell is an insolvent debtor and all his estate was assigned to James Hallett and Joseph Stringham as assignees, who requested all creditors to produce their accounts before September 1, 1785, on which date a settlement would be made and that on April 20, 1785, the Southwest part of Blackwell's Island with two small houses, 'barn, bake, cider mill,' an orchard stock and farming utensils, household and kitchen furniture would be sold at public vendue. On the same day Jacob Blackwell offered the north-east part of the Island for sale, both parts completing the whole Island."—N. Y. H. S. Bull., July, 1921, citing N. T. Packet, Mr 10, 1785. In spite of all these circumstances and offers for sale, the island remained in the hands of the Blackwell family. See, further, Ja 22, 1794.

The common council passes "A Law relative to the admission of Freeman."—M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 12. It was published in full in N. T. Packs, Mr 18, 1785. It is, in effect, offering for their friends, connections, or those they may have business with; the subscriber has opened a book, as a City Register, alphabetically arranged, at the bar of the Coffee-House, where any gentleman now resident in the City, either as a house-keeper or lodger, or those who may hereafter arrive may insert their names and place of residence. The said Register will always lay open at the bar of the Coffee-House, by which means the disappointments so frequently happening to those who enquire or are enquired after will be prevented.—[signed] Cornelius Bradford.—N. T. Y. Jour. & State Gaz., Mr 11, 1784.

This was the Merchants' Coffee House, at the s. e. cor. of Wall and Water Sts.—L. M. R. K., III: 979. See Mr 11, 1786.

Mangel M'Intosh, in his "History of all things whatever," published 1788-91, gives the following account of the Coffee-House: "...the house was built on the east side of Water Street, near the shore, and had a room on the first floor, and on the second a room 4 stories high, sufficient for a ball or a dinner, and well furnished for that purpose. It originally had a patent for filming the streets from the Goal to fresh-water agreeable to an order of the Corporation."

It has not proved possible to identify this street with certainty; cf. Collect St in L. M. R. K., III: 997; Pls. 90 and 74, Vol. III.

"...a sedan Chair will constantly attend, from 10 o'clock in the morning till 12 at Night, at the Sign of the Free-Mason, in Wall-Street, nearly opposite the Coffee-House. Only one Shilling for a Turn will be required."—Ind. Gaz., Mr 11, 1784.

Mrs. Maria Farmer, a daughter of Abraham Gouverneur, and grand-daughter of Jacob Leisler, presents to the state senate, through its president, "an accurate portrait of . . . Christopher Columbus, taken from an original painting, anno 1592, and which has been in her family upwards of 150 years."—Senate Jour., July 1, 1786. H. VIII: 46.

The gift is accepted, and the senate orders that it be placed "in their convention room."—Penn. Packet (Phila.), Mr 23, 1784. On March 18, 1787, a resolution was passed by the senate that the picture be removed from New York City, and "put up in some suitable place in the Senate Chamber."—Senate Jour. See N 5, 1787. The one now in the city hall is a copy. See N 19, 1787.

The following are elected officers of the Bank of New York: Alexander M'Dougall, president; Samuel Franklin, William Maxwell, Robert Bowne, Nicholas Low, Comfort Sands, Daniel M'Cormick, Alexander Hamilton, Isaac Roosevelt, Joshua Waddington, John Vanderbilt, Thomas Randall, and Thomas B. Stoughton, directors; and William Seton, cashier.—N. T. Packet, Mr 15, 1785.

The common council passes "A Law for altering and directing the Uses of the public Seals of this City," and orders that it be printed in one of the public newspapers.—M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 16. It requires that the "City Seal," the "Seal of the Mayor's Court," and the "Seal of Mayoralty" (see N 4, 1733), be altered in the following manner: "That the device, on the said seals respectively, in representation of an Imperial crown be defaced, and that instead thereof, the crest of the arms of the State of New York, that is to say, a representation of a semi globe, with a soaring eagle thereon, be inserted, and that the Mayor be authorized to cause the said seals respectively to be altered accordingly." The uses of the three seals, as specified in this law, are the same as those directed by the law of Nov. 4, 1735 (p. v.).—N. T. Packet, Ap 8, 1784. See, further, S. 1.

Nicholas de Peyster, in a petition to the common council, states that he "is Proprietor of a Peice of Ground of fifty feet in Breadth along the East River in the Out Ward of this City, lying to the Eastward of Beckmann Dock;" that, in front of this ground, "some short Time before the Commencement of the late War," he "obtained a Grant of the Right to the Soil under Water from high to low Water and two hundred feet into the said East River; and that he "run out and finished in front of his said Ground a compleat and well built Warf or Dock of Wood Earth and Stone, almost to the Extent of the said two hundred Feet," which cost him at least

£260. He further states "That in the late War while this City was in the Possession of the Enemy, the whole of the said Warf was taken away to ballast their Shipping and otherwise destroyed so entirely that nothing now remains but the vacant Beach on which it had been erected;" and that, "altho' frequent Application was made for the Purpose to the British," he was "never able to procure from them any Consideration or Recompence for his said Warf." He therefore asks that the quit-rents, due to the City on its grant of the water lot, be remitted. An ordinance is passed "for the speedy and effectual cleansing of the City."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I. 16. The full text was published in the N. Y. Packet, Mar. 16, 1866. Mr. McComb was appointed one of the city surveyors, in place of Mr. Bancker.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I. 15. This was the father of John McComb who, in 1802 (see Mr. 24, 1800), became one of the architects of the city hall. The elder McComb died in New Jersey in 1812 in his 77th year; so, doubtless, his experience contributed to the practical knowledge which his son displayed as master builder. See articles by Prof. John C. Van Dyke and Edward S. Wilke in Rutgers College Pubs., No. 14, which is entitled The One Hundredth Anniversary of the erection of Queen's Building, Rutgers College, June 23d, 1909 (pub. by the college, 1910). William Smith, late chief justice of New York, but at this time residing in England, presents a memorial to the commissioners "Applying for Act of Parliament for erecting Losses & Services of the Ameri[an] Loyalists." It reads, in part:

"Being a Son of one of the Kings Judges and a Native of the Province of New York and many years in the profession of the Law, and ever since the year 1767 a member of His Majestys Council and having been constituted Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and one of the Council to the several Commissions issued since 1778 for restoring peace to that Country—I presume that it cannot be necessary to trouble your Board at this day with any Declaration of my Principles on [et] the History of my Conduct in the late Contest which has so unhappily terminated in the rent if not in the ruin of the British Empire.

"If nevertheless witnesses should be desired upon the Question of my Fidelity to the Crown or my attachment to the general Interests of the Empire give me leave Gentlemen to refer you to Lord Dunmore Lieutenant General Tryon and Lieut. General Robertson who were Governors of the province and to Lord Carlisle, Mr. Eden and Gov't Johnston the Commissioners of 1778 and to Sir Henry Clinton and Sir Guy Carleton the Commanders in Chief. To these I can add other respectable Characters of this Country some of whose confidential and important correspondence are able to shew you by what Principles I have been actuated and to what Councils I recommended for preventing the War, and when it had commenced to Guard against the fatal seperation it has effected.

"The annexed Estimate will shew, as much as, in the singularity of my Case, ought to be the subject of your Consideration. I must not tender to you as others do a Computation of the value of my whole Estate real and personal. The Usurpation did not proceed against me to Attainted nor against my property to Confiscation and in the prospect that my Countrymen will neither be so unjust nor entirely regardless of the Definite Treaty—I flatter myself that tho at present seceded from my Funds and cast upon the Bounty of Great Britain for support this distress will continue only until the present ferment have had time to be composed.

"I am affected by two of their Laws—the one passed in June 1778 and the other in July 1782.

"Under the first I was expelled from the interior Country into the British Lines for refusing an Oath to abjure the Kings Sovereignty and its sanctions are the double taxation of my Estate and upon being found in the Colony the perpetual Impotism of my property, and of Confiscation of the profits of my Real Estate for Life and the whole personally for ever.

"The other Act prohibits me, as well as the other Loyalists that were within the British Lines from recovering any of our Debts.

"If these Laws are never to be repealed, my Condition is indeed to be deplored, but in the hope already suggested I cannot bring the whole of my real and personal Estate into Account for Compensation, I certainly ought not."—American Loyalists. Audit Office Transcripts, XLIV: 697-10.

The legislature passes "An Act to remove Doubts which may have arisen respecting the Charter Rights of the Minister, Elders and Deacons of The Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of the City of New-York, in Consequence of the late Invasion of this State." It recites the fact that the charter granted by King William III, and signed by the English Ministers, was confirmed by the Revolution War. This act therefore declares that the charter and all the "estates, rights, powers, authorities, liberties, privileges, franchises, preemnences and immunities thereby granted and confirmed," which were held and enjoyed by the church on April 19, 1775, by virtue of the charter or by virtue of any act of the legislature of this state while this was a colony, shall continue in full force and efficacy. It was referred to a committee to make "such further provisions for the support and security of the Church, and the ministers, deacons, and others, and for the advancement of the Protestant Dutch Church in this State than may be necessary, or of any part thereof," between April 18, 1775, and the date of this act (March 17, 1784).

The ministers, elders and deacons who, because of their adherence to their country's cause, were compelled by the British army to leave the city, or those who have returned since the evacuation, shall be deemed to hold these offices, respectively, until others shall be appointed or elected in their stead, according to the charter. The charter contained a clause giving power to the minister, elders, and deacons to raise money "for repairing, amending and enlarging the church and steeple, belfrey, cemetery or church-yard," etc. As this power was never exercised, and the present minister, elders, and deacons are willing to surrender it, the act provides that it shall not hereafter be exercised, but shall be abrogated and repealed.—Laws of N. Y. 1784, cII, 1-6.

Elizabeth Holt changes the name of her paper (see F 19) to The New-York Journal, and State Gazette.—Early Newspapers, II: 443; Bringham, A. S. Proc. (1917), 448. See F 17, 1785.

The common council passes an ordinance "for paving the Streets and for preventing Nuisances within this City."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 17. The full text was pub. in the N. Y. Packet, Apr. 1784.

The surviving governors of King's College present a petition to the legislature, which states: "That the greater Part of the Governors of the said College have since the commencement of the late War died out or departed this State whereby a sufficient number of Governors cannot be convened for the carrying on of the Business of the said College agreeably to its Charter. . . . "That many Parts of the said Charter are inconsistent with that Liberty and that Civil and Religious Freedom which our present happy Constitutional points out—and that an Alteration of that Charter in such points as well as an Extension of the Privileges of the said College so as to render it the Mother of an University to be established within this State would tend to diffuse Knowledge and the good of the Country for the time to come.

The petitioners add that they submit the charter to the legislature for revision, "so as to render it more adequate to these important Ends," and asking for confirmation to the college of "such Estate as was unquestionably appropriated to its use." The signers of this petition are Leonard Lipsenard, Jno. Livingston, Wm. Walton, Sam. Bayard, Jr., Geo. Clinton, Rich. Morris, Jas. Duane, Gerard Bancker, Egburt Benson, J. H. Livingston, Sam. Provost, John Rodgers, and John Morin Scott.

James Duane, a state senator, promptly introduced a bill, entitled "An Act for establishing a University within this State."—Fine, King's College and the Early Days of Columbia College (1917). See, further, My 1.

The cartmen are admitted as freemen.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 19. This was perhaps due to the need of employing them in large numbers in cleaning and repairing the city. On March 30, forty-three others were admitted; on April 6, thirty-five; on April 15, thirty-five; on April 22, nine; on May 11, fifty-four, etc.—ibid., I: 20, 21, 23-24, 27, 31, 35, 43, etc.

The legislature passes an act authorizing "Governor's or Officers of the New York Island " for the use of the governor until the legislature shall otherwise order. The governor is to have charge of Fort George, and other fortifications, and public works and buildings within the city erected for military purposes on lands belonging to the state, and shall give orders to secure and preserve them. The commissioners of fortification are to assign to the governor any one of the forfeited houses which he may select for his residence, except those assigned to the use of the secretary. The common council grants a petition of Adolph Waldron for a continuance of his lease of the ferry from N.Y. to Brooklyn, which he hired on May 1, 1776, but which he was compelled to abandon during the war while serving as captain of a troop of light horse which he raised. He expresses willingness to bear the loss sustained in abandoning the ferry, and gives an inventory and valuation of the former contents of the Brooklyn ferry-house, etc. These included 9 negroes (valued at £62:10:0), 15 horses, 5 "Riding Chairs with Harness," 1 sulkky, 1 stage wagon, 9 boats with sails and oars (valued at £28:0), 2 milch cows, wine, porter, gin, 5 spinning wheels, various kitchen utensils (including "1 Large Oyster Roaster"), various tools, 3 beds, 11 chairs, 3 back chairs, 1 speaking trumpet, 4 compasses, china, etc. There is also enclosed with his petition an itemized account of his labour and expenses from Nov. 26, 1783, to April 6, 1784, consisting largely of repairs on the old ferry-boats, amounting in all to £63:14:—

From original MSS. in metal file No. 7, city clerk's record-room; and M. C. C. (1784-1812), I: 26.

The common council orders the issuance of a warrant on the city to pay John Simmons £61:13:4 "for his Act for Expenses attending the Corporation meeting at his House during the last Winter."—M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 27. At this time, taverns were still used by the city, as in the early English colonial period, for public business, for committee and special meetings of the common council, and for special entertainments, as instanced by the taverns of Walter Hayer, and of John Simmons.—Ibid., I: 276, 358.

The legislature passes "An Act for making such Alterations in the Charter of the Corporation of Trinity Church as to render it more conformable to the Constitution of the State."—Laws of N. T. (1784), chap. 33. The corporate name was not changed until March 10, 1758 (p. 65).

The act of 1693 "for settling a Ministry," and several other similar acts of later years, including the act of 1700 "against Jeunes and Popish Priests" are repealed.—Laws of N. T., chap. 38.

Father Farmer, a Jesuit who ministered to a Roman Catholic congregation in Wall St., secretly, before the Revolution (see 1776), now came boldly to New York to look after the remnant of his flock, and find eighteen communicants. Mass was celebrated in hired halls and in the embassies of the French and Spanish legations in 1784 and 1785. Regarding the further activities of Catholics, see Eccles. Rec. III: 1450-51.

The first meeting of the Chamber of Commerce under its revitalized charter (see Ap. 15) is held. John Alsop is elected president, Isaac Sears, vice-president, John Broome, treasurer, and John Blodgett, superintendent.—The arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of Great Britain toward the late Colonies (now States of America), having been such as to compel the People of these States to have recourse to Arms for the Defence of their Liberty and Property, and the Invasion of the State of New York having driven the Inhabitants of the City to the cruel necessity of leaving their Houses and Property and to retire into the Country, the Exercise of the Rights and Privileges of the Chamber were, in consequence of the War, suspended from the Third of May One Thousand Seven hundred and Seventy-five to the Sixth of July One thousand Seven hundred and Seventy-nine [interior for Je 21, 1779, q.v.]. When a number of the Members Assumed the Duties of the Powers contained in their Charter, under the Patronage of the British Commanders— and the Influence of the Chamber having been Manifestly directed to Aid the British in Subjugating these States—A number of the Members and other Citizens, on their return to this City, taking into Consideration the State of the Chamber and being advised by Council that the Charter of the said Chamber had been forfeited and lost by reason of the Misuser and Nonuser of the same, They thought it most advisable to petition the Legislature for a Confirmation of the said Charter.—Bishop, A Chron. of 150 Years. The Chamber of Commerce of the State of N. Y. 1768-1818, 39-40.

The butchers and neighbors of the Fly Market being "desirous of covering the Slip at the lower end of said Market & extending the said Market over the said Slip to the Bridge across the same to make Room for the Country People who bring Produce thereto," a committee of the common council is appointed (p. 24), which was also directed to make such improvements and direct the addition to be made on the said Market.—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 29. The committee reported on May 12 (p. v.).

22. The vestry minutes of Trinity Church, beginning with this month, are here for the first time introduced with this note: "At a Meeting of the Corporation of Trinity Church of the City of New York (conformable to the amended charter, doubtless,) instead of "At a Meeting of the Rector, Church Wardens and Vestrymen, etc." —Trin. Min. (MS.).

24. John McComb, in a bill for materials and work done at the "Exchange," the "Old City Hall," and the "Execution House," between April 24 and July 10, charges the city $31,341.11. From original bill in metal file No. 6, city clerk's record-room. See also M. C. C. (1784-1813), i: 61.

26. "Resolved That the Committee on Leases be empowered to hire a Dwelling house for the Rector [Rev. Samuel Provoost] for the ensuing year at such Rent as they can agree for." —Trin. Min. (MS.).

30. The Rev. John H. Livingston, D.D., Henry Remsen, and others, in a petition to the common council, state that they "have procured a person, of whose capacity they are sufficiently satisfied, to open a grammar school for the instruction of youth in the English, Latin, and Greek languages;" that, "at present, there is not any convenient building, or room to be procured in this city for the purpose of such a School." They ask the common council for the use of "the late library-room in the State-house," for a school-room, "until a university be established, or so long as the same may be spared from other public uses." —From original petition in metal file No. 5, city clerk's record-room, endorsed "read April 30th 1784 granted during the pleasure of the Corporation," M. C. C. (1784-1813), i: 50. See Mr. 16, 1785.

32. Thomas Arden and others residing near the Sluice, in a petition to the common council, complain of it as a great nuisance, and ask that it be removed. Richard Dean, in another petition, offers proposals "for erecting a Slaughter House on his Estate in the North River, to which means every convenience for keeping it perpetually sweet and clean, for the lower parts of the Building will be cleansed twice a day by the Tides, and the upper he will convey Warm Water to from his Distillery by means he will institute for the purpose." He also says he will provide a yard for cattle, and employ a man to keep the building clean. He adds that "the Cattle can be housed, without passing thro' any part of the Town, by the Greenwich Road, and can be landed at his Dock from New Jersey, which may probably be an Encouragement for more Cattle to be brought from that Quarter, than has hitherto been done, arising from the want of a Conveniency of this Kind." He asks for the exclusive right to keep a slaughter-house for 31 years. See further action on My. 12.

A city ordinance is passed to regulate the public markets and to prevent the forestalling of provisions. Every day except Sunday is appointed a public market day, from sunrise to sunset. The public markets are to be held at such places as the common council shall from time to time appoint. —N. Y. Packet, My. 3, 1784; M. C. C. (1784-1813), i: 50.

May 1. The legislature passes an act for granting certain privileges to the college heretofore called Kings College, for altering the name and charter thereof, and erecting an university within this State. All the rights, powers, etc. heretofore vested in the corporation of Kings College are vested in "the Regents of the University of the State of New York." Regents are named, and another one shall be appointed by the clergy of the various religious denominations of the State. The regents are to choose a chancellor, vice-chancellor, treasurer, and secretary, from their own number. The powers and property vested in the regents are defined. Their powers in the matter of founding schools and colleges in any part of the state are stated. Religious bodies are permitted to institute professorships, and power is conferred on the regents to grant degrees, "as well in divinity, philosophy, civil and municipal laws, as in every other art, science and faculty whatsoever as are or may be conferred by all or any of the universities in Europe." See Mr. 12, 1785. This act also provides that the college within the city of New York heretofore called Kings College, be forever here after called and known by the name of Columbia College." Congress directs that the commissary of military stores or the person in charge of the public stores at Carlisle, Pa., "deliver to the order of the corporation of the city of New-York, the bells which have been taken from the churches and other public edifices in the said city, if any such bells remain in his possession." —Jour. of Congress (pub. 1823), IV: 395. At a meeting of the Whig Society in the long-room in the Coffee House, it is resolved that an ordinance should be passed for removing from this state "certain characters of influence, who have uniformly manifested an inveterate opposition to the liberties of the people." It was agreed that such removal would not be repugnant to the treaty of peace with Great Britain. —N. Y. Packet, My. 17, 1784.

The legislature passes an act to appoint commissioners to settle and adjust any differences which may arise between the proprietors of certain lots in the city of New York, the buildings whereon were burnt in the year 1776, and for altering the streets which heretofore were laid out adjoining to such lots. —Laws of N. Y. (1784), chap. 94; ibid. (1786), chap. 50; M. C. C. (1784-1813), i: 126. See My. 14, 1784. The legislature pass a "Act to prevent the spreading of infectious distempers in this State." It designates "Bedlow's" Island as a place of quarantine, or such other place and for such time as the governor, or in his absence the mayor, of New York, may direct. —Laws of N. Y. (1784), chap. 57 (1 Greenleaf, 117, 144).

At a meeting of the "Regents of the University of the State of New York" (see My. 1), Gov. Clinton is elected chancellor; Lieut-Gov. Van Cortlandt, vice-chancellor; Brockholst Livingston, treasurer; and Robert Harpur, secretary. The treasurer and secretary are instructed to "demand and receive from the late Treasurer and Clerk of the late corporation of the College called King's College, and from any other person or persons, all records, books, papers, &c., appertaining to the said late corporation, or the office of the said late corporation." Committees are also appointed to supervise the repair of the college building (see O 14), to report by-laws, to devise a proper seal, to take measures for the recovery of moneys due the college, and to engage instructors "for the term of twelve months." —Hist. of Columbia Univ. 1754-1904, 61. See My. 15.

Congress commissions Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson to make treaties of commerce with European powers. Franklin reached Philadelphia, on his return, on Sept. 14, 1785. —Winsor, VII: 233. Regarding Adams and Jefferson, see F. 25 and Mr. 10, 1785, respectively.

The legislature passes an act providing for the appointment of seven commissioners to dispose, at private sale or public vendue, of all the heretofore unsold confiscated estates. —Laws of N. Y., 7th sess., chap. 64 (printed by Ehz. Holt, 1784).

The legislature also enacts a law "to preserve the freedom and independence of this State." As there are persons "holding principles inimical to the Constitution," and citizens of this state "entertaining sentiments hostile to its independence," who have "taken an active part in the late war in opposition to the present government," it is deemed "improper and dangerous that such persons should be suffered to hold . . . any such office or place
De Witt Clinton is admitted to the junior class of Columbia College. He is the first student to enter the institution under its new name.—Hist. of Columbia Univ., 1754-1904, 62. He graduated on April 11, 1786 (q.v.). The college had been closed to students since April 6, 1776 (q.v.); when it was converted into a barracks for troops. During the war it was also used as a hospital (see Je 4, 1777, 1784). 17

The following announcement is published: “The heirs and other representatives of Annie Bogardus, widow, deceased, are requested to attend at Cape’s Tavern, on Saturday next, at 4 o’clock in the afternoon, on business of high importance, relative to the lands called Domine’s Hook, in this city, which formerly belonged to—New York, May 19, 1784.—N. Phillip Minthorne, in a petition to the common council, states that “in the Year 1776 he left this City on the Approach of the British Troops, & retired with his family into the Jerseys;” that “when he so left this City he was a regularly appointed Weigh Master, that his scales stood in the street at the Back of the Stables of Cape’s Tavern;” and “that these scales were removed during his Absence into the Jerseys to the Forge Yard at the North River, where they now stand.” He asks that he be again appointed a weigh-master, “with permission to erect his scales on the Ground [where] they formerly stood.”—From original petition (in metal file No. 7, city clerk’s record-room), endorsed “read May 21 on May 21, 1784 & the prayer granted.” This petition is typical of several from returning refugees and soldiers, seeking reinstatement in their former employments, or seeking release from the payment of quit-rents on grants of land made to them just prior to the war.

The committee on docks and slips reports that Old Slip is in a ruinous condition, and likely to become an intolerable nuisance. They recommend “that a block about eight feet in width thrown across the Slip about fifty feet below the Bridge, and the intermediate space filled in” would largely remedy the fault, and that, to make this effective, the street fronting the slip should be paved “with a gradual Descent from the Corner of Duke Street down to the aforesaid Block.” A committee is appointed to execute these plans.—M. C. (1784-1811), 37-38.

The common council contributes $150 toward digging down Cortlandt Street, so that the descent will be easy, and that water from Broadway may be led into the North River.—M. C. (1784-1811), I: 37.

Marinus Willet, sheriff of the city and county of New York, protests to the common council against the insecurity of the “Goal.”—M. C. (1784-1811), I: 39.

A letter of this date from New York was published in a Halifax newspaper, describing a “mob” that, some time before, had met in the Fields at New York and passed resolutions that “every tyly or person suspected of toryism should be banished from the state.” On their way to the city hall, they met a couple of British officers, whom they placed on a cart and carried about “to the no small joy of the benovolent and humane whigs, as well as of every lover of peace and good order.” The “two Miogrents” were rescued by the governor, who “went attended by some of the Council and others of the lower class of people,” and the mob was thus “deprived of the unspeakable pleasure of seeing a taring and feathering match.” This much of the account is evidently written in a solemn, jealously.

The two men thus handled by the “mob” were Capt. Hend. Healy, and one Capt. Healy, a gentleman from Maine who is now here on public business.” The letter, which evidently was a political squib, was reprinted in a New York paper a month

The common council orders that a "middle road" be laid out between the Post Road and the street called the Middle Road, through the Common Land at Manhattan St., M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 145-159. This was long afterward called the Middle Road, although occasionally mentioned in the records and elsewhere as Manhattan Avenue, a designation never formally adopted. See L. M. R. K., III: 1005.

Col. Matthew Clarkson is authorised by the Regents to go to France and the United Netherlands to solicit benefactions for the University of the State of New York, and to purchase "such philosophical apparatus for the College [Columbia] as Dr. Franklin, Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson, Ministers of the United States, should advise."—Hist. of Columbia Univ., 1754-1904, 65.

The common council gives Aaron Gilbert sole charge of the city watch. He is required to "make strict enquiry into the Character & Conduct of all the Watchmen and . . . discharge such as shall not produce the most satisfactory Proof of their sobriety diligence and integrity and employ in their stead Citizens of established good Characters." He is to "direct the Watch to make their Rounds in silence."—M. C. C. (1783-1813), I: 40.

"It being represented that great Numbers of dead Bodies have been interred in the Burying Ground adjoining Trinity Church during that time that Graves can not be dug without obstructions from Coffins or human Bones that therefore many dead Bodies are placed within three feet of the Surface of the Earth whereby the health of the inhabitants of this City is evidently endangered, Therefore Resolved That No Funerals be permitted in future in the burying Ground of Trinity Church except where families have used particular Burial Places therefor in some time past and except in the different vaults already built."—Trin. Min. (M.S.).

The vestry also orders "That Mr. [William] Elewther the Fire Engineer of this City be permitted to build a house for a fire engine on such Part of Saint Pauls Burying Ground as the Committee of the Realtors shall think proper."—See S. 2.

A ordinance is passed prohibiting the use of iron-shod wheels after Aug. 1.—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 44. See Mr 28, 1787, Mr 11, 1791.

Simeon King announces to "his friends and the public that he has opened a Tavern at the sign of the Indian King, No. 110, Water-street, the noted place formerly called the Royal Punch House [see Jl 1, 1780]; he has a pump which affords a constant supply of cold best water in the city, and equal in flavour to the Tea-water pump . . ."—N. Y. Gazette, Je 3, 1784.

The vestry of Trinity Church, because of its enormous debt (about $18,000), and the expenditure due to the destruction by fire of Trinity Church, the rector's house, the charity school-house, and the fences of the burying grounds, decides "that a number of lots of ground, belonging to this Corporation, situate to the southward of Chamber-street, be forthwith sold at public auction, in fee." The committee on leases, after examination of the various lots, is to report which should be sold and which leased. The members give notice of the days on which they will consider applications for the lots.—N. Y. Jour., Je 17, 1784 (in the archives of the Ann. Institute, N. Y.).

The Bank of New York is opened in the old Walton house, at 67 St. George's (Franklin) Square.—N. Y. Packet, Je 7, 1784.

The house was known also as 156 Queen St., and subsequently as 316 Pearl St. In 1787, the bank moved to No. 11 Hanover Square, and in 1796 purchased the house and lot at the north-east corner of William and Wall Sts. In the following year the house was demolished and a bank building erected.—Domett, Hist. of the Bank of New York, 1784-1884. The bank was incorporated in 1791.—Laws of N. Y., 1791, chap. 37. See also descript. of Pl. 72-b, I: 458.

The commissioners appointed by the act of May 4 to lay out the city in the burnt district recommend that Cortlandt and Crown Sts. be widened, and that Greenwich St. be continued southerly to the common, to be made to a plan proposed by Antheljem Man. The common council orders that the city surveyor survey, stake out, and regulate the streets accordingly.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 45-46, 47. For Van Dam's plan, see Mr 3.

The committee appointed on May 12 in connection with the removal of the slaughter-house reports that it is intolerable to the neighbourhood, and may be prejudicial to health; that it ought to be removed "to some place near the Water & that they would recommend Corlears Hook;" that, if Mr. Bayard will undertake it, he ought to be given the remainder of his lease without charge, grandly defines the city limits of the city locality, and the revenue from the slaughter-house collected for the use of the city. This is agreed to by the common council.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 44. See, for further action, Jl 1 and 21.

From this date to Oct. 27, John McComb received in various payments £1,085 for repairs to the bridewell.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 46, 51, 56, 60, 69, 72, 81, 90, 105. On Nov. 11, he was paid £150 toward finishing the building, and on Dec. 8, he received £150 more.—Ibid., I: 99, 106. He was paid £150, on March 16, 1785, for more repairs to the bridewell, and on Sept. 23, £18760 for the same purpose.—Ibid., I: 125, 170. See Ag 13.

A proposal of Elias Burger is agreed to by the common council, to "lay a Block across Beekman Slip—Six feet at the Bottom & five feet at the Top, Timber Iron, filling up with Stone compleat, Workmanship & all Charges included at twenty Shillings per foot."—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 47-48. On Aug. 26, Burger was paid £100 for this work.—Ibid., I: 67.

Stephen Dolebeer announces that he has "Revised" the Blue Bell Tavern at Fort Washington, "where he hopes for the continuance of his former customers."—N. Y. Packet, Je 15, 1784.

The common council ordered that the Post Road, at about the present 16 St. Rd., at the L. M. R. K., III: 977, locates it on the west side of the Post Road, disproving the statement of O 12, 1753 (p.c.); but erroneously states that it is shown on Pl. 87-b, Vol. III.

The walls of the burned Trinity Church, which have been a menace to the locality, are being thrown down. The church is to be rebuilt as soon as possible.—Ind. Jour., Je 16, 1784. This report was done, however, until 1788 (p.c.). See also descript. of Pl. 49, I: 362. Mayor Duane reports to the common council a plan for the future Management of the Alms House and the Bridewell or House of Employment, which he and the commissioners of the bridewell have agreed upon. The report recites that, as a result of the war, the number of the poor maintained at public expense has greatly increased, and that the annual tax to be assessed for their sustenance has become burdensome and in danger of being oppressive. Also, since the evacuation of this district by the British, "the tranquility of the Inhabitants hath been disturbed by an idle and profligate Banditti who continue to rob and steal . . . and by other abandoned Vagrants and Prostitutes whom the ordinary Process of Justice hath not awed nor reclaimed." It is conceived that only the disinterestedness of the "Bridewell or House of Employment," rigorously administered, will be effectual to correct and restrain "those shameful Enormities." But the "Alms House and Bridewel House of Employment are at present in the immediate Government of the Mayor Recorder & Aldermen (the former in conjunction with the Vestrymen and the latter in conjunction with the Assistants or Common Council Men);" and these magistrates are "veteranenced with the "Management of Affairs of affairs" (the dispensation of justice, regulating the police, and managing the revenues) that they cannot extend the degree of care to "either of the said Institutions" that their importance and the public good demand. The mayor and commissioners of the bridewell therefore submit a plan of management to remedy these conditions, and this is approved.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 48-50.

The Mutual Hook and Ladder Company (volunteers) is organized. It went out of existence in September, 1804. The six volumes of its original MS. records are preserved in the city clerk's library, room 357, Municipal Bldg.'

The alteration of "the Street called Golden Hill or John Street" will cause damages for which two petitioners ask compensation, but the common council decides that no relief can be given.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 52.

The common council agrees that the city will purchase of Mr. Bayard the materials of the slaughter-house; and it is ordered that the commissioners of forfeitures of the Southern District be applied to "for a Piece of Ground of about three acres said to be in possession of John Delaney to be used as a Penn for the Slaughter House but if he refuses the city should purchase a lot in that locality, and the revenue from the slaughter-house collected for the use of the city. This is agreed to by the common council.—M. C. C. (1784-1814), I: 52.

Rev. John Christopher Kunze, “late senior minister of the Lutheran churches in Philadelphia and Professor of Oriental Languages in the University, who is appointed the Lutheran Minister of the Trinity and Christ Churches in this city," arrives in New York.—N. T. Packet, Aug 2, 1784. The two churches had been united, on Jan. 6, under the name of "The United German Lutheran Churches in the City of New York." All services were held in the Lutheran Church (corner of Frankfort and William Sts.) because the Lutheran Trinity Church, burned on Sept. 21, 1786 (p. 74), was never rebuilt.—Kretzmann, The Oldest Lutheran Church in Am., 30. It seems that when the old church on Broadway and Rector St. was burned, its walls being of stone, were left standing, and the building, though never used thereafter by the congregation, was rented for business purposes (see My 30, 1791 and S 6, 1792. See also M 24, 1790.

Lafayette arrives in New York from Havre in the packet ship "Curator." The next day, "he was invited to a splendid entertain- ment, where the officers stationed in their ships, which had been long east aide, but were now resumed in honour of the occasion . . . ." He passed a few days in New York, and departed for Philadelphia.—A Complete Hist. of the Marquis de Lafayette, by an officer in the late army (1826), 156-57. Lafayette came to America to see Gen. Washington and to greet his companions in arms after the declaration of peace. "He was received everywhere by the people with cordial demonstrations of friendship and attachment. Having spent some happy days amid the delightful surroundings of Mount Vernon, whither he was conducted by General Washington, who had gone to Richmond to meet him, he revisited Williamsburg, Yorktown, and other points of interest in the Virginia campaign; he stopped at Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Boston upon his journey through the Middle States and New England; and he sailed for France from New York on the 24th of January, 1786."—Charlemagne Tower, Jr., The Marquis de Lafayette in the Am. Revolution, II: 467-68, citing "Voyage aux Etats-Unis en 1784," in Mémoires, Correspondance et Manuscrits, II: 95-107. Cf. D 14.

Trinity corporation offers a large number of lots for sale. These are in Broadway, Partition, Vesey, Greenwich, Barclay, Robinson, and Corlears Sts.—N. T. Packet, Aug 12, 1784.

A committee is appointed "to confer with the common council of the bridewell [see My 14] relative to the employing of Persons (confined therein) in levelling &c the Ground about the public buildings in this City."—M. C. G. (1784–1831), I: 64. Vagrants housed in the bridewell were frequently employed for similar work during the years following.—Ibid., I: 173, 317, 341, 476. For another kind of employment, see D 3, 1788.

The first of several parcels of land in the Bowery estate of James de Lancey is sold under the New York act of confiscation. Other parcels were sold throughout 1784, '85, and '86, the total receipts being $2,341,987.75. The common council of forfeitures were Isaac Stourentibus and Philip van Cordant. This estate, formerly in the "Outward," comprised one-third of what became the 7th, the whole of the 10th, nearly all of the 11th, the whole of the 12th, and nearly a fourth of the 17th, Wards of the city, with a waterfront of over a mile on the East River. The mansion-house was "a large, double, brick edifice, with extensive grounds and a drive leading to it under large trees." It fronted the Bowery, and stood back nearly on the line of First [the present Christie Street], and higher De Lancey and Rivington Streets. On 1st St. stood Mr. de Lancey's racing stable, and in 2nd St. a paddock for the horses, and near it a private track to train them. "Orchard Street is named from the large orchards on that part of the farm. Evert Bynesick held the part at Corlears Hook or 'Cow Point,' on a long lease for ship-yards, etc., and on Little Division, now Montgomery Street, was Degraves' Rope-walk."—Jones, Hist. of New York, IV: 540-59, with map opp. p. 546. 1784 THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Aug. 16. "The names of some of the streets on the map have been changed. 'Fisher' is now Bayard St.; "Pump" is now Walker St.; "Eagle" is now Hester St.; "Bullcock" is now Broome St.; 'De Lancey's Square,' or "The Great Square," as it was often called, which extended from Grand to Broome, and from Third to Essex, was, unfortunately for the future of the City, cut up into lots by the commissioners and sold, money, not health and beauty, being then desired. 'First' is now Christie St.; 'Second' is now Forsyth; 'Third' is now Eldridge St. No streets were laid out through the blocks where Allen and Ludlow Streets now are. From Arundell Street to the East River no streets were laid out, all being farm or meadow land.

On the highest part of Grand Street was 'Mount Pitt,' about two acres, the town-house and gardens of Judge Jones . . . built by him on land given to . . . the Judge's wife [Anne], by her brother, James de Lancey, in 1765, . . . slaughter-house yard is read in the assembly and referred to a committee.—Assemh. Jour., 14. In this petition, the common council states that they "before the late war established a public house as a common Nuisance and... the slaughter house was by Judgement of Court in due form of Law ordered to be pro-

The proficiencies of their manners and the nature of the warfare, emboldened them to the commission of every crime, abuse, cruelty, rape, and murder. In a few months the most elegant part of the city was a scene of woe, and what was formerly an ornament now appeared a pile of ruins. Dirt, filth, and stench filled the houses and streets; there was daily exercised a shameless and wanton abuse of the houses and property of the exiled, which was meanly and spitefully increased; the quays, wharfs and streets were suffered to go for ruin for eight long years, the morals of the remaining youth, and the manners of the grown-up, were made worse if not ruined by an intercourse with the debauched youths of that army; the city revenue was dissipated, and turned to private account, the places of worship and other public edifices, were converted into goals and hospitals; the dead were not suffered to rest in their graves, the burying yards were laid open, and public roads made through them. Close on the eve of an approaching war, with an heterogeneous set of inhabitants, composed of almost ruined exiles, disbanded soldiery, mixed foreigners, disaffected Tories, and the refuse of a British army, we took possession of a ruined city. Under these circumstances, much was to be done, much was expected, and not only the eyes of our sister-states were turned towards us, but those of Europe were fixed upon us. The ground was to be treads with caution; many, important and various were the objects; almost insurmountable were the difficulties, unforeseen, and unforeseeable; yet, as the wars of the United States, and the judgment, profound knowledge in all laws and politics were necessary to guide the deliberations; charters were to be changed, laws altered and assimilated to our new constitution, and made consistent with the fundamental principles of our new Empire, without infringing the rights of the citizens; good order and regularity were to take the place of anarchy and confusion, the city was to be cleansed of its filth, lighted, and made a place of pleasant walks and resting places, the buildings repaired, the port and ferries regulated; all this and much more was to be done, without a shilling revenue, or scarcely means to procure it. Let any man of observation and candor go through the city, view it in its present situation, and compare it with what it was when we took possession of it, and when he considers the slender means hitherto in the city's power, he will pay that tribute of applause the magistrates so richly deserve; let him attend the markets, and be pleased at the good order maintained; let him visit the goal, poor-house and bridewell, and be perfectly satisfied with the neatness and internal economy."—Louden's N. T. Packet, D 16, 1784.

Fish, many other brother officers, and a vast concourse of citizens." As the barge passed the Battery, he was saluted with thirteen guns. Some little time after he stepped aboard, the frigate saluted the American flag with a Continental salute, which was returned by the artillery of the fort.—Ind. Jour., D 22, 1784.

Congress, in session at Trenton, after debating the subject of the site of a permanent seat of buildings for use of the federal government, stands adjourned to meet in the City of New York on Jan. 11 next, where the sessions are to be held "until the buildings aforesaid shall be ready for use."—Jour. of Cong. The mayor informs the common council that congress has resolved (see D 24) to meet in New York on January 11; he refers also to an invitation given to congress by the legislature (see N 13), and indicates the propriety of offering congress "such Parts of the City Hall or other public Buildings belonging to this Corporation as they should deem necessary & best suited for their accommodation." It is resolved to make such offer, and that the mayor be requested to communicate this resolution to the president of congress.—G. C. (May 1785), I: 167-8; descrip. of Frontispiece I, III: 538. James of the Royal Regiment of Artillery when it was attacked and its contents destroyed by the Sons of Liberty on Nov. 1, 1765 (q.v.). See Je 11, 1789.

Luigi Castiglioni, an Italian traveler, who was in New York from 1785 to 1787, later published an account in Italian of his visit to the United States, which contained the following statements with reference to this city: "In the Hall of Congress are the portraits of Louis XVI and of the Queen, his wife, which were presented by the King to the United States." "... Every house has a number; the streets are paved with stones, and have their names upon the angles, and are lighted up at night.

"For the convenience of merchants there is a coffee-house, which serves instead of an excursion depot; they take all the gazettes of the country, London and Paris, and carefully register the vessels that enter or leave the port.

"The inhabitants are about twenty-two thousand, and although in the new Legislature there is no distinction, they may nevertheless be divided into four classes. . . ." These are described, the first being those possessed of "manners."—From Viaggio negli Stati Uniti dell' America Settentrionale fatto negli anni 1785, 1786, e 1787 da Luigi Castiglioni (1790), I: 175-83. Portions of this work were published, in translation, in the N. Y. Gen. & Gen. Adv., D 8, 1789, and the editor made the following interesting observation regarding the portraits of Louis XVI and his queen: "These paintings, executed, we understand, by Wurtmuller, a painter of meritorious distinction continued to ornament the Senate Chamber in the Capital [after its removal to Washington] till the British troops fired the building during the late war [of 1812]. The portrait of Marie Antoinette was entirely consumed, but that of Louis XVI was but partially injured. It was removed into a lumber-room in the General Post Office, and afterwards disappeared, it is said, rather mysteriously. These portraits were full length, and executed in a most masterly style.

About this year, the Dyckman house, at the corner of Broadway and 204th St., was built. It was presented to the city in 1915. For a history and description of the house, see 21st Ann. Rep., Am. Scenic & Hist. Pres. Soc. (1916), 197-201; also 22d Ann. Rep. (1917), 435-48.

In this year, Alexander Anderson made a small sketch of Lippard's Meadows from a point in Broadway which was afterwards the site of the St. Nicholas Hotel. The original, which was reproduced and described in Man. Com. Gaun. (1856), opp. p. 442, is now in the author's collection.

Between 1775 and 1785, Trinity Corporation granted at least 310, T. 1691 about. A summary of references in the Chronology and elsewhere to this island yields the following information respecting its history and various names. Its aboriginal name, as given by Schoolcraft, was “Kiohkh,” or Gull Island. Schoolcraft’s names and interpretations, however, are not always trustworthy. A court record of Dec. 6, 1656, (q.v.), Vol. III, 33, calls it “Oyster Island.” There were three so-called “Oyster Islands”—Bedlow’s, Ellis’s, and a small island near them, now a submerged rock.—See Ap 20, 1676, Addenda, Vol. IV, and cross-references there cited.

In the first statute to define the territory of New York County, passed Nov. 1, 1683 (Col. Laws N. Y., I: 111), the island which we know as Ellis Island was not included: “The City & County of New York, to contain all those lots, called by the names of Manhattan Island, Mannings Blackwell’s Island, and the two Barne [Randell’s and Ward’s] Islands, the City to be called as itt is now, New York, and the Islands above specified the County thereof.”

Soon after, this island was known as Dyre’s Island. William Dyre and Mary, his wife, by deed dated April 21, 1686, conveyed to Thomas Lloyd certain lands “without the North Gate of the City of New York, Adjacent to the island called certain Island Situate and lying in Hudsons River to the Westward of Manhattans or York Island And north of Bedelles Island Commonly called or Knowne by the name of Dyre’s Island or Oyster Island. Containing by Estimation about Six acres be the same more or less.”—Liber Deeds, XIII: 202.

The second statute to define the county of New York, passed Oct. 16, 1691 (q.v., and all Laws N. Y., I: 115), refers to it thus: “The City and County of New York to contain all the Island commonly called Manhattans Island Mannings Island [Blackwell’s] the two Barne Islands [Randell’s and Ward’s] and the three Oyster Islands [vide supra] Manhattans Island to be called the City of New York and the rest of the Islands the county.”

During the Revolution, it bore the name “Buckling Island.”—See Nov. 0, 1776, in the Howe War Plan, Souther’s Map, etc. The meaning of this name has not been discovered during the present research, nor has the name been found in the text of contemporary letters and journals. It was used, however, not only on contemporary maps, but also long after the name Ellis Island became familiar. It appears thus in the Revised Statutes of the State of New York, chap. 2 (ad. ed., 1869), V: 310, wherein New York City is defined as “the City of New York; the County of New York shall contain the islands called Manhattan’s Island, Great Barn [Ward’s] Island, Little Barn [Randell’s] Island, Manning’s [Blackwell’s] Island, Nutten [Governor’s] Island, Bedlow’s Island, Bucking [Ellis] Island, and the Oyster Islands [probably error for Island, there being only three Oyster Islands of record, two of these being Bedlows and Ellis Islands—vide supra]; and all the lands within the limits of the island of Manhattan.” On Jan. 14, 1791, Congress passed a resolution expressing their “just sense of the attention” which the common council “have manifested to the interest of the federal union, in the offer they have made of such of the public buildings in the city as may be necessary for the transaction of public business; and [stating] that they accept the several apartments in the city-hall, the whole of which (except the court and jury rooms) will be necessary for the session of Congress, and the accommodation of their officers.”—Jour. of Cong. (1801 ed.), XI: 26; M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 115-14; descrip. of Frontispiece I, III: 538.

Richard Henry Lee, president of congress, writes from New York to Thomas Shippen: “... He had not yet moved in on Jan. 20.—Ibid., III: 324. The Franklin house, at No. 3 Cherry St., became Washington’s residence when he was inaugurated president.—J. M. R. K., III: 949.

The Society provides “on the most elegant entertainments, given in this city” to Richard Henry Lee and all the members of congress at town at this time. Mayor Duane and a number of other gentlemen of distinction are present.—N. J. Gaz. (Trenton), F. 7, 1785.

Samuel Ellis, of No. 1 Greenwich St., “at the North River, near the Bear Market,” advertises for sale “that pleasant situated Island, called Oyster [now Ellis] Island, lying in York Bay, near Peter’s Hook. London N. T. Packet,” Jan. 29, 1785. A summary of references in the Chronology and elsewhere to this island yields the following information respecting its history and various names. Richard Henry Lee writes from New York to Patrick Henry, governor of Virginia. "... Both countries [Great Britain and the United States] have been at blame [since the restoration of peace], and transgressions against the terms of peace were on each side coeval, so that whilst we charged them with removing the slaves from New York, they pointed to the violence with which their friends were everywhere treated, with the detention of their debts, and with actions here brought against those who possessed houses in this city whilst it was in their power by the fortune of war. ..."—Letters of Richard Henry Lee, II: 223.

The corporation of Trinity Church presents a petition to the senate, asking to be permitted to be heard in opposition to the report of a committee of one, of which—Feb., 3, 1801—there appears to be a wish that the title to the land formerly known as the King's Farm and Garden "was of right, before the revolution, vested in the King of Great Britain, and now belongs to, and is of right vested in, the people of this state." At the same time the corporation presents a memorial and remonstrance to the assembly, stating briefly Trinity's title to this land, the ground of the objection being that the assembly committee made its report without consulting the trustees of Trinity corporation on the subject.—Loudon's N. Y. Packet, F 28, 1785. An unsigned tract of 34 pages in reply to the remonstrance was published the same year. It is entitled Some Remarks on the Memorial, etc., and is addressed to the assembly. It is reprinted in full in the N. Y. H. S. Collections (1870), 341-72.

He had no opportunity to inculcate his principles of free trade. . . ." His activities as a whole, as outlined by Winson, indicate a purpose to establish international good will on a basis of practical reciprocity in physical benefits. Among the specific things mentioned, "He conferred with the political mentors of the coming French Revolution, and wrote to Jay to induce the shipment of American flour for the starving Parisians."

Mr. John Adams, is sent plenipotentiary to the court of London, and Mr. Jefferson is the minister at Versailles, Dr. Franklin having leave, at his own request, to retire."—Letters of Richard Henry Lee, II: 349.

A committee of the common council having reported on July 13 that "a Powder Magazine can conveniently & safely be placed on the Corporation Ground at Inclam Bergh to the West of the middle Road & to the north of the Farm of the late Benjamin Nicoll Esq," it is ordered that it be erected there, and a committee is appointed to report a plan for the building.—M. The later transfers of the property were as follows: George Powers sold it to Dr. Nicholas Romany, April 30, 1795, for $2,300.—Ibid., LIV: 144. Dr. Romany in turn sold it to John S. Moore, June 24, 1820, for $6,250.—Ibid., LXI: 68. He kept it only a short time, selling it June 22, 1821, to Thomas Gardner, for $7,500.—Ibid., LX: 439. A letter is read in the common council from Mr. St. John, "Consul of his most Christian Majesty the King of France & Navarre," requesting that the Roman Catholics of the city may be permitted to meet in the exchange until their church can be finished. It is ordered that he be informed that the exchange was injured during the war, and cannot sustain any great weight. The assembly lately conceived they were in no small danger in two instances "when a concourse of people were collected" that they removed to another place for security. It is believed "these Facts will probably render the Exchange ineligible to the Roman Catholic Assembly for the present."—Empress of China, the first vessel that arrived in N. Y., to be represented to the same by his most Christian Majesty's Consul.—M. C. C. (1784–1831), I: 137.

A leading historian of the Catholic Church relates the following sequel of this incident: "The one to whom the Catholics of the great city now assist is Hester St. John de Crevceour, Consul-General of France. . . . In their name he applied in April 1785, to the city authorities for the use of the Exchange on Broad Street, a building then entirely unoccupied; but the Common Council refused to permit the Catholics to assemble there on Sunday. St. John de Crevceour represented the act as an indignity to himself and the Catholic body. Roused by him, the Catholics of New York resolved to secure ground and erect a church. A law had been passed for the incorporation of religious societies, and, under its provisions, St. John de Crevceour, the Rev. Mr. Silva, James Stewart, and Henry Duffin were incorporated on the 10th of June, 1785, as "The Trustees of the Roman Catholic Church in the City of New York." There was some difficulty in obtaining a site, but during the summer Father Whelan, guided, it is said, by Mr. Silva's judgment, bought a lease of five lots on Barclay Street extending to Church. A carpenter's shop standing on this ground became a temporary church building for the Catholic body on New York Island. In August, Trinity Church, which owned the fee, encouraged the little flock of Catholics by agreeing to sell them the revereration on easy terms, and more than fulfilled the promise."—Shea, Life and Times of the Most Rev. John Carroll (1888), 266–67; Catholic Encyclopedia, XI: 21 (title "New York").

Nicholas Ray of London, in a letter to the corporation of the city, offers "his Services in purchasing the Iron Work and other materials necessary to repair the ruins wrought by the two great fires that occurred in New York during the war. The common council passes a resolution that thanks be sent him "for his benevolent Intentions," but that "the deranged State of the Corporation Revenues in consequence of the heavy debt contracted by their predecessors in office previous to the late War is such as to prevent their acceptance of his kind offer."—M. C. C. (1784–1831), I: 136.

Anthony Post is paid £50 for repairs to the city hall.—M. C. C. (1784–1831), I: 138. This is one of many payments for this purpose at this period, due to its poor condition (see S 22, 1784), as well as its expected occupation by congress (see D 22 and 24, 1784). The last payment was made in 1784. The agreement with Washington to reply to the board's address of Dec. 2, 1784 (q.v.), is entered to full in the order of the 13th, with the order that the address and answer be published.—M. C. C. Extent of trade with China from New York to China. She realized a net profit of $50,727, or twenty percent on the capital invested.—Stevens, Progress of N. T. in a Century, 46. On May 19, Samuel Shaw, the commercial agent for the owners, wrote to Mr. Jay, the minister for foreign affairs, describing the voyage. He referred to this as the "first vessel that has been fitted out by the inhabitants of the United States of America, for exporting a commerce with those of the Empire of China." The ship "is about 360 tons burthen, built in America, and equipped with 43 persons, under the command of John Green, Esq." She sailed from New York, Feb. 22, 1784 (q.v.), and arrived at Canton on Aug. 30, 1784. She left Canton Dec. 27, and returned by way of the Cape of Good Hope to New York, where she arrived May 11, 1785. Mr. Jay laid Shaw's letter before Congress, which expressed their satisfaction in the successful issue of that first effort of the citizens of America, to establish a direct trade with China.—N. J. Gaz. (Trenton), S 26, 1785; Correspond. and Pub. Papers of John Jay, III: 144–49.

Richard Henry Lee, writing from New York to James Madison on May 30, said: "The American enterprise has been well marked by a short and successful Voyage made from hence to Canton to China—The Chinese were kind to our people and glad to see a new source of Commerce opened to them from a New Nation, as they called us—The Europeans there were civil but astonished at the rapidity of our movements, especially the English—I fear that every one of our Countrymen will endeavor this business—for now there appears no post-office, and the service of letters is at a standstill. ...—Letters of Richard Henry Lee: II: 356.

A resolution is passed by Trinity vestry "That the Committees of repairs and pew-be will be directed to view the South door of St. Paul's Chappel and report the practicability of shutting up the same, and making in lieu thereof a large elevated pew with two smaller ones on each side similar to the Governors and the two pews adjoining, so as to make both sides of the Church uniform. That they likewise report the practicability of Converting the South West Window of the Church into a door for the Gallery Stair cases: of altering the pews in the South Gallery of having an Alle through the middle of the same with square Pews on each side and of lathing and plastering the lower Belfry and that they report thereon to the Syn. Min. (M.S.).

Mr. Rutherford, of the committee on leases, requests the opinion of Trinity vestry "whether Partition and Vesy [sic] Streets on the Church farm should be laid out at the width of 58 or 65 feet;" he represents "that in the original plan drawn by Mr. Marshall the Streets were laid down at 42 feet wide and the Houses built accordingly, that after the great fire of 1776 in which all the houses in both Streets were destroyed the then Managers of the Church Estate determined to make each Street 25 [65'] feet wide which determination this Corporation have since approved of, but that the fence around the burying ground of St. Paul's Church has been placed in such a manner as to make the Streets only 58 feet wide instead of 65 and that graves have been dug and Vaults built contiguous to the fence so as to make the removal inconvenient and disagreeable to many and that in the lower part of the Street the City Surveyor has laid out several lots on a line with the burying ground fence on which several houses have been built and some of them with brick." The vestry, taking these facts into consideration, and reflecting "that the removal of the houses and the burying ground fences would be attended with many inconveniences and perhaps be impracticable," pass the following resolution: "That this Corporation do reede from their former determination with respect to the width of Partition and Vesy Streets and that the width of said Streets in future be 58 feet each."—Ibid.

"The want of genteel house of entertainment in the neighbouring town, has been a very common complaint; the subscriber has made this as much so, as his money and taste would possibly allow; and humbly hopes for the encouragement of the public."—N. Y. Packet, My 26, 1785. See Mr 13, 1788.

Joseph Corre announces that at "the Confectionary and New-York Hotel," 52 Smith (William) St., he supplies "anything in the Confectionary way." He also has "gentled rooms" for lodgers. He states "that his distresses are of such a poignant nature, as compell him to request some, (the small,) yet present assistance."—From original petition (in metal file No. 8, in city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read & filed 10th Aug 1785 £100 to be advanced to Mr Colles;" M. An item of New York news states: "A Correspondent, says he has hopes, to flatter himself and all the friends of the Drama, that we shall once more have the benefit of that pleasing amusement in this country, and that foreigners of distinction and notoriety, may no longer complain of our want of public entertainment; he is surprised at the insolence of the Tory gentry, who it seems in order to ingratiate themselves with some of the citizens are using their influence, however inconsiderable it may be, to prevent any performances of that kind, but it is to be hoped, that those gentlemen, who have shared all the perils of the war, and braved danger in its most ghastly forms, will of those who give such weighty and significant characters be deprived of partaking of the enjoyments which that innocent and rational amusement affords."—Penn. Jour., Ag 13, 1785. See Ag 12.

The entertainment of the evening, which received unbounded bursts of applause from a most polite and numerous assembly of both sexes, was an admirable collection of moral characters, happily selected (by the judicious taste of the managers) from the most acknowledged and best works of the best writers. The collection has produced, and were displayed in a matter that bestowed the highest honour on their authors; and to the reflecting mind gave the finest lessons of instruction, pleasingly blended with amusement."—Penn. "Veritas," in a letter to the press, observes "that it is a general complaint that in this great city and its environs there is not any spot where its inhabitants can take exercise for health and amusement. . . . The size and consequence that this town must one day arrive at, ought strongly to impress the necessity of attending to this object. In this view the Battery naturally presents itself as a subject capable of vast improvement; were the margin of this ground laid out with judgment, planted with a row of trees, and furnished with seats, from which one could command one of the finest harbours of the world. There is also another space of ground, which calls loudly for the hand of improvement—now a public nuisance, from which the inhabitants are infested during the summer season, with continual clouds of stinking dust. The ground I mean is the Fields.—This place laid out with judgment and taste, would become a blessing to the inhabitants of New York, and an ornament to the city." He describes the methods in vogue in Great Britain and Ireland for obtaining plans for public improvements.—N. Y. Packet, Ag 15, 1785.

The city treasurer, Daniel Phoenix, having submitted a "Representation" relative to an allowance for his services, the common council orders "that five Per Cent be allowed the Treasurer, for the whole time of his being in Office, in full Compensation for his ordinary as well as extraordinary Services relative to the ordinary Revenues of this Corporation."—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 161-64. The original "Representation," thus briefly alluded to in the minutes, is a review of "what was formerly the practice with respect to the County business." It states: "The Chamberlain had under his Direction the Care and Collection of the extraordinary Revenues only. The Taxes were paid into the Hands of the Church wardens who were Chosen Annually by the freeholders, and were properly Church officers, appointed in Consequence of an Act of Assembly Granting a Support to the Ministry in this City. The whole of the Taxes were paid into their Hands, and they had the Laying out of the money appropriated to the Support of the Poor House, which was the most considerable part of the Tax. —The Water & Lamps & Roads was paid into the Hands of the City Treasurer by those Gentlemen. No Specific Salary or Commission was Assigned them for this Business, they derived their Emolument from the profits made on the Supplies, and Surely no person Can say they derived no benefit from their appointment. It was considered that they did not mention the Extent of their profits. The money for Watch & Lamps was paid out of the City Treasury by an order of Common Council, and on this the Treasurer had a Commission. I am well informed from a Gent, who was a Member of the Board in Mr Cruger’s Day that He was allowed 5 pce on that money for which I could produce the Testimony of Gent. of unexceptionable Character.

“At present all public Monies are paid into the City Treasury, and are Subject to the order of Com. Council. The business of this office is increased beyond any former time, and the Disordered State of the Corporation Affairs, on the Evanescence of this City, has rendered it Still more Arduous, So that the person Executing this Office Must of Necessity devote a Very Considerable Part of his Time to the public Office in order to do Justice to his Appointment. The amount of Corporation Revenue in a Common Year is about £2800. Of this it may be Supposed to fall Short by Remissions & Losses £190, Which will reduce it to £650. This Sum at 5 pce is £13–10–0 for which a Sess of Books are to be Kept—Accounts to the amount of near 450 to be drawn out and the amount of revenue above mentioned to be Collected of as many different persons,—An allowance So remarkably sufficient to compensate a Clerk.

“Besides this there is the business of the Taxes—the Accounts are to be Kept with the Collectors of the different wards & Districts—Settlements to be made under the Inspection of a Committee of this Board—and the Sum appropriated to be Carried to the Credit of Each Respective Account, can it be in reason Supposed that all this Business can be done as the time of one man? The office of Treasurer is an appointment of Great Trust and under its present Circumstances rendered more Important. It has been the practice of the Corporation to appoint persons of Respectability & Credit, who only can Give Such Security as will Justify the appointment, but is it worth the attention of any person to undertake all this Business for so inconsiderable a Sum. As the Allowance for Corporation business is so Small it remains with the Board to make such Allowance out of the Publick monies as will make it worth the Labour and Attention it requires. It appears from an Act of Assembly which has been mentioned that an allowance was formerly made of 6d in the pound to County Treasurers, and it can be proved that John II Cruger was allowed 5 pce on the Publick monies paid into his hands by the Church Wardens—As to this the office of the City Treasurer has been as the time of many different persons. It appears from the old Books that He was allowed the same Sum of 5 pce on the Taxes of this City—

“Can any Gent consider it unreasonable that an adequate Compensation should be made for those Services at the present day? The Board have Thought it Necessary to advance the price of Cartmen and others in their Wages for regulating the prices of their Services, and does not the Circumstances that Induced them to make those advances in their Case, exist with respect to the Treasurer.” He adds, in closing, an allowance “of 2 pce.”—From the original MS. in city clerk’s record-room.

The “old Magazine in the Fort,” which measures 28 by 48 feet, is found to be “perfectly safe & convenient & that by a little airing will be very pleasant.”—M. C. C. (1784–1813), I. 157, 162. It is evidently intended for temporary use while the new one at “Inclam Bergh” is being built.—See ibid., I. 152, 159.

An item of New York news reads: “On Friday last [Aug 19] Messrs Hallam and Allen, the gentlemen who for some time past have entertained the town with their agreeable, honourous, and moral lectures [see Aug 12] paid into the hands of the commissioners of the Albany Orphan’s Home One Hundred Dollars towards the relief and support of its indigent inhabitants. When the talents and labours of the ingenious are employed, as well to reform the manners as to the benevolent purpose of softening the rigours of misfortune, and feeding the poor and needy, they certainly deserve not only encouragement, but applause.”—Penn. Jour., Aug 27, 1785. For the attitude of the common council toward such donations, see O. 14.

“A Citizen” addressed the following petition to the mayor and aldermen:—

It is remarked by the citizens, that the Tea Water, with which this city is supplied, grows worse every day, so that the common pump water, used only to scrub houses, etc. with, is now preferred in cooking to our Tea Water. The reason is very obvious,—let any one view the pond, which is the spring and source of that pump, and you will find it to be a very sink and common sewer. It’s like a fair every day with whites, and blacks, washing their clothes, blankets, and things too nauseous to mention; all their sudd’s and filth are emptied into this pond, besides dead dogs, cats, etc. thrown in daily, and no doubt, many buckets from that quarter of the town. The pond being so very near the pump has no distance to filter through the earth, and it is more than probable, runs through a considerable canal under ground directly to the pump. Twice-watchmen would be sufficient to ordered papers and penalties to prevent any person from washing or throwing any filth in this pond. A very trickle of a tax would pay them, and in 6 or 9 months our water would be as good as it was before the war.”—N. Y. Jour., Aug 25, 1785.

John Francis advertises that “he has taken the house No. 3, in Great Dock-street, near the Exchange, nearly opposite to the War-Office, where he intends to reside, and finds it completely adapted to the true American.”—N. Y. Packet, Aug 25, 1785. He moved from here into the well-known Fraunces Tavern, in 1789 (q. v., My 27). Congress passes a resolution of appreciation for the “early, unsolicited, and continued labours of Mr. Thomas Paine, in explaining and enforcing the principles of the late revolution by ingenious and timely publications upon the nature of liberty and civil government.”—Congress resolution. Oct. 5: su, and issued orders, &c. to prevent any person from washing or throwing any filth in this pond. A very trickle of a tax would pay them, and in 6 or 9 months our water would be as good as it was before the war.”—N. Y. Jour., Aug 25, 1785.

John Fitzh a letter to a friend about his situation as a public servant during the Revolutionary War. He describes the difficulties of maintaining the public service, including the lack of funds and support from the government. He expresses his determination to continue his service despite the challenges.

The total receipts are £3,251, of which £2,311 were received from a tax of £10,000. Quit rents and ground rents, including arrearages during the war, have yielded £7,376. Lots at the North River and Peck Slip have been sold for £3,517. The excise has brought in £2,000; the docks and slips, £386; livery, £915; and house rent, £610. For these and other particulars, see Man. Com. Coun. (1839), 511–12.

Van Phyder’s Tavern (see Mr 14, 1795), opposite the Bridge Meeting, in Nassau St., was frequently noticed in the news after the Revolution.—See N. Y. The war, petitions the common council for a rebate of quit rent paid to the city. He states he has been informed that the common council have passed an act "An Act to exempt all the Citizens who have been in exile during the war, from the payment of quit rents upon such part or proportion of their real property," from which neither they nor their agents have received rents, profits, or income during that period.—From the original petition in box No. 6, in city clerk's record-room.

Notice is published of a new line of stages, "to start the 7th instant, from the Morning Star on Staten-Island, opposite Bergen-Point, every morning at four o'clock, (Sundays excepted) . . . ." The route is from Paulus Hook to Philadelphia. "The Staten-Island packets leave every day at the White-Hall Dock, to convey those passengers to the Morning Star, who prefer going by water. . . ."—N. 5 York [see Ap 39] was advancing by the energy of St. John de Crevecouer and the patronage of Don Diego de Gardoqui. Father Whelan and the trustees of the congregation undertook the erection of the edifice with courage, adopting a plan beyond their actual means, but hopefully looking forward to future progress. It was to be a handsome brick structure, with a square tower, forty-eight feet front by eighty-one in depth. They addressed petitions for aid to the Kings of France and Spain, the latter forwarded through Don Diego de Gardoqui, who furthermore consented to lay the cornerstone. This ceremony took place on the 5th of October, 1785. . . .

10 The Spanish minister, in conformity with the desire of the congregation named the church St. Peter's. They were not, however, able to proceed with the work at once, but continued collecting funds for the purpose in New York and Europe. Meanwhile, as has already been noted (see Ap 30), a carpenter's shop was set up on the leasehold property which they had acquired on Barclay St. as fitted up as a temporary chapel.—Shea, Life and Times of the Mayor of New York, I: 283 (in W. A. M. S.). See Oct 10, 1785; Eccles. Rec., VII: 1451; L. M. R. K., III: 936. See further, My 26, 1786.

17 Thomas Pool, in a petition to the common council, states that he proposes for a few weeks to exhibit feats of horsemanship, and, as he cannot procure "an any place convenient for the purpose but the bowling green," he asks for the use of it. He adds that he has been in his country's service during the war, and suffered several years imprisonment in the provost in this City, where he was confined in irons in a dungeon 235 days without bed or fire, and daily tortured by the Provost marshal—the consequence of which was that he was deprived of the use of his limbs sixteen months."—From the original petition, in file No. 8, city clerk's record-room. The petition was rejected.—M. C. G. (1784-1811), I: 173. Pool was probably the first American to give public performances of this character, having first exhibited in Philadelphia on Aug. 20, 1785, for fuller account of which see Greenwood's The Circus (1909), 66 et seq. See also S 27, 1786.

17 Several proprietors of lands on Mulberry St. and in that vicinity, state in a petition to the common council that improvements have been made on their lands that have not been properly regulated; that "this street is situated at the Foot of a very high Hill (the summit of which overlooks the Houses on the North East Side of the Street) and will . . . require to be raised several Feet before any considerable Improvements can be reasonably expected in that Part of the City." They propose that the street be so regulated "as to give the Water a gradual Descent from the House of Mr. Thomas Arden, so as to carry it by Roosevelt Street into the East River." They add that they understand that their wishes have been under consideration by the city, who plan to fill up Mulberry Street by digging down Mott Street, which is just above and parallel to it. Among the signers of this petition are Margaret Livingston, William Mooney, Abraham Brevoort, and Peter Schermerhorn.—From the original petition (in metal file No. 8, city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read 15th March 1786." See Oct 7, 1786; M. C. G. (1784-1811), I: 206.

17 Samuel Kip. In a bill of this date, charges the city £73 for "Landing & Carting" through his farm 57,71 brick, 2,500 pantile (curved tile for roofing), and 100 loads of stone.—From the original bill (in metal file No. 12, city clerk's record-room), endorsed fill'd 15 June 1786.' The certificate of the auditors, which is attached to this bill, shows that these building materials were landed at Kips Bay "for the use of the New powder house." John Stagg, in a bill of May 13, 1786 (in the same file), charges the city £118:12 for labour, lime, etc. at both the old and new powder-houses.

The common council offers a reward of £125 to discover the person or persons who last night attempted to assassinate Brockholst Livingston of New York, provided the governor will issue a proclamation to that effect.—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 1751.

At Perth Amboy, passengers and goods will be taken from Parker's wharf and store-house "on board a commodious boat."—N. T. Packet, O 13, 1785.

A company of players, who had opened the playhouse without obtaining a license, present £40 to one of the commissioners of the almshouse for the use of the poor. The common council orders that the money be returned, as their playing without license "is a thing unprecedented and offensive." They further resolve "that while so great a part of this City still lies in Ruins and many of the citizens continue to be pressed with the Distress brought on them in consequence of the late war there is a loud Call to Industry and Economy, and it would in a peculiar manner be unjustifiable in the Corporation to countenance any Encroachments upon the Ameniments; That among these a Play House (Theatre) however regulated must be numbered, while under no restraint it may prove a fruitful source of Dissipation, Immorality and Vice."—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 178-79. See N 21, D 26.

John Stagg is paid £100 toward the Powder Magazine existing at Inclambourn.—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 179. On Oct. 16, James Blackwell was paid £25 for stone used there.—Ibid., I: 181. See Ap 20.

In a petition to the common council, Gozen Ryers, Thomas Quigley, and others, state that they pay the city "a large sum of Money, for the benefit of The Fery's; from Wife Hall, To Staten Island; and from Moors Corner, To Elizabeth Town," expecting them to be kept in repair; but that the "Docks, and Ferry Stairs, are so much Injured; by the late storms, that Horses, Cano't be taken off from Wife Hall, only at high, or near highwater." They contend that they themselves are obliged "to keep good boats, and give good attention," and ask the same consideration from the city. They further represent "That the (late) slaughter-house, at Moors Corner is a great Obstruction, to the Ferry," and as "a nuisance," by next spring.—From the original petition (in metal file No. 8, in city clerk's record-room), endorsed "Aldn Wool & Mr Van Dyck to repair Stairs at Moors Dock;" and see M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 183.

(1879), 581, stated that payment was never made, "and the grounds to the northwest of the City Hall still belong to the heirs of the New York Liberty Boys;" see, however, Je 10, 1789.

Divine service was performed there in the morning, after which he entertained with "an elegant dinner" all the members of congress, including the president and secretary; Gov. Clinton; the ministers of foreign affairs, war, and finance; the foreign ministers, consuls, etc. Friendship between Spain and the United States was the key-note of the occasion.—N. Y. The John Street Theatre is opened "by the Old American Company of Comedians."—Penn. Jour., N 26, 1785. "The play was the Gavestor, written by the late Mr. Edward Moore, author of Fables for the Female Sex. . . . The farce was Love a-la-Mode, a production of Mr. Charles Macklin, an excellent Comedian. . . . All the parts were acted with great ability, by our old acquaintances the long approved, and very respectable American Company, who received unremittable plaudits from every part of the house, which, at a vast expense, is now perfectly repaired, beautified, and illuminated in a stile to vie with European splendor.—After the farce, Mr. Henry, one of the Manager's . . . addressed his generous patrons as follows . . . . Eighteen years past, your bounty erected this Theatre [see D 7, 1787]—Happy in your approbation and support, we continued the exercise of our profession in it, until the black cloud that threatened the liberty of America, rendered it necessary for the sons of freedom, at their joint meeting, to prohibit, during that awful period, all public amusements; among many others, the Theatre was particularized [see O 20, 1776]. This was conveyed to us not only by the resolution of Congress, but it is letter from the President, his Excellency the late Peyton Randolph, and also from the Committee then sitting in this city. . . . We went to the island of Jamaica. . . . Ten years we languished in absence from one we wished for, our desirable home, and though often solicited to return . . . we constantly refused, supposing it incompatible with our duty to the United States. . . . Many of us have passedour days in your service, and we are now returned, trusting we shall be allowed to wind up peaceably the evening of them, under the happy auspices of your protection. . . . The approbation of the foregoing, by every auditor, was expressive of a sincere welcome of the company to New-York, the real Athens of America."—Jib, N 30; N. Y. Packet, N 24, 1786. See D 26.

He explains that he has already made & disposed of to the grocers & other retailers in this City a quantity of the said commodity, which upon trial is proved to be fully equal in quality to any imported, although he can afford them the benefit at a lesser price." He asks the board to advance him the further sum of £50 to establish the manufacture on a proper footing.—From original petition (in metal file No. 8, city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read 21 Nov. 1785." A news item reads: "A correspondent observes, that the infatuation which possesses many of the people of this city, for theatrical exhibitions, is truly alarming. Some were led to imagine that the friends of the drama were principally confined to this city; but alas! the small number of individuals have spread the same delirium to the Players. It would be doing injustice to our Magistrates, not to mention here, that though it was not in their power to prohibit, yet they have never extended their authority so far, as publicly to license the opening of the Theatre; and if common fame can be credited none of them have countenanced the Comedian, by attending their exhibitions.—An example worthy the imitation of all ranks."

"When we find this darling vice encouraged in the first, and patronized in the second city of the state; and rearing its ensigns in each corner thereof, is it not High Time for the considerate inhabitants, to step forth and oppose the increasing evil, with firmness and resolution, 'ere it be too late."—N. 1788

In this year, a census was taken under a provision of the "Articles of Confederation," which had reference to an equalization of the expenses of the late war, "in proportion to the whole number of whites and persons free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes." This census was to have been taken triennially, but was suspended by the decennial census of the federal government, which began in 1790 under the provisions of the Constitution of 1789. This census of 1787 showed a population of 13,614—Statutes of Population of the City and Co. of N. Y., Doc. No. 13, Bd. of Supervisors, 1866, pp. 14-15. The number of houses in the city in this year was 3,340.—Am. Mag., Mr. 1788. See also Ap 30.

Although the following description refers to New York as it was after 1790 (as appears by the mention of the "town hall where former Congress met"), it is placed here because many of the facts mentioned (with the notable exception of the error in population, "about 25,000") are applicable to this earlier year.

"New York, the capital of the State, enjoys one of the most beautiful locations in the world. . . . The town is irregularly built; nevertheless there are beautiful streets and sidewalks. The promenade at the quay offers the double advantage of a brilliant perspective and a place for fresh air. There is a town hall, where formerly the Congress met; it is not a remarkable building. The houses are built of brick. There are three Dutch Reformed churches, four Presbyterian, three Episcopal, one Lutheran, a Catholic church, a Roman church, an assembly of Quakers, two Anabaptists, and one synagogue. . . ."

"A sojourner in New York is good for the health: the climate is made temperate in all seasons by the breezes from the sea. There is luxury among the women; they are amiable, and well educated; they are good housewives, which makes their society interesting in more than one respect; however, it is not very advanced. New York still carries the traces of its origin. The Dutch, in transmitting to the inhabitants of this city their mania for cleanliness, which English customs have modified a little, have left them also little aptitude for the sciences. One must admit, nevertheless, that, since the Revolution, New York has outgrown its ancient boundaries, and will soon equal the most progressive cities in science and literature. Her commercial situation, which puts her above all the towns in the United States, must necessarily accelerate her progress towards general education and instruction, which always owe, in a great part, their progress to a large population and the competition of foreigners."

"The East and North Rivers make New York the leader of commerce in the most populated part of the United States; and her port which is not exposed to the inconveniences of the frost like the cities of the central states, commands foreign commerce better than any other state. The English packet-boats arrive at New York. It was also the port of the French packets before they were intercepted. All these advantages will give to this city, little by little, the whole extent of the island on which she is situated, in spite of one of the greatest defects possible for a large population, that is, the want of good drinking water. To-day one is obliged to supply one's self from a source which is a mile from the town. New York contains about 25,000 inhabitants."—Translated from État-Unis de l'Amérique à la fin du XVIIIe Siècle, by J. E. Bonnet (Paris, 1822), II: 367-69.

Sometime during this year, a memorial signed by most of the leading citizens of New York was addressed to the legislature protesting against the "Evils which threaten our City and State." The "Theatre, lately opened in this City," was condemned as an evil that "has an unfriendly aspect on the Virtue of our Citizens;—especially on that Frugality and Economy which are so essential to the Prosperity and Honor of our Country if not to the existence of our Rivers;" hard earned savings which "... was... considered by many worthy Persons of all religious Denominations, as highly injurious to the interests of true Piety wherever it is countenanced." The large number of taverns is also condemned.—Emmett Coll., item 1116. See J. 16 and 21. The legislature seems to have taken no action unfavourable to the theatre, for performances continued to be given.

In this year, in Massachusetts, the machinations of demagogues and malcontents, who argued that all property which joint resistance had protected in the Revolution was equally the subject of division, found a leader in Daniel Shays, who headed a rebellion in the Connecticut Valley.—Winson, VII: 229-30. See F. 24, 1787. Before the revolution, and even sometime afterwards, William street was the great mart for dry goods sales, and chiefly from Main lane up to Pearl, and from Pearl up to Water. "A "Mr. Griffiths" advertises to have a public ball every fortnight "in his Dancing-School, the City Assembly Room, in the Broadway."—N. Y. Packet, J. 3, 1786.

The Chamber of Commerce receives a memorial asking its aid for a project to open "an intercourse with the interior parts of the United States, by an artificial inland navigation, along the Mohawk River and Wood Creek to the Lake of the Great Lakes." It answers that its members entertain the "highest ideas of the Utility of the scheme, wishing it may meet with every possible success, but in their incorporated capacity, owing to the lowness of their funds, "tis out of their power to lend him [the memorialist, probably Christopher Colles. See N. 23, 1785] any aid." This appears to be the first suggestion for the Erie Canal.—Bishop, A Chron. of 150 Years. The Chamber of Commerce of the State of N. Y., 1768-1812, 42.
1786. Those persons who have Goats, that keep about the fort garden, are desired to take notice, that unless they are taken care of, and prevented from destroying the fruit trees, disagreeable consequences will attend them.—Daily Adv., Ja 3, 1786.

4. G. Furman offers "Genteel Boarding and Lodging" at the "Sign of the American" No. 111, at the head of Queen St.—N. T. Packet, Ja 5, 1786.

The vestry of Trinity Church passes a resolution to grant "a good lot of ground to each of the Presbyterian Congregations in this City for the use of their respective senior pastors for the time being." This is for erecting their dwelling-houses.—Trin. Min. (Ms). On Oct. 2, Trinity granted to "the Corporation of the Presbyterian Church in the City of New York," a lot and a half on the old "Church Farm," situated on the north side of Robinson St., near Broadway, for the use of the ministers.—From a copy of the deed (6pp. folio) filled with the Richard Varick papers (in bundle in box U-V) in N.Y. H. S. This land, now nos. 5 & Park Place, was never put to this use, but the income from the property was applied toward the payment of Dr. Rodgers' salary.—Knapp, Hist. of the Brick Church, 80.

"Resolved that the Treasurer be directed to pay the Sum of $20 into the hands of Messrs John and Thomas Stagg to be by them laid out in improving that part of the Church Estate near the Bear Market."—Trin. Min. (Ms).

16. Both houses of the legislature convene at the "Exchanges," and an address in joint session by Gov. Clinton, who has summoned them by proclamation.—N. T. Packet, Ja 19, 1786.

A card appearing in a newspaper reads: "The Citizens are cautioned against signing a petition for the suppression of Public Virtue and Morality [see 1786], as a counter one will be offered them, in which they may be assured the fallacy of every argument in favour of the Theatre will be refuted, and the immortal, unlicensed play-actors are considered as rogues and vagabonds."—N. T. Packet, Ja 23, 1786.

John Henry publishes the following announcement: "A Report having prevailed, that the Subscriber is author of several pieces which have lately appeared in favor of the Theatre, he begs leave thus publicly to disavow not only being so, but also every knowledge of the person or persons employed about the Theatre, of their daily bread, will at length remove the veil of prejucide, and the Drama appear amply capable of its proper, its original designation."—N. T. Packet, Ja 26, 1786.

Geo. Lindsay, desiring to erect a house in Crown (Liberty) St., and being "at a loss to know which way he is to place the Front of his House," because the common council has not determined "the Plan of the Streets in that Quarter," petitions that the board "speedily determine the Plan of the Streets on the North River."—From the original petition in metal file No. 8, city clerk's record-room. The petition came before the board on Jan. 30, and was referred to the committee on Greenwich St.—M. C. G. (1784-1811), I: 194-95.

Mr. Lamont, the Proprietor of the Intelligence-Office," advertises that his office, at "No. 21 Water-street, opposite the Coffee-house," will be also used as a "Land-Office, for the Sale of Estates." He believes "that an office for the general reception and sale of estates, would greatly add to the convenience of those who may want to dispose of their property, either by barter or sale."—Daily Adv., Ja 28, 1786.

A letter from Chancellor Robert R. Livingston "containing proposals to contract with this Board for conveying fresh Water into this City" is read in common council and referred to a committee.—M. C. G. (1784-1811), I: 194. At the same meeting, a claim of Josiah Hornblower against the corporation for $12, "for coming at the request of the [common] council to survey & give his Opinion on the Reservoir & Engine of the Water Works erecting at the expense of the Callers previous to New-Gate," is referred to the auditors of accounts.—Ibid., I: 175. A report on Livingston's proposal was submitted on Feb. 6, 1786 (p. v.). Although Hornblower had been paid £12 on May 24, 1775, for examining and reporting on the works, his claim was recognized by the common council and he received another £12 on June 12, 1778 (p. v.).

John McComb's bill of £60 for materials and work done at the "Execution House," is filed at the 1784-1785 session, Feb. 3. From the original bill in file no. 12, city clerk's record-room.

A deed or indenture conveys to Nicholas Fish that portion of the James de Lancey estate on which the mansion stands, comprising the block bounded by the Bowery Lane, Rivington, Christie, and Delancey Sts. It was acknowledged Oct. 2, 1794, by the commissioners of forfeiture, Isaac Stoughton and Philip van Cortlandt, and, signed by Mayor Varick, was recorded April 9, 1796. It is now in the author's collection.—See descrip. of Pl. 36-4, I: 277; also Ap 27, 1791.

Reports upon the proposals of Samuel Ogden (see Mr. 24, 1785) and Chancellor Livingston (see Ja 30, 1786) to supply the city with water are read in common council, but consideration is deferred.—M. C. G. (1784-1811), I: 195.

Jacob de la Montagne, whose address is No. 8 Great George St., cor. of Robinson St., advertises that the "well known and beautifully situated House and Gardens, No. 317, Great George-street, formerly kept by the Widow de la Montagne, but at present in the occupation of Mr Henry Kennedy" (see Ja 6, 1785), is for rent.—N. T. Packet, F 6, 1786. See history of this tavern under Ap 5, 1754.

The New-York Directory "is Just Published," and is to be sold by Shepard Klockol, At his Book-Store, opposite the Coffee-house, and by "Mr. David Franklin (The Compiler)," No. 66, Broadway. This newspaper advertisement also contains the same note of thanks to the public for encouragement received as appears in the directory itself. In it Franklin refers to this directory as "the first of the kind ever attempted in this City," and states that "he shall be happy, to the honour of anniversaries, to present this Directory to the public."—N. T. Packet, F 14, 1786. See also Vol. I, p. 737 where, however, the erroneous statement is made that the N. Y. Historical Soc. owns the only known copy of the 1786 edition of the directory. It should read the 1787 edition. No copy of the 1788 directory is known to exist.

Besides the alphabetical list of the inhabitants, the directory contains a table of monthly accounts; monthly bills of the city, and in N. Y. currency; a list of the members of congress; the names and addresses of government department heads; the commissioners of claims against the U. S.; the members of the state senate and assembly; the chancery officers, judges, justices of the peace; officers of the city and county of N. Y.; commissioners of forfeiture; lawyers, and notaries; officers of the Grand Lodge of Masons of the state; officers and directors of the Bank of N. Y., and rules of the bank; the bank discounts on gold coin; the names of Columbia College professors, days of examination, etc.; officers of the Soc. for promoting the manumission of slaves; members of the Gold and Silversmiths' Soc.; of the Soc. of the Cincinnati of N. Y. State; officers and members of the St. Andrew's Soc.; of the Gen. Soc. of Mechanics and Tradesmen; of the Soc. of Peruke-makers, etc.; the arrivals and departures of mails at the N. Y. post-office; names omitted from the directory; Mr. Franklin's address to the public, and his page advertisement as conveyancer and accountant.

In the list of gold- and silversmiths, the name of Myer Myers appears as "Chairman." See also the reference to him under 1746 where, however, the date 1776 is an error for 1786, as the date when he was president of this society.

Clerical and typographical errors have been published of the original directory, which is now excessively scarce.

Chancellor Livingston and his associate, John Lawrence, appear before the common council to discuss their plan for supplying the city with water (see F 6). The board resolves to advertise for proposals to be delivered at the clerk's office on or before April 12.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 199, 199-200.

An advertisement, signed by Robert Benson, city clerk, which appeared in the papers is dated Feb. 15, and read as follows:

"Whereas the Corporation of the city, have long had it in contemplation, to supply the inhabitants with water, by means of pipes or aqueducts and an attempt was made for that purpose, which was rendered unsuccessful: And whereas proposals have been lately offered for carrying on the said design by private companies, and the funds of the corporation not enabling them to erect the necessary works on the public account, and being impressed by a desire to forward such supply of Water, which they consider not only as a great convenience to the citizens, but as a security to the public and their property, the privilege of supplying the city with water will be granted to such person or companies as will engage in the undertaking on the most reasonable terms; and all persons have now an opportunity of leaving their proposals, sealed, at the office of the clerk of this city, in Maiden-lane on or before the 15th day of April next, to be then taken into consideration."—N. T. Jour., F 23, 1786. The sealed proposals were presented to the board on April 19 (p.v.) by the clerk.

A committee of the common council is appointed to report "what Alterations are necessary to the Law for regulating Streets in the burnt parts of the City."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 199. They reported on March 22 the draft of a memorial to the legislature and of a bill for the purpose, and these were approved by the board for presentation.

The committee which was appointed to report the best means for disposing of the Common Lands in the Out Ward, report the following opinion: "1st. That the center Road shall be 100 feet wide instead of 60 feet as the same is laid down. 2d. That a part of the Lots laid out on the new Map be sold in fee simple if a reasonable price can be obtained. 3d. That an Advertisement of such intended Sand be published. 4th. That the Claim of Individuals on the Common Lands of the Corporation be amicably adjusted. ..." The common council agrees.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 199.

The list of bremen appointed on this day by the common council shows the names of 279 men. They consist of five engineers, two hook-and-ladder companies, and men engaged attached to fifteen engines.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 204.

A commissioner of excise is appointed by the common council.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 204.

"Whereas many persons in this city, who have been greatly hurt in their circumstances, and families reduced to distress, by getting into the hands of persons, who have made a practice for some time past, of squeezing money at extra-vagant rates, have been already redressed; and whereas there is reason to believe, that many other persons are still labouring under similar circumstances, notice is hereby given, that any person or persons who may be so situated, may be redressed by applying at No. 35 King-street."—Daily Adv., F 23, 1786.

Morgan Lewis (see Aug. 2, 1789) advertises for sale "Mount Pilot, the place on which the subscriber now lives, situated near Corliss's Hook, at the distance of one mile from the city-hall, of the city of New-York; an handsome and convenient dwelling house, an out kitchen, containing several rooms; adjacent is a large stable, a new carriage house and a complete ice-house, which compose the principal buildings. There are about eleven acres of land, a collection of between three and four hundred bearing fruit trees, and an handsome garden well fenced in. The place being well known requires no further description."—Daily Adv., F 24, 1786. The place was not sold until Feb. 3, 1793 (p.v.).

In a long letter to the press, "Roccius" proposes the abolition of taverns, which now number more than 500 in the city and suburbs.—Daily Adv., F 25, 1786.

March 19. Governor Clinton moves his removal to the City Tavern, late Cape's, in Broadway.—N. T. Packet, Mr 16, 1786. Corre was succeeded in May, 1788, by Edward Bardin.—ibid., Mr 31, 1788; Daily Adv., Ap 22, 1788; N. T. Packet, Je 10, 1788.

Gov. Clinton submits to the legislature a petition of Samuel Francis (Francesca), accompanying his message, and recommends "in a peculiar case" to their attention, on being "convinced of the truth of many of the facts therein stated."—Jour. of the Senate (1786), 44. The text of this petition is not recorded; but on May 5, an act was passed (Laws of 1786, chap. 66) appropriating $500 "to Samuel Francis for the support of New York prisoners and for sundry services during the late war."—Messages from the Governors, II: 259. See also Ap 4, 1786.

Peter Maverick, "ever willing to serve the public, respectfully informs them, that he carries on the engraving, seal stamping and copper plate printing, at No. 3, Crown-street, where ladies may have their tea-table plate engraven, in the most elegant manner and in the newest fashion, resembling the flat champagne, as neat as in Europe."—N. T. Packet, Mr 16, 1786. Stauffer says this advertisement refers to Peter Rushton Maverick, a native New Yorker, and thinks the notice "plainly indicates that, like other early American engravers, the engraving of silver plate and book plates formed part of his business." Most of Maverick's engravings are "poor in design," although his book plates are fairly good.—Stauffer, Am. Engravers on Copper and Steel, I: 177. A list of his engravings may be found in ibid., II: 371-72. In 1788, Peter R. Maverick represented the engravers of New York City in the Federal Procurement.—Fidding, Am. Engravers on Copper and Steel, 28. He lived in the city continuously until his death in 1811.—Dunlap, Hist. of Art in Design, I: 187.

The house formerly occupied by Mrs. Wright for the exhibition of her famous wax-works (see Je 3 and Ag 5, 1771), at 100 Queen St., is still used for similar exhibitions.—Daily Adv., Mr 17, 1786. Among the figures shown, "as large as life," is a "portrait" of Gen. Washington.—ibid., My 16, 1788. Possibly this was the battleship by Mrs. Wright, reproduced, for the first time, in the N. Y. Times, F 24, 1825. See Ad 16, 1790.

A bill is pending in the New Jersey legislature to make "Powles-hook" a free port, that it may charge import duties even on goods brought from New York.—N. T. Packet, Mr 23, 1786.

The alderman and assistant of the South Ward are required to report to the common council what repairs are necessary to the Fire Engine House near the Fort.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 208.

A petition to the common council, bearing this date, the inhabitants of the East Ward ask for an improvement in the street at the coffee house. They state "That the Coffee House at present kept by Mr. Cornelius Bradford is the usual place of resort for your Memorialists and the Merchants of this City in general to meet at daily and transact Business." The street, for want of proper regulation, has become filthy, and they ask relief "by sending the Water over the Street instead of leading it into the Common shore and removing the Platform in a line with the East front of the said Coffee House and run on towards the water."—From original petition (in metal file No. 10, city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read March 29th 1786 & referred:" and see M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 209. The petition carries 156 signatures including the names of Alexander Hamilton and several other distinguished citizens of the time. The desired action was taken by the common council on May 18, 1786.

A payment of $601:8 is made "for Ironmongery to repair & alter the Court Room."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 210.

The legislature passes "An Act to regulate the Militia." The city of New York is to raise one regiment of artillery.—Laws of N. Y. (1786), chap. 25. The first brigade, first division, was formed in New York as a "Brigade of Artillery," composed of the first and second Regiments and a battalion.—From "Military History of the Eighth Regiment," by Capt. J. O. Johnston, in Grand Opening of the New Armory (1890), 10. For the names of the successive commanders for the next decades, see ibid., 10.

... New York bids fair to out vie the sister States in becoming the seat of Arts. Today we are informed of the arrival of Mr. [Joseph] Wright [jr.], from Philadelphia, a gentleman of abilities in painting, and Son to the celebrated modeller and patriotess Mrs. Wright of London, from this place [see Je 3 and Ag 5, 1771]—as he means to follow his profession as a Limmer here, we are tempted to believe, every encouragement will be given to his Genius."—Daily Adv., Ap 7, 1786. Regarding Mrs. Wright, see Ap 5, 177; N. T. Gazetteer, My 19, 1786; Daily Adv., N 2, 1786. Cf. 1787.

Packet, Ap 10, 1786.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1786. The first commencement of Columbia College is held in St.
Apr. Paul's Chapel, and is attended by the national congress and the state legislature as well as by the educational authorities. De Witt Clinton is among the eight graduates who receive the B. A. degree.
18. The legislature passes "An Act for emitting the Sum of Two Hundred Thousand Pounds in Bills of Credit, for the Purposes therein mentioned." This is occasioned "by the late calamitous war," the inhabitants of the state labouring under great difficulties "for want of a sufficient circulating medium." These bills of credit are to be delivered by the state treasurer to the loan officers of the several counties in specified sums. New York County is to receive £12,000. The loan officers are to loan the bills on the security of mortgages on real estate, at 5%, for 14 years, after the third Tuesday in June, 1786, in sums not exceeding £100, nor less than £20 to any one person.—Laws of N. Y. (1786), chap. 40. On Oct. 4, 1791, loan officers' books of mortgages, minutes, accounts, etc., were examined and approved by the common council of N. Y. City.
—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I, 674.
19. The clerk of the common council reports that he has received "three sealed Packets said to contain Proposals for erecting Works to supply this City with Water" (see F 15). The aldermen and assistants state that they have conferred with the inhabitants in the several wards, and "that it is expedient to be the Secret of a Majority of the Persons they had confered with that the Corporation ought not to grant the Privilege of supplying the City with Water to Individuals; but that the same ought if possible to be undertaken by the Corporation." The board therefore resolves "that the said Proposals remain unopened with the Clerk until . . . further order . . . or that they be returned, at the option of the Persons who presented the same." Meanwhile, the aldermen and assistants are requested "to set on foot in their respective Wards, Representations to this Board in Writing and subscribed by the Citizens in order more fully to ascertain their Sense.
Whether the Corporation ought to grant to Individuals the Privilege of supplying the City with Water Or whether the same ought to be undertaken by the Corporation and that the Monies necessary for the same be raised by a Tax."—Idem, (1784-1813), I, 211-14. We find no other reference to these proposals, so the project appears to have dropped at this time.
It was revived by the citizens in 1788 (p. 9, Ja 29).

Steps are taken to transform the Bowling Green into a small park. For its earlier history, see L. M. R. K., III, 968; Man.
Com. Cons. (1853), 633-38; Ibid. (1862), 525-27. In earlier times the lane was called "Bown Main" (Bowling Green) "(Pls. 26, 27, 27A, Vol. 1); see also My 4, 1665; Ja 29, 1677; S 8, 1684.

On April 1, 1786, Chancellor Livingston wrote to "The Worshipful James Duane, Esq., Mayor" as follows: "Mr. Stevens who had the charge of the bowling green having left town is disposed of demanding a salary, but as I would wish to take his place without the direction of your worshipful board, I beg the favor of you to signify to them that it would give me pleasure to keep it in repair as it is very ornamental to this part of the town & might be rendered more so by planting trees around on the outside & shrubs within, if the corporation will do the first I will take the last upon myself. The fence is now broke so that the dogs are daily destroying it, but as the iron lies about the place it might be repaired without much expense one of the lamps is also wanting. I would submit whether it would not be expedient to take down the pedestal which is far from being ornamental & contracts the appearance of the green."—From the original letter in city clerk's record-room. It is denounced: "read & filed 19 April, 1786, & granted." The action taken by the common council, as recorded in the minutes on April 19, was to grant Livingston "the Direction and Use of the Bowling Green" for two years, to pay the expense of sowing grass seed and having it "well laid down as a Green."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I, 212-13.

The board had under consideration at the same time a petition from Daniel Ludlow who stated "That the Green, or Ellipses at the South End of that street, is so much decayed during the late war, that instead of being Ornamental & picturesque, it is so much untimely aid will soon become a Nuisance to the Neighbourhood." He was willing "at his own expense to Manure the Ground & sow the same with proper Grass Seed and have it well laid down as a Green," and asked the board's permission to take it under his management, and, as compensation, have the use of it for two years.
—From original petition (in metal file No. 5, city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read & ill'd by April 1786." It was granted to Chancellor Livingston "on the Terms offered by Mr. Ludlow."—

The keeper of the bridewell having been forbidden "to draw his Seine for the taking Fish at Paulus Hook on the Jersey Shore," and the inhabitants of the bridewell and almshouse being "likely to be deprived of the Advantage of being fed with Fish during the Season at a very cheap Rate," a committee of the common council is appointed "to confer with Mr Smith the Tenant in possession at Paulus Hook on the Subject."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I, 212.

The common council resolves that the "Magistrates" (that is, the aldermen) shall "in Rotation have the Charge of the City Watch."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I, 213.

Firemen are appointed by the common council for an additional engine, No. 16, and it is ordered "that the Engineer direct a House to be built at the New Dutch Church for the reception of the 4th Engine."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I, 214.

The legislature passes "An Act for the more effectual Prevention of Fires in the City of New-York." It is designed to remove the dangers arising from storing pitch, tar, etc. in houses, and from discharging guns, fire-works, etc.—Laws of N. Y. (1786), chap. 43 (Greenleaf, I, 271).

John Ryckman, a brickmaker, who "lives at Inclingoborough adjoining to the commonable Lands," states in a petition to the common council that he "hath heretofore been indulged with liberty of digging Clay and making Bricks on such Lands . . .
upon the principal of your petitioner's rendering them cheaper and better in quality, than such as were imported, to this City." He represents that "if he could now be indulged with the taking Clay from such commonable Lands, contiguous to his place of residence, he would erect a Brick-yard in his own Lott, fill up every spot he may be indulged to dig Clay from, and carry on his business, as heretofore done, for the mutual advantage of himself and the City at large."—From original petition in city clerk's record-room. The same petition appears in the minutes of June 9, 1786.—M. C. G.
(1784-1813), I, 46.

The legislature passes "An Act to promote Literature." Authors are given the sole right for 14 years of printing and publishing their books and pamphlets, with an additional 14 years if still living.—
Laws of N. Y. (1786), chap. 34.

The Indians, in May, petition to the common council, state that these streets, "for want of proper regulation have become utterly impasseable for Carts or Carriages," and that they are ready to remedy this situation as soon as the Board gives directions.—From the original petition in metal file No. 7, city clerk's record-room.

Stone St. and Petticoat Lane, "heretofore the abode of dirt and diseases," are to be widened and thrown into one. The destruction of part of the city has thus opened the door to improvement. It is "determined to Leave Broadway as it is with one side some yards higher than the other, and a pavement less inviting than a tavern sign, promising no entertainment to man or horse."—Daily Adv., My 2, 1786.

The piston is to move about three feet, and each vibration of the piston gives the axis about 40 evolutions. Each revolution of the axis moves 12 oars or paddles which, working both at the same time, are represented by the stroke of the paddle of a canoe.) As 6 of the paddles are raised from the water, 6 more are entered, and the two sets of paddles make their strokes of about 11 feet in each evolution. The cranks of the axis act upon the paddles of 3 of their length from the lower end, on which part of the oar the whole force of the axis is applied. Our engine is placed in the boat about 3 feet from the stern and on the action turn the wheel the same way."

The following description, published in 1835, presents various features of Manhattan, from Corlear's Hook to the Battery, as they existed during and after the Revolution: *.. Corlear's Hook, at low-water mark, had a hard pebbly shore, at high-water mark, a sandy Beach. From the Hook westwardly, at a distance of about 250 yards, a reef of rocks extended from the shore into the river, named by the Dutch 'Het Quade Puntie,' or the bad point. Between this point and Rutger's point of rocks, and nearly opposite to the Buddle Rock, Evert Byvanck had built a stone dock against the river, opposite to his dwelling house. Between Rutger's Point and Cheeseman's shipyard and dock, there was a cove, connected with a low piece of marshy ground, which lay in front of the house of the late Col. Rutgers. From Cheeseman's Dock to Beekman's Dock, (on the west side of the present Market-slip,) the shore was sandy. Between these docks the British established their ship and navy-yard in 1777, where the same remained until 1785. Between Beekman's Dock and the Dock of Blaze Moore, on the west side of the present Catherine Market, the shore also lay unimproved. *From Catherine-street eastwardly towards Harlem, there were few enclosures of land during the war: nearly all the land on the Island lay in common. The house of Hendrick Rutgers (the father of the Colonel) was occupied as a Hospital during the war, and hundreds of their dead were buried on his farm. Between Pearl-street and Cherry-street, the Fresh Water Pond was situated, which covered between two and three acres. This place was filled up after the war.

"We resume the river boundary by remarking, that the south-eary side of Cherry-street, from the Dock of Beekman before mentioned to James slip, was at low-water mark; and that from Moore's Dock, on the west side of Catherine Market, to James-slip, there were no improvements on the south side of Cherry-street worthy of notice. From the west side of James-slip to Peck-slip, along Water-street, on the north side of the street, there were many buildings. Hamilton's distillery yard joined the street. Peck-slip extended to the south side of Water-street. Peck-slip Market stood between Pearl and Water streets. Between Peck-slip and Beekman-slip, the northern side of Water-street was built up; and between the latter slips Crance-wharf was situated, having a large crane over the river. Beekman-slip extended to the south side of Water-street. From Beekman-slip to Burling-slip, the north side of Water-street was also built up, and there were a few stores on the south side. Burling-slip also extended to the south side of Water-street. From Burling-slip to Fly Market-slip, the north side of Front-street was built up. Between Burling-slip and Fletcher-street the British kept their provision yard and stores during the war. Fly Market-slip also extended to the south side of Water-street, and a small Fish Market was erected over the north part of the slip against Water-street, and the Meat or Butchers' Market extended from Water to Pearl-street. The Fly Market ferry stairs joined Front-street on the east side of the slip. The market boats occupied the slip between the stairs and the fish market. Theodore Defreest occupied the corner of Front-street, near the slip. We have seen a British ship of the line winter in Fly Market-slip, against Leffert's wharf. This place was frequently occupied by ships of war in winter."

From Fly Market-slip to Murray's wharf at the Coffee-House-street, Front-street was built up on the northern side. Coffee-House slip extended to the south side of Front-street, having a bridge over a sewer to Water-street. This bridge lay near the old Coffee-House and Rivington's Printing-Office. The place was frequented every day by merchants, officers and news-mongers. .."

Justice shall not be sold, denied, or delayed. Fines shall be reasonable. Excessive bail, and cruel and unusual punishments, ought not to be imposed. Freedom of speech in the legislature shall not be questioned.—Laws of N. Y. (1787), chap. 1.

20. The Society for the Relief of Distressed Debtors is formed. Its object is "To administer to the comfort of prisoners, by providing food, fuel, clothing, and other necessities of life; and to provide the means of securing their release as soon as possible, and of meritorious conduct, by discharging their debts." See A Sketch of the Origin and Progress of the Humane Society of the City of New-York. Together with the Act of Incorporation and By-Laws (pub. by order of the society, 1814), preserved with MSS. relating to the society in N. Y. P. L. In accordance with a memorial from this society (see D 12, 1788), the legislature passed an act in 1788 by which torts imposed for debts less than £10,000, were to be liberated after 30 days. In 1791, the society secured the passage of a law authorizing the introduction of liquor into jail. In 1801, the society appointed a counselor to represent prisoners. About 1802, on the society's application, the city gave it $600 and a lot on Tryon St., where it erected a soup-house, the scope of the society's work having been expanded, and also to furnish soup at a reduced price to the poor of the city. In 1803, the name of the society was changed to the "Humane Society of the City of New-York." In 1814, it was incorporated. One of its principal objects was to discourage street begging.—Am. Med. and Phil. Register (April, 1814), IV: 637-38.

In consequence of this order, he states, he has "given permission to a number of persons who have produced Recommendations from the different Magistrates to Occupy Rooms Reserving in Some a Rent of 40/ and others 60/, and with the Condition to put them in repair." He finds, however, that few tenants have complied with the conditions, and he proposes that the rooms be rented at auction to some person with the condition of putting them in good repair.—From original "Report," in the city clerk's record-room, endorsed "read Feb. 14, 1788."

35. A majority of the proprietors of lots in Wall St. petition the common council that the street may be regulated and paved at their expense, similar to Water St. west of the Coffee-House, and "that Pitt's Statue, which greatly obstructs the Street may be removed." The aldermen and assistants of the East, Dock, and North Wards are made a committee to regulate the street, and to report their opinion regarding the removal of the statue, and also the measures proper to take regarding "a Statue of Genl Montgomery said to be in this City."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 285. This reference is presumably to the Montgomery monument, see N 26, 1784 and Ap 3, 1784.

It is suggested to the common council that a bill be brought into the assembly for the sale of the lands at the fort and Battery. A committee is appointed to inquire into the rights of the city regarding these lands.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 285. 36. The common council, in a petition to the legislature (see Mr 21), recites: "That your Petitioners are informed that a bill for..." the Purpose of selling the Fort & Battery in this City is now before the honourable the House of Assembly, to be passed into a Law. That your Petitioners beg leave to suggest to the Legislature, that the Charter of Governor Dongan to the then Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New York gives and grants to them and their Successors all the Waste, Vacant, unappropriated and un-appropriated Lands lying and being within the City of New York, extending and reaching in, by and thro’ all Parts of the said City.

That also in the said Charter of Governor Dongan, there is a Reservation among other things of the Fort, called therein ‘Fort James’ and of all the Liberties, Boundaries, Extents and Privileges thereof; and in the Charter of George the Second, to the said Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty, there is also a Reservation of the Fort, called therein ‘Fort George’ and of ‘the Ground, full Boundaries and Extent thereof, or thereto belonging.’—Yet your Petitioners consider, that they are included (by virtue of the said Charter of Governor Dongan) to a considerable Part of the Ground on which the said Battery is built and circumjacent the Fort, and which is not comprehended within the said Reservations.

‘That your Petitioners, anxious for the Ornament of this City, the Convenience, the Health and the Quiet of the Inhabitants, persuade themselves that the Legislature will not pass the aforesaid Bill, or suffer it to be brought in, or that in case of any part of the said Fort or Battery, that the same will not be built upon or improved in a manner suitable to a Situation so elegant and proper for publick Purposes, but become a great Nuisance to the Inhabitants of this City.’ They close the petition by asking to be heard in case the Legislature is inclined ‘to carry the Bill into effect.’—From the original in the city clerk’s record-room. It is endorsed ‘Read & approved March 17, 1787.’ Another petition to the same effect is filed with it, endorsed ‘read & approved the 16th of April 1787.’ See Ap 16, regarding the action taken by the legislature.

A large number of cartmen, in a petition of this date to the common council, state that an ordinance was passed ‘some time since’ which, ‘on the 1st of November, 1787’, required ‘that the wheels of the Carts used in said City should not be bound with Iron, as the pavements of the Streets received injury therefrom;’ and that they have since then provided ‘wheels of a certain breadth without being shod.’ They find ‘a great expense accruing by reason of their being obliged to have new ones very often;’ and that the streets are just as much injured by them. They ask that a law be passed ‘to allow the cartmen to have the Wheels of their carts bound with Iron; that the width be three and a half Inches, and the nails sunk even to the tire.’—From the original petition in metal file No. 7, city clerk’s record-room. The petition is referred to a committee.—M. C. C. (1784-1813), 1: 288. It was not granted.—Ibid., I: 295.

The next day before the common council a concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly, dated Nov. 26, 1784 (p.v.), providing ‘That the Monument by the United States in Congress Assembled ordered to be erected to the Memory of Major General Montgomery he erected in the City of New York at such particular Place as the Mayor Aldermen and Commonalty of the said City shall appoint.’ The board selects ‘the front of St. Paul’s Church... to be the most proper place’ and a committee is appointed to consult the wardens and vestrymen, and, with their approval, to direct that the monument be erected there.—M. C. C. (1784-1813), 1: 289-90. There is a rare, contemporary engraving of the monument in the author’s collection. See, further, My 16 and 23, Je 18, and N 22. For text of the inscription, see JI 8, 1818.

The tavern of John Simmons, at Nassau and Wall Sts., was for several years the regular meeting-place of the standing committee of the Society for Promoting the Manumission of Slaves.—N. Y. Packet, Ap 10, O 7, 1787; F 18, Ag 12, 1790.

The legislature passes an Act to institute an University within this State, and for other purposes therein mentioned. This consolidates into one law the acts of May 1 and Nov. 26, 1784 (p.v.), and certain amendments and alterations which have been requested. Twenty-two citizens are named as ‘Regents of the University of the State of New-York,’ and they are authorized to inspect, and report upon, all the colleges, academies, and schools in the state, to appoint presidents of colleges and academies wherever vacancies exist for more than one year, to confer degrees above Master of Arts, and to incorporate academies. The charter granted to King’s College on Oct. 31, 1754 (q.v.), is confirmed in all essential respects except that the name of the institution is changed to Columbia College, and it is made non-secretarial. Its government is transferred from the Regents to 24 trustees.—Laws of N. T., 10th sess., chap. 82. See also Pine, King’s College (1927).

The legislature passes an Act for regulating the Buildings, Streets, Wharfs and Slips, in the City of New York. ‘The aim of this act is to establish uniformity,’ for the accommodation of habitations, shipping and transportation.” It provides, among other things, that the council should be made responsible for the laying down of buildings that may narrow or encroach upon any street; and may make regulations for building sewers, etc., and for paving, altering, mending, and cleaning the streets.—Laws of N. T. (1787), chap. 88.

The assembly resolves: ‘That the Attorney-General be directed to inquire into the nature of the claims of the Corporation of the city of New-York, to Fort George, and the lands adjoining thereto [see Mr 21, 28], and that he make a report of the facts to the Legislature at the next meeting; and that the Commissioners of the Land-Office be also directed, to cause a survey of the said premises to be made, laying out the lands which upon such enquiry shall appear to be the property of this State, into such lots and in such manner as the said Attorney-General will direct, and the State in the sale thereof; and that they lay such survey before the Legislature at its said next meeting, and report their opinion of the most proper and beneficial disposition of the said premises.’—Assembly Jour., 13th session, 165. The senate concurred in this resolution on April 18.—Jour. of the Senate. The attorney-general’s report was read in the assembly on March 12, 1788 (q.v.). A newspaper advertisement reads: ‘Theatre. This Evening. (Never before Performed) (Being the 16th of April) Will be Performed, A Comedy of 5 Acts, written by a Citizen of the United States, Called The Contrast, To which will be added the English Burletta, called Midas.—Daily Adv., Ap 16, 1787. “The Contrast” was written by Royal Tyler, a native of Massachusetts who came over after the Chief Justice was executed.—Dunlap, Hist. of the Am. Theatre (1853), I: 155, 157-40; Ireland, Recs. of the N. Y. Stage, I: 76. Seillamer says of it: “Royall Tyler’s comedy, the Contrast, although it was not the first American play actually produced, as has generally been claimed for it, was the first to meet with a favorable reception. After its initial performance at the John Street Theatre, New York, in 1787, it was presented five times in rapid succession. This was unusual at that time, only the most popular pieces warranting as many repetitions in a season... According to the prologue... which was not from Major Tyler’s pen, but was ascribed to a young gentleman of New York, the dramatist’s theme was the fashions or follies of the gay circles of that city. This shows the usefulness of prologues. For in the play itself there is no proof of the distinctively New York character of the comedy.” For a detailed account of the play and its author, see Seillamer’s Hist. of the Am. Theatre, II: 215, 225-79, and for an eye-witness’s criticism of the first performance, see Daily Adv., Ap 18, 1787. See also N. T., Times Book Rec., JI 12, 1931.

M. Wattles, the proprietor of a line of stages, announces that “An Elegant Coach, And four excellent Horses” will run daily “to Mr. Hall’s, No. 49, Cortlandt-street,” to Kingsbridge.—N. T. Jour., Ap 26, 1787.

The following notice appears in one of the daily papers: “The members of St. Tammery’s Society in the City of New York are requested to meet at their wigwam, held at Mr. Talman’s Hall, No. 49 Cortlandt Street, on Tuesday, the first day of May next.
Samuel Louden advertises the publication of "Des Barris' drafts" of certain "mercator charts," which are for sale at his office. Among these are charts of the "Harbour of New-York," and of "New-York and Long-Island Sound." These, he states, are "the most exact and elegant charts which was ever published in any country."—N. Y. & L., May 5, 1787. See also Pls. 44 and 45a, Vol. I, and their descriptions, I, 346-53.

G. C. (1784-1811), I: 291.

The common council orders "that Aldr. Bayard direct the Road Master to put rails along the Road on the side Hill [McGowan's Pass] above Harlem to prevent accidents to Horses & Carriages And also that Mr. Aldr. direct the sides of the Arch in the middle Road [Broadway] to be raised on a level with the said Road."—M. G. C. (1784-1811), I: 295. This is the first reference in the city records to the stone arch or bridge across Broadway at the present Canal St.—See L. M. R. K., III: 926. As suggested by Valentine, it was probably built during the Revolution as a military work.—Cham. Cor. Coun. (1863), 604. The fact that it was altered in 1787 probably indicates that it had been built some time before.

For a discussion of the subject, see descrip. of Pl. 3-6; III: 558-59.

See also Ap 16, 1773; N 23, 1775. For execution of the order, showing conclusively that this is the bridge referred to, see My 24, Jr 6, 1787; Je 11, 1793.

Montgomery to be erected under the Portico of St. Paul's Chapel in front of the great Wall."—Trin. Min. (MS). This entry, and that of Ap 3, q. v., seem to prove that the monument was not designed for this location, to which, however, it is admirably suited. See, further, Je 18.

The vestry also resolves "That the Committee of Repairs examine the ruins of the Rectors house and Charity School house and that they give such orders respecting them as they may deem necessary."—Ibid.

A bulletin is printed by McLean exhibiting a list of the several lots belonging to Trinity corporation which, by a resolution of the vestry on May 22, are to be sold at auction on June 28, "at the Coffee-House." One of these bulletins is preserved, in the collection of broadsides, in the N. Y. P. L. See also Ind. Jour., My 30, 1787.

John Alsop, Thomas Ellisson, Alexander Macomb, William informed that the board designs " to widen Greenwich of first Street to 60 feet," while their grants provide that it is to be 40 ft. broad. They ask that, as the board widens the street, their grants may be extended "as much farther into the River."—From the original petition in metal file No. 7, city clerk's record-room.

The record in the minutes on this date shows that the petitioners are "proprietors of Lots in the Broad Way & bounded on the River," and that they have been authorized to sell the water lots they have been granted for the enclosure of Augustus Van Cortlandt to which the

The scene of the battle of Berrysport, where the 1st of the American Revolution was fought, is described as follows: "A committee of 12 men, under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Cutler, were appointed to select a site for the building of the meeting house, and to report it to the legislature. The site selected was a spacious 40 acres of land, on the west bank of the Mohawk River. The committee reported the site to the legislature, who authorized the erection of a meeting house on the site selected. The building was completed and dedicated on July 4, 1783."
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

on the point of the Island, where North and East Rivers meet, is an old fort, now much out of repair, and which is soon to be removed, for the purpose of erecting houses in a part of the city so convenient for doing business. This fort is built on a prodigious mound of earth raised for that purpose, with the walls next the harbor forty feet high, and seems to be well situated for commanding the entrance into both rivers; but forts where there is a passage by them are now found to be of very little use. Around this is the Mill, where a vast concourse of gentlemen and ladies are constantly walking a little before sunset and in the evening. On the part of the Mill next the water, which is of considerable extent, is a square and most beautiful gliss (built-up with free-stone from the water), on which they walk. This is a cool and most delightful walk in an evening, having the sea open as far as Staten Island and Redbanks, but in the day-time it greatly wants the shade of trees.

"On the northern part of the city is a large hospital, built with free-stone, with two extended wings. The markets in this city are kept in the largest order. The principal is the Fly market, in Water Street; the next is Oswago market, in Broadway. Bakers' market and Merchants' Hall market are also large.

"There is perhaps no city or town of any considerable magnitude where such perfect order is preserved as in New York. This is the center of mercantile trade. The shipping in this city is exceedingly numerous. He transports to a French and British packet. There is a play-house, but the actors do not perform in the summer, but there are constant exhibitions from ropedancers, mountebanks, jugglers, and showmen."—Lif., Jour., and Corresp. of Rev. Manasseh Cutler, L.L.D. (Cincinnati, 1888), p. 306–9.

The common council appoints a committee to determine whether the barracks in the near the almshouse cannot be appropriated for the sick of the almshouse.—M. C. G. (1784–1811), I: 311–12.

The committee finds "that five Tenements thereof ought to be appropriated & put in Repair for that Use"; but this report is rejected. In stead, four others are appropriated for the purpose. Ibid., I: 314. The work was completed and paid for by Dec. 12.—See O 11; and L. M. R. K., III: 924.

The vestry of Trinity Church resolves that the fence of St. George's Chapel be completed.—Trin. Min. (MS).

At a meeting of Trinity vestry, a petition from Mrs. Edye Williams is read, in which she asks Trinity corporation to take over the "Vauxhall" property (see L. M. R. K., III: 981), which property was formerly leased by Samuel Francis, "under whom she claimed; and also that this corporation will "remit her the ground rent due thereon and to grant her an Annuity during the remainder of her life."—Trin. Min. (MS). A committee of the vestry having been requested, on Aug. 8, to see Mrs. Williams, reported on Oct. 29 that they had "informed her of the Intentions of the Corporation to re-enter the Estate and to allow her an Annuity of forty Pounds," and that she had informed them that, "to the best of her Knowledge," the estate was "clear of Incumbrances and that the Lease was burnt at Peaks Kill in the Year 1777."—Ibid. Two Canals lately imported from Madeira, in the Brigantine Olive-Branch, may be seen at the stables of Mr. Stephens, adjoining the snuff and tobacco manufacture of William Maxwell, Esq. in Wall street.—Daily Adv., Ag 14, 1787.

Fitch's second steamboat (for the first, see Jl 27, 1786), which is an improvement in every way over its predecessor, has its trial trip on the Delaware River. The experiment is witnessed by all the members of the federal convention except Gen. Washington.—Bullock, "The Miracle of the First Steamboat" in Jour. Am. Hist., I: 36 et seq. Fitch successfully tested other boats in July, 1788, and April, 1790.—Ibid.; Preble, Chron. Hist. of Origin and Development of Steam Navigation, N 29, 31–33. See Je 5, 1790.

The council passes the act "to alter & amend" Queen St. from the Fly Market to Kings St.; Water St. from the Fly Market to Wall St.; First or Front St. from the Old Slip to the Fly Market; and Wall St. from the city hall to Queen St.—M. C. G. (1784–1811), I: 316.

Christopher Colles, "engineer," in a petition to the common council, states that "he proposes to open an Evening Academy this winter for the purpose of instructing young Gentlemen in Gunnery, Drawing, & many other mathematical branches;" he requests the board "to admit him to hold said Academy in the Exchange."—From original petition (in metal file No. 8, city clerk's record-room), endorsed "read Aug 22d 1787 & granted." See also M. C. C. (1784–1813), I: 25, 314; and Daily Adv., S 27, 1787. Regarding his electrical experiments, see Ibid., Ja 20, 1799.

"The city has but one walk, where the women can enjoy air and exercises, which is the Battery." This, however, is deserted because of the spectacle of naked swimmers who frequent the place.—N. Y. Jour., Ag 30, 1787.

This day being appointed for the parade and review of all the uniformed corps of militia in New York (see N. Y. Gaz., Ag 30), about 600 men, under command of Lieut. Col. Bauman, parade at "the burnt church [Trinity];" and march down Wall St, and up Queen St. to the "race-ground [in Bowery Lane]—see S 27, 1786," where they perform a "variety of evolutions." The corps is reviewed by the governor. In the evening there was a display of fireworks "fronting the fort."—N. Y. Jour., S 6, 1787.

Commodore John Paul Jones writes to George Washington in Philadelphia that he is still delayed in New York by congress, and so is unable to embark in the packet for France, "that is to sail tomorrow."—Ibid., S 6, 1787. He writes a personal matter, saying: "Your determination to 'place my Bait with your own' confers on me a greater Honor than I ever before received—An Honor which I shall ever be ambitious to merit. . . . I shall leave you, Sir, to imagine my extreme sensibility on this occasion for, I feel, it would be impossible for me to communicate entering into words.—De Koven, Life of Paul Jones, I: 124–69. The bust here referred to, by Houdon, is probably the one now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the gift of John L. Cadwalader.

"A Law to prevent the erecting or suspending of Signs to project into the Streets of this City."—M. C. C. (1784–1813), I: 318.

"Four federal canons of Philadelphia complete the work of drafting the Constitution. On the following day, Washington, who was the deputy from Virginia, and the president of the convention, wrote to the president of congress, which was sitting at New York, a letter reviewing the principles which acted the framers, and submitting a copy of the Constitution "to the consideration of the United States, in Congress assembled." The letter and Constitution published in the Penn. Packet (see Jl 23, 1787) are copied from the "The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, ed. by Max Farrand (1911), Winor, VII: 245, 246, 256. For the celebration held in New York on its ratification by enough states to make it operative, see Jl 23, 1788.

The committee of the common council to whom was referred a petition of Daniel Niven (or Nevin) and others, regarding alleged encroachments on the property of an estate (for an Annuity of twenty Pounds) is considering "Encroachments as yet have been made on the Property of the Public." Among the facts presented to support this opinion, it is stated that the subject of the complaint is"some Buildings [which] are now erecting at the lower end of Cortlandt Street . . . by which the Street or Passage along the South Side of the Slip there, is greatly contrasted and rendered very Inconvenient to Passengers in crossing the North River, and that the said obstructions are on Publick property." The committee's report discusses the title to the property, including a grant in 1701 of a piece of land along the strand to Peter Jansen Mesier, and a grant in 1766 of a water lot to Abraham Mesier. They find "that the said Cortland Street was originally forty feet in Breadth, but that the Owners of the Ground there have given up five feet at the North and South Sides thereof to make the said Street fifty feet." The house complained of is being built by Abraham Bussing on the ground conveyed to Peter Mesier, and not on that conveyed to Abraham Mesier. Bussing has an indisputable right to erect his house in the manner he has done, under the directions of John McComb, city surveyor, "on a Parallel line with the other Houses on the South side of the said Street." The report passes over to "alter & amend" Queen St. from the Fly Market to Kings St.; Water St. from the Fly Market to Wall St.; First or Front St. from the Old Slip to the Fly Market; and Wall St. from the city hall to Queen St.—M. C. C. (1784–1813), I: 319–20. This report elicited an open letter from a citizen, addressed to the committee, giving
The following announcement is published in New York: "A Mezzotint Print of His Excellency General Washington, done by Charles Wilston Peale of Philadelphia, from a portrait which he has painted since the sitting of the Convention, is now completed: the likeness is esteemed the best that has been executed in a print. — Capt. Verder, a Frenchman, had the honor of being the sitter. The portrait, which bears his original name, will be published in a few days, and a large number will be made for those who purchase to sell again—Apply to Charles W. Peale, at the corner of Third and Lombard Street, Philadelphia.

"The printers in the several states, who are desirous of encouraging the fine arts in America, are requested to publish this as an article of intelligence; which will oblige the numerous friends of the General." —Daily Advertiser, S 24, 1787. This print is now very rare.

At about 11 o'clock at night, a duel was fought "on the ground near Bayard's-Hill," in which "the noted Chevalier Longchamps" was shot and killed. His antagonist, one Capt. Verder, a Frenchman who had served as an officer in Count Pulaski's American legion, "had thought himself much injured by some assertions made by the Chevalier, and meeting him in William-street, on Tuesday afternoon, a fight took place, which, to the evening, terminated in the molocholy catastrophe above mentioned." Verder sailed immediately for the West Indies.—Daily Advertiser, S 27; Ind. Journal, S 29, 1787.

On this Sunday, the company of grenadiers and light infantry of Col. Varicet's regiment "paraded at the Burat Church in the Broadway" (Trinity), then marched to the Baptist Church to hear a sermon by Rev. Mr. Gano.—Daily Advertiser, O 9, 1787.

A committee of the common council is appointed "to direct the Brethren of the Area in front of the new Buildings of Messrs. [Alexander] Macombe & others in the Broadway." —M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 327. They reported on Oct. 11 that they had "directed the Area in front of the new Houses in the Broadway should extend six feet beyond the clear, the extent of the Kalgan to be six & one half feet from the front of the Houses and that the Street when paved should have a Walk on each side for foot Passengers of fifteen feet."—Ibid., I: 328. Pres. Washington occupied this residence in 1790 (5: 7, 22).

The continental congress, sitting in New York, resolves: "that a medal of gold be struck and presented to the chevalier John Paul Jones in commemoration of the valour and brilliant services of that officer, in command of a squadron of French and American ships, under the flag and commission of the United States, off the coast of Great Britain in the late war." At the same time it was voted that the king of France should be informed by letter that "the United States in Congress assembled have bestowed upon the chevalier John Paul Jones this medal as well in consideration of the distinguished approbation which his majesty has been pleased to confer upon that officer as from a sense of his merit." This letter was duly prepared on the same day by the secretary of foreign affairs (John Jay), and in accord with the orders of congress was delivered to Jones to convey to the king of France.—Sherburne, Life of Paul Jones, 284-85; Jour. of the Am. Congress from 1774 to 1801, Washington, 1825, IV: 11.

The common council passes "A Law to compel the filling up and making of Greenwich Street from Cortlandt Street to the Battery." It states that commissioners for regulating the part of the city have laid out Greenwich St. "to be continued from Cortlandt Street to the Battery of the Width of 66 feet," but that some of the proprietors there have failed to fill up the street in front of their lots.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 333.

The first number of "The Federalist" is published in New York, in the Independent Journal. The subsequent numbers were published in all the newspapers of the city. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay were the authors, writing over the nom-de-plume "Publish."

Commodore John Paul Jones, having completed the business that called him to the United States, leaves New York for France by the way of England. He has delayed his departure for several weeks, so as to go on an American instead of a French ship, because, as he wrote to Mr. Jefferson in Paris, "an account having arrived here that the English fleet is out and was seen steering to the westward, and that a British squadron is cruising in the North Sea." It appears that for some unknown reason he feared lest he might fall into the hands of the English.—Sherburne, Life of Paul Jones, 287-88.

Christopher Beekman, having taken the tavern at 49 Cortlandt St., formerly kept by Talmage Hall (see My 1), advertises that he "has agreed with the proprietors of the Albany and Boston stages, to make his house the public Stage-house." He "keeps a house of entertainment, and accommodates gentlemen with boarding and lodgings." He also has here "a large convenient Assembly Room, which he proposes to let during the winter season, or longer if required."

An additional notice states that the "Northern and Eastern Line of Stages" start from this house, which is "near the Oswego-market," and also from Mr. Lewis's Tavern in Albany, on Mondays and Thursdays, "precisely at four o'clock in the morning." During the autumn and winter, three days will be allowed for the run either way. The fare will be four pence a mile.—Daily Advertiser, N 13, 1787. See J 6, 1789.

The proposed street became Chambers St. For the location of the barracks, see PI. 42, N 4, Vol. 9. Melcon's petition appears on the common council for permission to "carry a Fier 100 feet into the East River in front of his Wharf commonly called the Crane Wharf." The subject is referred to the alderman and assistant of Montgomery Ward.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 338. The petition was granted.—Ibid., I: 341-42.

22 The monument erected to the memory of Gen. Montgomery (on the Broadway side of St. Paul's Chapel—see My 23 and Je 18) "has received the following elegant ornamental additions, designed by Major L'Enfant, the gentleman to whom we are indebted for so many beautiful productions.—Hymen, ex- tending his torch, overspreads his tomb. From behind the pyra- mid rises a Sun with thirteen rays, which enlightens the quarter of a terrestrial globe, emblematical of America. Above the whole is the American Eagle flying from East to West, carrying in his talons a starry curtain, in which the globe appears to have been wrapped.—Daily Adv., N. 22, 1787. On Nov. 25, "A Traveller" severely criticised the additions to the monument.—"Those absurd, bizarre and gingersbread addenda are a disgrace to taste; and would even discredit the mind of (sic) d'un Enfant. These tawdry ornaments might decorate the stern of a French packet, but have not that majestic simplicity or grandeur, or that perennius are, which becomes the Monument of a Hero. If I had the honour of being related to so great a man, I would, with an ingrate hand, pull the whole sphere, over-turn the Globe, and kindle a bonfire with the Clouds.—Ibid., N. 23, 1787. See O 27, 1788.

26 Evacuation Day falling on Sunday, it is celebrated on Monday. The annual review of Gen. M'Callum's regiment of militia occurs. The regiments having "mustered at their several regimental parades," march into Queen St. and form the brigade, then march "to a field assigned for the occasion," and are reviewed by the Excellency of the Commander in Chief. The legion composed of the uniformed troops of the respective regiments, and Col. Bauman's corps of artillery, perform "a variety of firings and evolutions," under command of Lieut. Col. Lewis.—Ind. Jour., N. 28, 1787.

30 Evet Bancher, Jr., one of the city surveyors, surveys and lays out, at the request of Peter Stuyvesant, on his farm in the Out Ward, a piece of ground intended for a street and square, then called the statue of the Commander in Chief. It was then and after known as Stuyvesant St.—M. G. C. (1784—1831), IV: 398. On Apr. 15, 1807 (v. e.), the corporation counsel gave his opinion that it was not a street because never made so by the city.—Ibid., IV: 397—401.

3 A Memorial from John Rodgers and others, being a Committee of the Society for promoting the Manumission of Slaves and protecting such of them as have been or may be liberated, "praying the Grant of a Piece of Land to build a School House on for educating the Children of free Negroes," is presented to Trinity vestry and adopted by the Committee of Ladies. (M. G. C. 1784; 1831.)

5 A Petition of Christopher Colles relative to his Claim of a Ballance due to him on Acc of the Works, commenced previous to the late War, for supplying the City with Water," is referred by the common council to a Committee to "enquire into the nature of the Claim & to report all the facts they can collect on the subject."—M. G. C. (1784—1831), I: 340—41. Colles had previously petitioned for this balance (see Aug. 14, 1786). The committee reported on his case on Jan. 12, 1787 (v. e.).

Archibald Kerley and some of his neighbours in Cherry St. present the city with a fire engine and a piece of ground for an engine house, and offer to erect a house if the city will provide the firemen. The common council accepts, and orders the engineer to appoint ten men as firemen for this engine. It also orders that in future only eight firemen shall be assigned to a small engine.—M. G. C. (1784—1831), I: 341.

11 The trial trip of James Rumsey's steamboat is made on the Potomac River at Shepherdstown, Va. The boat moves at the rate of four miles an hour.—McMaster, Hist. of People of U. S., i: 435—36, citing Pa. Gaz., D. 16, 1787; cf. Preble, Chron. Hist. of the Original Development of Steam Nav., 26. Rumsey had been experimenting for several years. tion.—See A Short Treatise on the Application of Steam, etc., by Rum-sy (Phil., 1788); The Original Steam-Boat supported; or, A Reply to Mr. James Rumsey's Pamphlet Shewing the true priority of John Fitch, and the false dajing, &c. of James Rumsey (Phil., 1788); Remarks on John Fitch's Reply to Mr. James Rumsey's pamphlet, Dec. 11, 1788. From June 16, 1784, to this date, the commissioners of for-} houses are rising, and streets extending; I see nothing but busy workmen building and repairing.

"At the same time they are erecting a building for Congress. They are likewise repairing the hospital: this building is in a bad condition; not a sick person could be lodged in it at the end of the war; it was a building almost abandoned: they have restored the administration of it to the Quakers, from whom it had been taken away during the war; and the repairs and the repairs are executing with the greatest vigour. This building is vast; it is of brick, and perfectly well situated on the bank of the North River. It enjoys every advantage: air the most salubrious, that may be renewed at pleasure; water in abundance; pleasant and extensive walks for the sick;
majesty of the prospect out of the town, yet sufciently near it."—Nea Travels in the U. S. A., performed in 1788,

Jan. The legislature meets at Poughkeepsie (see Ja 6, 1784) to begin its eleventh session. On March 23, it adjourned to convene in session opened on D 8 (g.r.).

An open letter bearing this date to "the Worshipful the Mayor" gives advice regarding building plans for the city's development.
The writer ("A Citizen") describes the conditions of the site, particularly with reference to extending the city "into the water." He believes "that the Island of New-York contains a sufficient quantity of ground for so much larger a city as will very be built upon it." He therefore so advises to extending it upon made ground. He argues as follows: "That houses placed upon the natural soil may be built of firmer materials, and will be more durable than those built on made ground. That houses standing on wharves have no advantage over those on the bank, which the latter would not have enjoyed, if no houses had been placed in front of them. That if no houses had been erected on made ground, the town must have extended farther along the East River than it now does, and of course that more lots would have enjoyed the benefit arising from a front on the water, . . . That wells cannot be dug on wharves: that those who live on them must therefore be very ill supplied with fresh water. . . . That houses on wharves, for want of proper foundations, can seldom be built of brick or stone, and covered with tile. That even when those materials are used, the houses are slight, and without party walls. That houses on wharves, therefore, are more subject to fire. . . . That the Small lots and narrow Streets on the wharves spread this calamity.
That every street laid out upon the water, puts another Street farther from it. That every new grant of a water lot is therefore an injury done to the property of those who live in the interior part of the city. If the city had the water, it could have expressed the right of erecting no buildings on them, the whole town would have been surrounded on three sides by a key, extending so far into the water as to answer the purposes of commerce. . . . That these wharves being much less extensive than those which are now erected, the harbor would, in a great measure, have retained its natural size, which would have prevented that encrease in the rapidity of the tide which these encroachments have occasioned. . . .

"This city occupies about three hundred and fifty acres of ground. One hundred of which consist of lots taken from the water.
The wharves erected for this purpose, with the repairs expended upon them, would be cheaply estimated at $600,000, one third of which sum would have been sufficient for all the purposes of commerce, and the cost of one million of dollars . . . has been from the imprudence of the Corporation, in granting water lots without annexing any restriction thereto, been absolutely thrown away, or what is much worse, expended to the most ruinous purposes—a sum that will appear infinitely larger, if we consider that the greatest part of it has been drawn from a commercial stock, and add to our calculations the profits that would have resulted from it to commerce, and the benefit which would have been conferred upon it. . . . The North river is still for the most part in its native state; it is essential to the health, strength & beauty of this city that it should remain so. . . . There is a considerable space between the houses that front the Broad-way and the river, and this space will be still more enlarged by the wharves which the propri-tors of the river have all build for their own convenience. This will afford room for the erection of batteries in times of danger—the height of the houses on the bank, and the breadth of the streets, will render them little liable to danger from the fire of an enemy.
. . . All these advantages will be lost by extending the houses into the river. . . .

"Put a stop, then, to your improvements, (as they are absurdly called) upon the North River. . . . Lay out no new streets, and let Greenwich-street terminate at Trinity Church. The lots to the south of this are in the hands of opulent Citizens. Let them extend their gardens across that street. Few among them are so tasteful, as to permit the sight of wretched houses, smoky chimneys, and dirty streets, to shut out a view of one of the finest rivers in the world, and the beautiful shores that limit its western extent."—Daily Adv., Ja 9, 1788.

A committee of Trinity vestry is appointed "to solicit Subscriptions for rebuilding Trinity Church," with the assistance of "the Right Reverend Rector and the Clergy of the Church."

"The Committee on the Case of Christopher Colles [see D 5, 1785] reported verbally the Information which they had been able to obtain on the Subject of his Claim on the Corporation for Monies due him for his Services in superintending the erection of the Works for supplying this City with Water previous to the late War.

"Whereupon the Board agreed in Opinion that some ballance probably was due to Mr Colles on account of the above Service.
But that the Books of the late Treasurer in which those Accounts were entered were at present out of the Power of this Board; the Sum actually due remained uncertain until further Information on this Subject could be obtained."—I: 1785-1813, 344-45. See Ja 16.

The Application is now to be made to the legislature for £1917 to pay the outstanding accounts for erecting the monument to Gen. Montgomery.—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 348.

The committee on the case of Christopher Colles (see Ja 12) recommends that he be paid £150. Colles having expressed his willingness to accept this sum, the common council orders the treasurer to make payment "on Condition that he [Colles] execute to this Board a Release against all Demands which he may have against this Corporation for or on account of his Services in Superintending & managing the erection of the Works began previous in the late War for supplying this City with Water."—M. C. C.

with water was being agitated on Jan. 29 (g.r.).

Daniel Phoenix, city treasurer, prepares a budget for the city and county of New York, for the year 1883, amounting to £31,750.
As in the previous year (see May 1, 1787), the largest item is for the support and repair of the poorhouse, £4,500, a reduction, however, for this object of £300. The watch consists now of one captain and 30 men, and it is proposed to add 15 men to the force, thus raising the expense of this department to £28,552. The other items of expense are the same as in the previous year. A tax of £1,000 is reduced to £6,750, by insolvencies and the cost of collect-

A petition to the common council is being circulated in the city for signatures. This states: "That as the present mode of furnishing this City and shipping with water, is in many respects subject to many inconveniences, we do hereby declare our approbation of a design for supplying the same by means of waterworks and conduit pipes, and will (as soon as the same shall be completed) be satisfied to pay our respective proportion of a tax for the purpose, provided the same does not exceed twenty-six shillings for each house per annum, at an average. May it therefore please your honors to take the premises into consideration, and to adopt such measures for effecting the same as you shall judge most expedient, for the advantage, convenience and safety of the City.

1788 — N. Y. Packet, Jan 29, 1788. This petition was considered in common council on Feb. 27 (q.v.). "Belvoir" is offered for sale, or to let. It is described as a "beautiful Country Seat . . . situated on the banks of the East River, about three miles from the city." Terms are obtainable of John Murray in Quez, an adjournment to Jan 29, 1788. It was again so advertised in Feb., p. 12, and Ap. 25, 1789.

30 The Society for the Relief of Distressed Debtors, which was organized a year ago (see Ja 26), has been enabled, "by the charitable contributions of sundry persons," to afford relief to 125 debtors.—Daily Adv. Ja 30, 1788.

Feb. Isaac Asen and others, "Occupying Stores on the Albany Pier for which they are Paying High Rents, for the Convenience of having the Privilege of Vessels Discharging their Cargoes to their Docks," complain in a petition to the common council that lumber and shingle boats occupy the wharves in front of their stores for weeks at a time, whereby they are prevented from paying cartage (evidently on goods arriving on boats which have to discharge their cargoes at a distance), and also exposing their stores to the danger of fire, because the shingle boats "have no other Convenient for their fires and Coochong than amidst their Shingles on the Decks of their Vessels," within a few yards of the stores. They ask that a law be passed "that no Lumber or Shingle Boats shall be admitted to come farther into the Slip then the Ell from the Peer."—From the original petition (in metal file No. 7, city clerk's record-room), dated Feb. 3, 1788 & referred to the Adm. & the Dock & the Adp. & Assist. of the East Wd. See also M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 351. Originally appeared the report is the report of the committee, dated F 20, in which they state that "it is Dangerous for Shingle Boats to Lie in Coenties Slip above the Ell, or in any other part of this City amongst the Buildings," and they recommend "that a law be passed to prevent the like danger in future." See also M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 352. A proposed ordinance intended to remedy the evil failed to pass. Ibid., I: 562-63.

19 The proprietors of a new line of stages advertise the fare between Powles-Hook and Philadelphia to be "three Spanish milled dollars, and all way passengers four pence per mile, 150 lb. of baggage to be the same as a passenger; Printers papers and letters will be conveyed gratis." The Stages leave Powles-Hook at 7 o'clock P. M. every day for Philadelphia, except Saturday."—N. Y. Packet, F 22, 1788.

21 The vestry of Trinity Church orders that "the Seal of the Corporation be affixed to a Petition to the Legislature for changing the Name of the Corporation to that of 'The Rector and Inhabitants of New-York in Communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of New York.'"—Trin. Min. (MS.). The former title was "The Rector and Inhabitants of the City of New-York, in Communion of the Church of England, as by Law Established." The petition explains that, as the Protestant Episcopal Church has now become completely organized, it is improper to retain a name expressive of a connection and dependence which no longer exists. The petition is granted.—Assemb. Jour. (11th sess.), 59. A law to the desired effect was passed Mar. 10 (q.v.). In order to leave "sufficient Harbour" and a "free Passage" for the ferry boats at the ferry stairs, during the continuance of the lease of the ferry to Elizabeth Mesier (that is, the "Powles Hook ferry at Cortland Slip"), the common council orders that not more than three river oars be permitted to lie on the north side of the ferry stairs and two oars on the south side.—M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 353.

22 The legislature passes "An Act for punishing Treasons and Felonies, and for the better regulating the Proceedings in Cases of Felony." The privilege called "benefit of clergy," heretofore allowed in criminal cases, is abolished. Numerous crimes are made punishable with death.—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 57.

23 The legislature passes "An Act concerning Slaves." Among its provisions are the following: Slaves shall continue to be slaves unless manumitted. Any person selling a slave brought into this state after June 1, 1785, shall forfeit $100, and the slave shall be free. The children of women slaves shall follow the condition of the mother.—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 40.

24 The legislature passes an act to prevent immorality. Certain conduct is prohibited on Sundays. Proflane persons are to be put in the stocks if fine is not paid. Drunkenness is prohibited.—Laws of N. Y. (1787), chap. 42.

This law appears to have been inadequate. There is preserved in the Emmet Coll., in the N. Y. Pub. Library, a manuscript petition, signed by 101 names, asking for the law's revision. Its date appears to be 1798. This asks that it be made "the duty of Civil Officers, not only when in the immediate execution of their Office, but at any times to see the Law duly respected and enforced; it asks for an increased penalty for violations; also "the better regulating of Taverns, tipping Houses, and the suppression of Brothels, all which have been encreas'd to a number truly alarming, and are fruitful sources of Idleness and Vice;" the petitioners are persuaded "that the Evil will continue more or less to exist, while the emandment arising from the granting of Licenses is a perquisite annexed to the Office, which is a powerful grant to interest more than may be good for Society, or the benefit of individuals;" they therefore ask the legislature to consider "whether in all Cases, the revenue, which might arise from that quarter, had not better be paid into the Public Treasury; and the Officer have a salary equivalent, independent of any perquisite being annexed to it."—Emmet Colls., 11460.

A Petition of a great number of Inhabitants of this City suggesting the inconveniences which arise from the present Mode of supplying this City with Water & praying this Board to adopt such Measures for supplying it with Water by means of Pipes agreeable to a Plan or proposal set on foot by Christopher Colles or such other Plan as to the Board shall appear most expedient" (see Ja 29) is read at common council on the 18th 1788 & referred to a committee "to consider of the Subject & to report such Measures as they conceive most proper to be pursued on the Occasion by the Corporation for the Advan- tage Convenience & Safety of this City."—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 354-55. This matter was again dropped, as it had been in 1786 (q.v., Apr. 19). See Ja 8, 1789.

The common council orders that the engineer erect an engine—house on the ground adjoining the North Dutch Church.—M. C. C. (1784-1811), I: 356. This house was paid for (f11) on July 2.—Ibid., I: 358.

Payment is made to Andrew Thompson, Jr., "for paving in front of several Lots on Golden Hill on a new Regulation of that Street [John St.] in 1785."—M. C. C. (1784-1813), I: 356.

The following extracts are taken from a contemporary description of New York: "The City-hall is a brick building, more strong than elegant. It is three stories in height, with wings at each end, and fronts Broad-street, which affords an extensive prospect. The first floor is an open walk, except two small apartments for the door-keeper and city watch. In the second story of the Eastern wing, is the Assembly chamber, now occupied by Congress, and adorned with the portraits of the Generals Washington, Gates, and Columbus, belonging to the Assembly of this State; a painting valuable only for its antiquity and the character of the man—The likeness of the King and Queen of France, as large as the life, executed in a masterly manner, and presented to Congress by his most Christian Majesty; equally valuable for the richness of the paintings, the dignity of the personages whom they represent, and as pledges of royal friendship—The likeness of General Washington, presented by a gentleman in England—a likeness dear to every American, and destined to grace the walls of every Council chamber in the new world."

The Western wing contains a room for the Council or Senate, now occupied by the Secretary of Congress, and another for the Mayor's Court. In the body of the house is a spacious hall for the Supreme Judicial Court.

"This city is esteemed the most eligible situation for commerce in the United States. It almost necessarily commands the trade of one half New-Jersey, most of that of Connecticut and part of that of Massachusetts; besides the whole fertile interior country, which is penetrated by one of the largest rivers in America, navigable 170 miles. This city imports most of the goods connected between a line 50 miles East of Connecticut river, and 20 miles West of the Hudson, which is 150 miles, and between the ocean and the confines of Canada, about 250 miles; a considerable portion of which is the best peopled of any part of the United States, and the whole territory contains at least half a million people, or one-sixth of the inhabitants of the Union. Besides, some of the other States are partly supplied with many commodities from New-York. The superfine flour, Pennsylvania and Maryland have railed it—the superfine flour of those States commanding a higher price than New-York.
1788 "In the manufacture likewise of iron, paper, cabinet works, &c. Pennsylvania exceeds not only New-York, but all her sister States. In times of peace, however, New York will command more commercial business than any town in the United States. In time of war, it will be insecure, without a marine force; but a small number of ships will be able to defend it from the most formidable attacks by sea. . . .

"The change of inhabitants effected by the revolution was considerable, and had some effect upon the general character of the citizens. Notwithstanding, in point of sociability and hospitality, New-York is hardly exceeded by any town in the United States. The principal families, by associating in their public amusements, the middle and lower class of well bred citizens, render their rank sub- servient to the happiness of society, and prevent that party spirit, which an affectation of superiority in certain families in Philadel- phia, has produced in that city—a spirit which disturbs or destroys their public amusements, and which has given the citizens, too generally, perhaps, the reputation of inhospitable.

"Several causes however, have operated to diminish the sociability of the citizens of New-York—particularly the change of inhabitants, and the loss of property, during the ravages of war—and the unfavorable state of business since the establishment of peace. These causes have had their influence in all parts of America; and perhaps as little influence in New-York as in any other town.

"The charge of neglecting reading and the improvements of the mind might be just in Smith's time [1759], but if just, it did not lie solely against the inhabitants of this city. That the Americans were formerly and may still be behind the citizens of London in their attention to literature and the arts, will be acknowledged—nor is it surprising. Yet no person acquainted with the well bred American ladies, can charge them generally with ignorance: and there are great numbers in New-York, whose minds are highly improved and whose conversation is as inviting as their personal charms.

"Nor are the schools in this city in such a deplorable situation, as they were formerly. There are many which are kept by reputable and able men; and Columbia College affords a very favorable prospect.

"It must not, however be concealed, that Smith's description of the state of education is now but too just, with respect to the country at large. There are several good academies in the country, but many parts are either unfurnished with schools, or the schools which they have are kept by low ignorant men, and are consequently worse than none. This remark may be extended to a large proportion of the United States.

An enquirer, who would wish to acquaint himself with the true state of the people of New-York, their manners, and government, would naturally ask the citizens for their societies for the encouragement of sciences, arts, manufactures, &c.? For the patrons of literature? Their well regulated Academies? For their Female Academy for instructing young ladies in geography, history, belles lettres, &c.? Such enquiries might be made with propriety.

"The practice of physic, it is presumed, is on a better footing than when Smith wrote his history. That it is capable of many improvements, in all parts of America, will hardly be denied by the faculty themselves. There are however many very eminent physicians and surgeons in New-York; and it is only to be regretted that there is a necessity of going abroad for knowledge which ought to be obtained at home.

"All free governments abound with lawyers. Where men have the privilege of thinking and acting for themselves, they will involve themselves in debt, and quarrel with their neighbors. In proportion to the debts and disputes of the people, lawyers will multiply. Of these Americas furnishes a plentiful growth, and New-York has its share. In this State, the practice of law is con- formed to the English mode, and is perhaps better regulated than in the other States. The several degrees in the profession—the number of critical examinations that candidates are obliged to pass thro, before they can be admitted as Counsellors in the higher courts; together with the time of study required by the rules of admission, render an access to the first honors of the bar so difficult, that it induces ignorance, and tends to the important science of law. New-York can boast of many men, eminent in a very liberal profession, and which has hitherto furnished America with some of her most able legislators. It is however to be feared that a too rigid adherence to the forms of legal process in England, Mar. has sometimes perplexed the road to justice, and prevented valu- able improvements in the practice, not only of this, but of most of the States.

"On a general view of this city, as described thirty years ago, and in its present state, the comparison is flattering to the present age; particularly the improvements in taste, elegance of manners and that easy unaffected civility and politeness which form the happiness of social intercourse. . . .

"The following account of the number of dwelling-houses in the principal towns of the United States is given mostly from the Editor's own enumeration in the years 1795 and 1786. The round number nearest the actual number is given, merely to assist the memory. . . . [The cities mentioned below are selected.]

The legislature passes an act for the better regulating of inns and taverns in the city of New York, stipulating that no permits shall be granted to retail strong or spirituous liquors for the purpose of keeping an inn or tavern, unless it shall appear "that an inn or tavern at the place, at which such permit is applied for is necessary for the accommodation of travellers. . . ."—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 48.

The treasurer of the city is ordered to pay, out of the excise duties, the sum of £800 annually for four years to the society of the hospital.—Laws of N. Y., chap. 48 (Webster). At the expiration of this law, the legislature again came to the aid of the society (see Ap 11, 1792).

The legislature passes the following act: "Whereas the levelling and altering of Wall-Street in the City of New York renders it inconvenient that the remains of the Statue [see N 39, 1777] of the late Earl of Chatham, . . . which now Stands in the Said Street, Should continue there. Therefore, . . . it is hereby enacted . . . that it Shall be lawful for the Corporation of the City of New York, to cause the Said Statue to be removed to Some conve- nient place, where the Same may be preserved, until the further order of the legislature."—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 57. See Ji 16.

The legislature passes "An Act for the better Settlement and Relief of the Poor." It provides, among other things, that the common council shall nominate and appoint twelve or more freeholders and inhabitants to be overseers of the poor, and to be known as "The commissioners of the almshouse and hospital of the City of New-York."—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 62.

The legislature passes "An Act for dividing the State into Counties." The boundaries of the county of New York are defined as follows: "to contain the islands, called Manhattans island, Great Barn island, Little Barn island, Mannings island, Nutten island, Bedlows island, Bucking island, and the Oyster islands, and all the land under the water within the following bounds: beginning at Spuyten Duyvel Creek where the same empties itself into Hudson's river, on the West Chester side thereof, at low water mark wherever the same now is or hereafter may be, and so running along the said creek at low water mark as aforesaid, on the West Chester side thereof, unto the East river or Sound, and from thence to cross over to Nassau island, to low water mark there as aforesaid, including Great Barn island, Little Barn island, and Mannings island, and from thence along Nassau island shore, at low water mark as aforesaid, unto the south side of Red Hook, and from thence across the North river, so as to include Nutten island, Bedlows island, Bucking island, and the Oyster islands, to low water mark on the west side of Hudson's river, or so far as the bounds of this State extend there, and so up along the west side of Hudson's river, at low water mark, or along the limits of this State, until it comes directly opposite the first mentioned Creek, and thence to the place where the said boundaries first began."—

Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 63.

An act of the legislature authorises the common council to pass regulations for making, mending, and maintaining fences in New York.—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 67.

Agreeable to the petition of Trinity vestry of Feb. 20 (p.v.), the legislature authorises the desired change in this corporation's name.—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 66.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND 1786.

The report of Egbert Benson, the attorney-general, dated Feb. 25, regarding the claim of the city of New York to Fort George and adjacent lands (see Ap. 16, 1787), is read in the assembly. It is a review of the whole question of title, beginning with the Dongan Charter of April 27, 1686, and the "Cæsarea Charter of Jan. 1735. Both charts gave to the city all the waste, vacant, unpatented and unappropriated lands on Manhattan Island, extending to low-water mark, excepting the Fort and the "liberties" thereof; and these were reserved to the king. The legislature of the colony confirmed these charters. On Nov. 21, 1783, the common council expressed no objection to a clause in a bill by the legislature for erecting a battery on the "Hackensack Rocks," "saving to this corporation the undoubted right they have to the soil from high-water mark to low-water mark, from White-Hall to Eilers Corner." This bill became a law on Nov. 28, 1783. The attorney-general further pointed out that there was no evidence of any claim or possession on the part of the city of the soil below low-water mark or above high-water mark between those places. Such lands the state now claims—that is, Fort George and the adjoining lands—it being understood that a jury can legally determine where the lines of high- and low-water marks are.

It is therefore resolved by the assembly: "That the Surveyor-General do make a survey of the grounds reserved to the crown in the charter to the Corporation of the city of New-York, as Fort George, and the Grandy, and the unappropriated, unpatented, and low-water mark, thereof, and also of the streets and lanes immediately adjacent thereto, and also of the soil heretofore under the water, and whereas the battery now is, and between White-Hall Slip and the place heretofore called Eilers corner, and lay before this House at the next meeting of the Legislature, a map of such survey to be formed on a scale of twenty feet to an inch: That the Attorney-General and Surveyor-General do endeavor from such proofs as they shall be enabled to discover, to ascertain as nearly as may be, the lines of high and low water mark between the said places, at the time when the last Charter was granted to the said city, and that such lines be also delineated on such map;" also "That the Commissioners of the Land-Office, shall direct the Surveyor-General to survey the Island commonly called Nottten-Island, and Out-Ward, and to lay out the same into lots not exceeding two acres each, with such lanes or streets as the Commissioners shall think proper; and shall direct the Surveyor-General to sell the said lots in such manner as he is required to sell unappropriated lands, by the act for the speedy sale of unappropriated lands, passed the fifth day of May, in the year 1786, and that on such sales no public securities, other than those signed by the Treasurer or Auditor of this State, shall be received in payment: Provided that it shall be in the discretion of the Commissioners, to direct such parts of the said island as they shall deem proper to be reserved for fortifications, to remain unsold."—Assem. Jour., 11th sess., 125-27. See also Mr 20, and Col. Bauman's report of Je 10, 1788.

The common council grants to Trinity corporation a triangular piece of land, bounded by Bowery in the north, the Post and Bloomfield Roads, for a school-house, church, parsonage-house, and burial-ground, agreeable to the intention of the board on Dec. 12, 1771 (see Jl 22, 1771); and a committee is appointed to consider and report the terms on which the grant ought to be made.—M. C. L. (1784-1831), I: 357-58. See, further, Ag 20.

To be sold or let, That very pleasant seat, late the property of Roger Morris, Esq., situated on Haarlem-Heights, containing upwards of 150 acres of meadow and arable land; the mansion house and out buildings are perhaps not exceeded in this State, for elegance and spaciousness, and the prospect from the house is the most commanding on the island; the garden contains a large collection of the best fruit trees. For terms apply to Michael Joy, Hannaway & Co., or Cornelius I. Bogart, No. 42, Beacon-street.—N. T. Packet, Mar. 18, 1788. The house was advertised again the next year.—Daily Adv., Mr 17, 1789. See also Mr 12, 1790.

The body of Maria Farmer is interred in Trinity Church, her funeral being conducted, in accordance with her will, after the ancient Dutch custom. "The followers, after being literally supplied with spiced wine, pipes, and tobacco, moved in Procession from the Church, at a quarter after two o'clock, Mr 17. Mrs. Farmer was the grand-daughter of Jacob Leisler.—See Mr 12, 1784.

Again it is announced that Trinity corporation is to sell numerous lots at auction.—Daily Adv., Mr 18, 1788. These lots were situated in Chambers and Read Sts., and other places, within the vicinity of the Church and the college. "Domenics Hook Patent," in the West Ward. The heirs of Anneke Bogardus, and those holding rights under them, published a notice, the day before the sale, of their intention to support their claim to the lands.—Ibid., Mr 18, 1788. See also Anecke Jones Bogardus and Herr Farm, pub. by N. Y. Hist. Society, 1879; or ibid., in Harper's New Monthly Mag., 1885, pp. 386-39.

The legislature passes an act "to extend the Powers of the Commissioners of the Land-Office to the Cases therein mentioned," It provides, in part (see Mr 12), "That the commissioners of the land-office shall direct the surveyor-general to survey the island commonly called Nottten-Island, or Governor's-Island, and to lay out the same into lots not exceeding two acres each, with such lanes or streets as the commissioners shall deem proper, and shall direct the surveyor-general to sell the said lots in such manner as he is required to sell unappropriated lands, . . ." (under an act of May 1, 1786). It shall be in the discretion of the commissioners to direct that such parts of the island as they deem proper shall be reserved for fortifications, and remain unsold.—Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 89 (Greenleaf, II: 196). It is not known that any portion of it was so disposed of. See Mr 31, 1790.

The legislature passes "An Act relating to the forfeited Estates." It provides that the office of commissioner of forfeitures shall cease on Sept. 1 next, and that the real estate forfeited to the people of the state shall thereafter be disposed of by the surveyor general.

Laws of N. Y. (1788), chap. 90.

The vestry of Trinity Church passes a resolution "that this Corporation will join with the Trustees of Columbia College, and the Corporation of the Dutch Church in the City of New York, in the Appointment of Morgan Lewis and Brockholst Livingston Esquires to solicit and transact the Business of this Corporation & the said other Corporations respecting their Lands in the District of Country called Vermont; . . ."—Trin. Min. (MS.). For a history of the lands here referred to, see F 6 and 12, 1876; Mr 19, 1790; Ap 4, 1774.

The common council authorizes the treasurer to lease Bedloe's Island "for three years on the most advantageous Terms in his power, reserving the Use of the pest House & the privilege of Fishings, and the Aiims of the Gov't. on the Wharf, or the Island."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 359. On April 7, the treasurer reported that he had rented it at £10 a year.—Ibid., I: 365.

The lease of the house occupied by "the Widow Baker," opposite the fish market, is offered for sale by Jonathan Lawrence. The house is described as "one of the principal stands in this city."—N. T. Packet, Ap 4, 1788.

"Furnace canal to be made from Garden and Farm, at Ranalegh, in the Out Ward . . ., belonging to the estate of Anthony A. Rutgers, deceased," are offered for sale.—Daily Adv., Ap 5, 1788. See L. M. R. K., III: 923; also Mr 5, 1794.

Petitions are under consideration by the common council for filling up part of Dye, Cortland, and Crown Slips; also for filling at Burgals and Burnell Slip.—N. T. Packet, Mr 18, 1788. See also S 17.

The so-called "Doctors' Riot" occurs.—N. T. Packet, Ap 15, 1788. The following appears to be an accurate account of the event from a contemporary source: " . . . During the last winter, some students of physic, and other persons, had dug up from several of the cemeteries in this city, a number of dead bodies for dissection. This practice had been conducted in so indecent a manner, that it raised a considerable clamor among the people. The interments not only of strangers, and the blacks, had been disturbed; but the corps of some respectable persons were removed. These circumstances most sensibly agitated the feelings of the friends of the deceased, and brought up the passions of the populace to a ferment."

"On Sunday the 13th inst. a number of boys, we are informed, who were playing in the rear of the Hospital, perceived a limb which was imprudently hung out of a window to dry; they immediately informed some persons—a multitude soon collected—the Hospital; and, in their fury destroyed a number of anatomical preparations; some of which, we are told, were imported from foreign countries—one or two fresh subjects were taken; other persons were interfered—all of which were interfered the same evening. Several young doctors narrowly escaped the fury of the people; and would inevitably have suffered very severely, had not his Honor the Mayor, the Sheriff, and some other persons interfered, & rescued them, by lodging them in goal."
“On Monday morning a number of people collected, and were determined to search the houses of the suspected physicians. His Excellency the governor, His Honor the Chancellor, and His Worship the Mayor, finding that the passions of the people were irritated, went among them, and endeavored to dissuade them from committing unnecessary depredations. They addressed the people pathetically and promised them every satisfaction, which the laws of the country can and would considerately afford them. After examining the houses of the suspected doctors, retired to their homes.—But in the afternoon the affair assumed a different aspect. A mob... went to the goal, and demanded the doctors who were there imprisoned. The Magistrates finding that the mild language of persuasion was of no avail were obliged to order out the militia, to suppress the riot, to maintain the dignity of government, and protect the goal. A small party of about 18 armed men assembled at 3 o’clock, and marched thither—the mob permitted them to pass through, with no other insult than a few volleys of stones, dirt, &c.—Another party of about 12 men, about an hour afterwards, made a similar attempt, but having no orders to resist, the mob surrounded them, seized and destroyed their arms... they then endeavored to force the goal, but were repulsed... They then destroyed the windows of that building with stones, and tore down part of the fence.—At dusk another party of armed citizens marched to the relief of the goal; and as they approached it, the mob huzzaing, began a heavy fire with stones, brick-bats, &c. Several of this party were much hurt, and in their own defence were obliged to fire upon three of the murderers: they were repulsed, and a number wounded. The mob shortly after dispersed.

"On Tuesday morning the militia of General Malcolm’s brigade, and Col. Bauman’s regiment of artillery were ordered out... But happily the mob did not again collect, and the peace of the city is once more restored."—Ibid., Apr. 25, 1788.

"Wm. A. Duer, an eye-witness of the "Doctors’ riot," later said that Baron von Steuben accompanied Gov. George Clinton, Mayor James Duane, Recorder Richard Varick, and other officials to the scene of the doctors’ riot. While passing along Chatham Row on their way to the jail," the Governor declared his determination to resort to the most vigorous and decisive measures for quelling the riot. The Baron, in the benevolence of his heart, remonstrated with the Governor against ordering the militia to fire; when in the midst of his harangue he was struck in the forehead by a brick-bat, which, according to the Governor’s account, not only knocked the good Baron down, but overset his humanity and brought his compassion, with his body, to the ground; which he so soon touched as he cried out hastily, "fire! Governor, fire!" I saw the poor Baron brought bleeding into my father’s house, and after he had retired to have his head dressed, I received the Governor’s letter:"—Reminiscences of an Old New Yorker, by William A. Duer (pub. by W. L. Andrews, N. Y., 1867), 34, citing ibid. in The Am. Mag., Jul 3, 1847.

The common council orders that the injuries done to the jail in the doctors’ riot be repaired, and that a military guard of one officer and 15 men be stationed there.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 365-6.

Col. John May, while in New York, visits "the Congress Chamber." Of this he observes: "The greatest curiosity I saw was pictures of their majesties the King and Queen of France [see 1783],—their appearance truly elegant and noble. No painting can excel these. The frames that contain the pictures are magnificent—twelve feet high from border to corner of the frame, six feet wide,—an effect that is not high enough to receive their crowns (which perhaps is their doom). From thence I went to St. Paul’s Church. From thence we went to see a pile of new buildings, nearly completed, belonging to a Mr. McComb [Maumee], by far the finest buildings my eyes ever beheld, and I believe they exceed any on the continent [sic]. In one of the entries I traveled five flights of stairs to the seventh story. The view from this point is grand, and would command a splendid and inspiring scene to many who explored..."—Jour. and Letters of Col. John May, of Boston (1873), 20-21. The Maumee residence, on Broadway, became, in 1790 (q.v., F 3), the residence of President Washington.

By reason of the increase in the number of houses in the near powder magazine, "it becomes dangerous to the safety of the City... They... therefore required by the common council "to remove all the Gun Powder from the old to the new Magazine; and that no Gun powder be deposited in the old Magazine in future..."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 365. It is also ordered that the new magazine (at Inclenberg) be letted at auction for the term of three years.—Ibid., I: 366. On May 26, the city treasurer advertised that the "new Powder Magazine, near Inclenberg," was to be "sold at Public Auction" on June 3.—N. T. Daily Adv., May 26, 1788.

James Hardie, "who is at present employed by a number of very respectable Citizens to instruct their Children in the Greek and Latin languages," states in a petition to the common council that, "in order to excite a laudable emulation amongst the young Gentlemen committed to his care, & to satisfy Parents & Guardians with respect to the progress made in his school, [he] would wish to examine his scholars in public." He explains that a room to which he "cannot obtain "for either central nor commodious for the purpose; he therefore asks the use of the Old Council Chamber next, or on such other day as the Common Council should judge would interfere with public business."—From the original petition (in metal file No. 7, city clerk’s record-room); endorsed "read April 30th 1788—Mr. Hardie has permission to use the Exchange for the purpose mentioned;" M. G. C. (1784-1831), I: 769.

Samuel Fraunces announces that he has removed to this city, and "once more resumed his former occupation. He has rented the house, No. 16, Nassau-Street, corner of John street, lately occupied by William Millard of "Daily Adv., May 8, 1788. Fraunces continued here until May, 1789, when he became steward of President Washington’s household (see My 4, 1789). John Bat- tin took over this tavern.—N. T. Packet, My 30, 1789; Daily Adv., D 30, 1789. For later proprietors, see Heralds, N 19, 1796; N. T. Gaz. & Gen. Adv., O 15, 1806; see also Bayles, Old Taverns, 447-49.

The congregations of the old First Presbyterian Church and of the new Brick Church, which were under the united jurisdiction of the trustees of the former, owned at this time the following real and personal property: The church and its furniture, with the burial-ground, situated in Wall St.; the church and its furniture, with the burial-ground situated "in the Fields," held by lease from the city at a rental of $215 per annum, a lot in Robinson St., given to them by the corporation of Trinity Church for the use of the senior clergymen; and a lot in Bayard’s farm.—From inventory of Prov. of the Trustees (M.S.), Vol. II.

"Jacob Astor," at No. 81 Queen St., advertises that he "Has just imported an elegant assortment of Piano Fortes, which he will sell on reasonable terms. He also buys and sells for Cash, all kinds of iron."—N. T. Packet, May 8, 1788. On the title of the newspaper, this announcement was considerably elaborated. The name then appeared as "J. Jacob Astor," and the address was described as "next door but one to the Friends Meeting house."—Ibid., O 28, 1788.

John Harrison and Stephen Purdy, Jr., begin the publication of a weekly paper called The Impartial Gazetteer, and Saturday Evening’s Post. This was of quarto size.—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 440; Early Newspapers, II: 420. See Ag. 9.

Complaint being made that "the pitching of the Arch of the Street called the Broad Way lately regulated & now paving" is unsatisfactory to the neighbourhood, the common council orders the "three City Surveyors" examine it and see that the work is done "in manner most agreeable to the Neighborhood & the public Convenience."—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 373. Two of the surveyors reported on May 23; that they found the "rounded arch" of the street too high by at least half a foot, and that they had regulated it to be "only eighteen Inches higher in the middle of the Street than at the Keness towards the Houses on each side." It is to be paved accordingly.—Ibid., I: 374.

Gerard Bancroft, treasurer, publishes a notice, under the proviso that copy of the act of May 12, 1789 (q.v.), "for the speedy sale of the confiscated and forfeited estates within this state," that all demands against the forfeited estates of William Axtell, Robert Bayard, William Bayard, and others (about 5020), must be made within the next four months.—N. T. Jour., My 22, 1788.

John Russell begins the publication of a semi-weekly paper called The New York Museum. The last issue located is that of Aug. 15, 1788.—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 466.

The common council orders that Auchtumy St. be regulated.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 376. On June 26, surveyors offered a plan, and the clerk was ordered to prepare an ordinance, for paving and regulating this street, which in a marginal note is called “Rector Street.”—ibid., I: 381. The ordinance was presented and passed on July 9—Governors, Kings L. R. E., III: 220. The KL African lots £21.11.6d is made by order of the common council “for making watchmen’s Boxes to be placed in the Streets.”—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 376. An original bill of this date, filed in the city clerk’s record-room, shows that the common council ordered ten “Centinel Boxes” or “Watchmen’s Boxes” made for £55. These were placed “at the following Standts:” the City Market, the Governor’s, King L. R. E., III: 108.

SIR,

In compliance with the commissioners of the land office and your request, I lay before you my observations and sentiments respecting such ground which may be necessary to have reserved for fortifications, and may be found requisite to have erected upon Governor’s or Nutten Island for the protection of the harbour of New-York, therefore it ought to be well considered by the public who seem inclined to sell that Island, together with Fort George and the town battery. A part of the ground upon which Fort George stands may be sold in order to improve the rest, and in my opinion, the surplus would amount to more account to the state than the sale of the Island. The sale of the Island would injure the state; the sale of the Fort would not only benefit it, but would add beauty, health and strength to the city if rightly attended to. . . . 1 kind nature in the formation of this post has (in my humble opinion) fanned Governors Island, the South West point on New-York Island, together with the fresh water pond, for some grand and future good; all these seem subordinant to one another and cooperate to form that project under consideration, and to which I may add a fourth, but the public have already parted with that which I mean by Corre; here I cannot help observing a piece of negligence, that there has not been reserved for this growing city, a public common at least half a mile square and a public wood of the same dimension, within the vicinity of it. . . . posterity will feel the remissness of it and be obliged to purchase these conveniences at a dear rate, together with Governors Island, should we now sport it away for a trifling consideration. . . . A regular fortification on that Island I think will sooner or later become necessary, and which should be so constructed to command both the bay and the harbour, and large enough to contain five hundred men, conveniently lodged in casemates at a time of an invasion, besides two water batteries, one to be covered by a redoubt, the other with a ravelin and covered way, communicating with the main fort, and this is all the fortification I think necessary upon the Island. Now if we go upon the true principle of fortification, it will appear upon approved maxims, that no building of any kind whatever is admitted within musket shot of a fortress, this being the case, little or none of the Island can be spared for sale, besides respect must be paid that [in] a fortress which contains a garrison, there must be ground reserved sufficient for a hospital, burying ground, and powder house to supply the garrison with, and exercise the troops upon; however, should the legislature think it necessary that a part of the Island should be sold, I would then recommend that part to be sold which lies east of the line I have drawn across the Island in my map. But if I am allowed to extend my idea, this state of the United States will have to purchase the same ground again for the marine department, because from the nature and situation of this post, New-York must and will become the ground source of a navy should ever a fabric of that kind take place in the United States.”—Daily Advertiser, Apr. 2, 1794.

Joseph Corre, who for two years has been proprietor of the City Tavern at 115 Broadway, thanks the public for past favours, and “wishes their continuance at No. 28 Wall Street, at the State Arms, opposite the Coffee House.”—Daily Advertiser, Je, 10, 1788. Corre had been a pastry-cook, and later moved from Haugeboom Street, in 1788, and had married Smith (William) S. where he maintained “The Confectionary & New York Hotel.”—N. T. Packet, My 30, 1788. Here, in addition to dinners or suppers and “ice-cream every day,” he undertook to supply captains of vessels with pickled oysters, “portable” soup, preserved milk, etc. In 1798, he opened Columbia Garden at State and Pearl Sts. (see My 5, 1798), which he maintained for upwards of 40 years.

The vestry of Trinity Church resolves “That the Corporation will begin the Rebuilding of Trinity Church upon the Plan proposed by Doctor Bard & delineated by Mr. Robinson subject to such Alterations as this Board may hereafter think proper.”—Trinity Min. (MS.). In Vol. 1, p. 414, an error was made in dating this resolution “June 11, 1778”; it was correctly given, however, on p. 418, Vol. I (g. v.).

The common council orders that a contract be entered into with James Morell and others who bid £25 for filling in the White Hall Slip.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 379.

Joshua Hornblower is paid £73 for attendances & examining & making Report of the fire for the West Side of the City, which shall be erected in 1795.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 380. Hornblower’s petition had been under consideration since Jan. 30, 1786 (g. v.). A constitutional convention assemblies at Poughkeepsie to deliberate and decide on the form of federal government recommended by the general convention at Philadelphia, Sept. 17, 1787. The debates were taken down in shorthand, and pub. by Francis Childs, New York, 1798; see reprint, Poughkeepsie, 1905. The commissioners for rebuilding Trinity Church advertise for proposals for removing the ruins of the church, by taking down the walls as low as the sills of the windows all around; taking down the walls of the chanced to a level with the ground; cleaning the stones and piling them within the walls; and removing all useless rubbish.—Daily Advertiser, Je, 18, 1788. Parts of the walls had been pulled down in 1784 (q. u.). See also, VI 8, Ag, 7, and D 17, 1788.

The common council orders that the recorder prosecute persons guilty “of any Intrusions on the Common Lands by digging & carrying off Clay or Stones;” also to commence suits for the recovery of lands illegally possessed.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 380-81.

The common council, after considering a report on necessary improvements to the Fly Market, resolves “that the Sewer be continued to the South side of front Street—that a Bullhead be laid across the Slip at the South side of front Street & that proper Blocks or Wings be laid in the Slip to extend 64 feet beyond the South side of front Street for the purpose of supporting a Market which may be erected at the Expanse of the Neighborhood.” The committee is authorised to have the work executed by contract, provided it does not cost more than £500.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 381. See D 31.

The common council orders “that the Stable, in the Goal Yard, which is become offensive to the prisoners be removed from its present Situation to the Alm’s House Stable.”—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 381. See, further, S 29, 1795.

To accompany with a common council order of June 26, ordinances are passed this month to regulate Lumber, Auchmuty (Recto- r), and Oliver Pasty Streets in the West Ward, and to pave Greenwich Street and the intermediate slips from Cortlandt to Barclay Street.—M. C. G. (1784-1813), I: 381, 384, 387.

Samuel B. Webb, writing from New York to Miss Catharine Hesgoboom (whom he afterwards married), states: This morning at 1 o’clock an express arrived from Virginia with the important news of that State having adopted the proposed Constitution; at the dawning of the day all the Bells of the City began and rung for four hours, at the sound rising we were Saluted with Ten Twenty-four pounders which made noise sufficient to awaken the most drowsy, in short the whole day has been devoted to amusements.”—Correspondence and Journals of S. B. Webb, HI: 110. See also JI 52.
CHRONOLOGY: THE RECONSTRUCTION PERIOD: 1783-1812

July 2

The common council directs that the treasurer dispose at auction of "the Ferries across the North River to Hoobock & other places to the Northward," the boats to have "the Right in Common with each other of landing at any part of the Corporation Wharfs or slips north of Cortlandt Slip."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 382.

An ordinance is passed "to alter & amend Queen Street from King's Wall Street" (M. C. G., 1784-1831, I: 385); and it is resolved that an ordinance be prepared to regulate and pave William Street (Ibid., I: 385).

The commissioners for rebuilding Trinity Church advertise for proposals for digging a trench for a new foundation, taking up the old foundation from the surface of the ground downward, cleaning the stones, laying a new foundation, and carrying up the walls as high as the footings. The ground plan can be seen at Mr. Cruger's, No. 5, Stone St.—Daily Adv., Jul 8, 1838. See Je 18.

The trustees of the First Presbyterian Church inquire into the expense of enclosing "the New Church Yard" (of the Brick Church) with "a Substantial paled Fence."—Proc. of the Trustees (MS.), Vol. II. On Nov. 11, the committee of repairs reported that the fence had been completed.—Ibid.

As a result of the order of June 26, prohibiting the digging and carrying away of clay from the Common Lands, John Campbell, a potter, complains to the common council that, unless he is permitted "to procure Clay there his Manufacturing of Pasties must cease." A committee is appointed to make inquiries and report.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 384.

John Smiley, tavern-keeper, is paid £1918:5 by the city for the use of his house and rooms.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 384. The tavern stood at the n. w. cor. of Nassau and Wall Sts.

The treasurer has "disposed of the Several Ferries across the North River," on leases, at specified terms, the ferries being "Hoobock," "Weehaack," "Bulls Ferry," and "Fort Lee."—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 385. See also "Hoboken Ferry" in L. M. R. III: 442.

An open letter, addressed to the "Mayor and Corporation" of the city, and signed "Civis," protests against the proposal to have streets paved at the expense of the proprietors of houses. Some of the streets need paving; but, on the other hand, "most of the proprietors of houses in this city are Whigs," who "were refugees in the country, during the war," and who "came back very poor," many being obliged "to borrow money to repair their houses." To them the proposed improvement would be a great hardship.—N. Y. Jour., Jul 14, 1788.

H. Ivers advertises cables for sale "at Ivers' Rope-walk at the head of Mulberry Street, the first lefthand turn above the Tea Water Pump."—The N. Y. Jour. and Daily Patriotic Reg., Jul 15. The rope-walk, shown on PL Va, New-York, 1786.

"In pursuance of the Laws of this State entitled "An Act authorizing the Corporation of the City of New York to remove the Statue therein mentioned." (see Mr 7), the common council appoints a committee "to remove the remains of Pitts Statue from Wall Street" and "deposit the same in some safe place [see Ag 3, 1811] until the further Order of this Board."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 386. Payment of £50 for this was made to George Cooman on Nov. 19.—Ibid., I: 418. Stevens, in his Progress of N. Y. in a Century, 14-15, erroneously gives 1787 as the date of removal.

The common council orders that Mr. Bancier and Mr. Goerck "he directed to make an exact survey of the Water Lots from Coleslers Hook to White Hall."—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 386.

The federal ship "Hamilton" is launched "amidst the acclamations of a large concourse of citizens."—N. Y. Packet, Jul 18.

A gentleman, who was present at the fall of the federal ship, when she was launched, in which fall she bilged, and the right arm of Col. Hamilton (the head of the ship) holding the constitution, broken off, exclaimed, "gentlemen, there is certainly room for amendments."—N. Y. Jour., Jul 24, 1788. This refers to the decision in the Convention at Poughkeepsie regarding necessary amendments to the Federal Constitution.—Ibid.

The order of procession for the parade which is to take place on July 23 in honour of the Constitution of the United States is published in the newspapers. At eight o'clock in the morning, ten guns will be fired, and the procession will form in the Park and march "Down Broadway to Great Dock-street, thence through Hanover-square, Queen, Chatham, Division and Avondale-streets; and from thence through Bull-couly-street to Bayard's house." All trades and professions are to be represented in the parade, with a band of music near the head of the line. Forrester in frocks, carrying axes, "Columbus in his ancient dress, on horseback," and the Federal ship "Hamilton," are among the leading features announced. Richard Pratt is chairman of the committee of arrangements, and is to wear "a blue coat, red sash, and white feather tipped with black." His 13 assistants "will each be clad in a uniform white coat with blue cap and sash, wear a white feather tipped with blue, and carry a speaking trumpet." The question of ratifying the Federal Constitution is still under debate at Poughkeepsie.—N. Y. Packet, Jul 21, 1788. Numbers of "The Federalist" (see O 27, 1787) are appearing regularly in the Packet.

The parade is held in honour of the Constitution of the United States. It is an expression of "the animated joy of the citizens of New York, Federal Constitution was submitted by a sufficient number of states to make it operative," to demonstrate that the pleasure "had pervaded all ranks and degrees of the community." The object of exultation was not the ratifying by any one particular state, but "the already present existence of an era in the history of man, great, glorious and unparalleled, which opens a variety of new sources of happiness, and unbounded prospects of national prosperity." The costumes and implements of many mechanical trades were featured. Banners elaborately painted bore symbols and mettces appropriate to the several trades and the celebration. During the procession, the cabinet-makers, on a platform drawn by horses, constructed a candle and table. The blacksmiths, likewise, forged an anchor; and the sailmakers made sails. A printing-press complete, with case, and other typographical implements, and with compositors and pressmen at work, struck off hundreds of copies of a song and an ode, which were distributed among the multitude by Mr. A. M'Lean. These were published in the N. Y. Packet, Jul 25, and Aug 5, 1788. There is a copy of this broadside in the N. Y. H. S. It is entitled Ode for the Federal Procession Upon the Adoption of the New Government. Composed by Mr. L. * and is printed within an ornamental border having the arms of the State of New York at the top. Regarding the butchers' display, see De Voe's Market Book, 316-17. The painted banner carried by the Society of Pewterers is now owned by the N. Y. Hist. Soc.

The "Federal Ship Hamilton," moving near the centre of the procession, was "A Frigate of thirty-two guns, twenty-seven feet keel, and ten feet beam, with galleries and everything complete and in proportion, both in hull and rigging; manned with upwards of thirty seamen and marines, in their different uniforms; Commanded by Commodore Nicholson, and drawn by ten horses." The interesting evolutions and salutes of this vessel, at the Fields, along Broadway, opposite the fort (where the president and members of congress reviewed the parade), and at other points in the line of march, were graphically described in the newspapers of the day.—Ibid., Aug 5, 1788. "The ship made a fine appearance, sailing with flowing sheets, and full sails, down Broadway, the canvas waves dancing against her sides, the wheels of the carriage concealed."—N. Y. Jour., Jul 24, 1788.

The procession followed the line of march already announced (see Jul 23), "to the parade des fêtes champêtre, where two ballocks and a mutton had been roasted whole, for their regale, together with hams, &c. &c. These were served upon ten extensive tables, which were prepared for the purpose, and which projected, in direct angles, from one common centre, where was situated, a little elevated, the seat of Congress and civil and legislative magistrates, strangers of distinction, &c. who had a complete view of the ten seats; the seats were all encircled with eavars, which, in some measure, screened the guests from the rain, which, unluckily fell at different periods of the day."—Ibid. For view of this table, as sketched by David Grim at "Bunker Hill," see Man. Cen. Cen. (1850), opp. p. 570.

In the evening a very ingenious transparent piece of painting, representing general Washington, to the life, was exhibited by Mr. Wright, in Maiden Lane, which attracted the attention and admiration of many citizens, particularly the fair.

There was also exhibited, at the corner of Wall-street, enclosed in a circle of about two feet in diameter, thirteen stars, ten of which were brilliant [that being the number of states which had ratified the Constitution]; one (designed for New-York) half illuminated; and two almost obscure, with the initials of North-Carolina and Rhode-Island."—Ibid.
In the evening also, the printers, book-sellers and book-binders of the city, who had attended the procession, "assembled at the house of Mr. W. [Cornelis] Bradford," with good humor, harmony and social glee. "Toasts were drunk to "The Day;" to Congress; to "His Excellency Benjamin Franklin, the venerable Printer;" to Washington, Hamilton, Knox; to the liberty of the press; and to "a speedy adoption of the new Constitution."—N. Y. Packet, Jl 25, 1788.

William A. Duer stated in 1849: "all similar celebrations since attempted have proved but feeble imitations" of it. He described the procession in detail, mentioning many citizens who participated.

In July 30, John Randolph, writing to his father on July 30 about the celebration held on this day, said: "You have doubtless... received Accounts of the Adoption of the new Constitution... of the States, the Majority consisting of five only [see Jl 23]. On Wednesday 26th [error for 23d] Inst. (4 days previous to our hearing of the ratification of this State) there was a very great Procession in this city (on account of its being received by ten States) which proceeded from the plain before Bridewell down Broadway thro' Wall Street and by the way of Great Queen Street process and the Federal Green, Hill where there were tables set for more than [than] five thousand people to Dine—two Ozen were roasted whole and several cows and Sheep. I shall assure my dear Sir it put me in mind of the great Preparations which were made, in Dzo Quixotea, for the wedding of Camachy the rich and the fair Quiteria—there were tables set out to represent the ten States which had acceded... Of all which we sat down together and the sticks of a Fan; where they joined, were seated all the Congress with the president in the middle. The Procession was very beautiful and well conducted. Every trade and profession had a Colour emblematical of it. the chief of the Bakers were drawn on a stage on which they seen mixing their bread; the apprentices all in white followed with ready baked Cakes. The Cooper followed with a barrel and the blacksmiths follow with a knee under the arm of each. next came the Brewers bringing hogsheads of beer along with a little Bacckus astride a Cask holding a large Goblet in his hand—It would require to much time for me to tell you of all the different occupations but to the honor of New York be it spoken that among 8000 people who were said to have dined together on the green there was not a single Drunken Man or fight to be seen."—From original letter in Enemott Coll., No. 958a.

The convention of the state of New York, at Poughkeepsie, votes unanimously in favour of adopting the report of the committee-of-the-whole, ratifying the federal constitution, but proposing various amendments. On July 26, the engrossed declaration of rights, on which the ratification was based, passed again, by a divided vote, and it was ordered that it be signed and that The Journal of the Convention was published by Nicholas Power, at Poughkeepsie, "a few rods East from the Court-house."—See copy in the N. Y. P. L. The resolution in its final form appeared in the N. Y. Packet, Ag 1, 1788. See also Winer, VII: 250, 259.

At about 9 o'clock in the evening there arrived "the joyful tidings of the adoption of the New Constitution, at Poughkeepsie, on Friday, July 25. The bells in the City were immediately set a ringing, and from the Fort and the Federal Ship Hamilton, were fired several salutes. The Merchants at the Coffee House testified their joy by repeated huzzas; and a large body of citizens, headed by a number of the first characters, went to the houses of the members of the Convention, and gave three cheers, as a testmony of their approbation of the glorious Event brought about by their united, unremitted, and toilsome exertions.—In short, a general joy ran through the whole city..."—Supplement extraordinary to the Independent Journal, July 28, 1788 (broadside in the N. Y. Pub. Library); N. Y. Packet, Jl 29, Ag 1, 1788.

Samuel B. Webb, writing on July 27 to Miss Heegeboon, said: "...The Mail brought us the pleasing intelligence of our Convention at New York having adopted the New Constitution.—It was received with unusual marks of Joy; every class of Citizens turned out, Bells rang; Cannon fired, fireworks were displayed and the Federal Ship (which is now posted in the Broad-Way near Bowling Green) was handsomely illuminated, the whole night was spent in loud acclamations of Joy, and continued until past 8 o'clock this morning—indeed I was afraid that Sunday would not bring them on their usual steadiness. The whole however passed over without anything improper taking place, until about two hours after the morning. Mr. Greenleaf, the Printer, has insulst the City at large by several impertinent publications,—and during the time of their moving round in a body, they stood at the house where he keeps his printing press—they broke into the house & I am told destroyed his Types; he fled,—This is the only instance in which the least unjustifiable act has been committed & I trust shall hear no more of its..."—Corresp. and Jour. of S. B. Webb, III: 112-13.

In a letter from New York on July 30, John Randolph wrote to his father: "On Saturday the 27th [error for 26th] Inst. news arrived of the Constitution's being adopted [by New York State] a party of Federalists as they called themselves went to the house of Mr. Greenleaf printer of the patriotic registers and after beating his windows and thrown away his Types much to their discredit went to the Governor's where they gave three hisses [and] beat the rogue's march around the house they proceeded to the houses of the Federals (as they call them) and gave three cheers."—From original in Enemott Coll., No. 958a.

The last issue of The N. Y. Journal and Daily Patriotic Register (see N. Y. Journal and Daily Patriotic Register) appears as a daily. Greenleaf's weekly paper is continued under the title The N. Y. Journal and Patriotic Register...—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 449. See also issue of July 31. On Aug. 7, the editor, Thomas Greenleaf, gave the reasons for the change. Certain paragraphs were printed in the Register of the 24th of July, to which objection was taken by some of the public; a handbill, beseeching the citizens, was circulated, and it was finally stated that copies from Greenleaf's shop. These induced a mob, late on the evening of the 26th, to break into his house and shop, plunder a quantity of types, and leave the office in a ruined condition.—Ibid, Ag 7, 1788. See My 4, 1790.

It is ordered by the common council that the treasurer and three commissioners of the almshouse and bridewell be authorised to negotiate a loan at the bank "of as much Money as may from time to time be required to defray the Expenses of the Alms House & Bridewell until the collection of the Tax to be raised for their support shall render it unnecessary, not to exceed the whole Sum of $700."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 357.

The commissioners appointed to appraise that part of Wall Street between city hall and Queen Street prepare a list, bearing this date, showing each proprietor's name, the width of his lot, and the levy proposed for paving in front of his property. The owners and lot widths are as follows:

Civil Liberty the Glory of Man.

Original Address to the Sons of Liberty.

The uncertainties which occur in political as well as in civil life, are indelibly recorded in the annals of human affairs and confirmed by the all-seeing eye of the Great Spirit, by whose Providence we exist, and have become a Great and Free People.

Be it therefore remembered, that in consequence of encroachments on our inherent rights, by edicts from foreign lands, it has become indispensably necessary that our Independence, so recently and so dearly obtained by our fathers and our brothers, in the glorious but brief conspiracy, Way of the Revolution, is in danger of being temporarily disturbed. In order therefore to maintain the maximization of those blessings so dearly purchased in the glorious and indubitable War of the Revolution, a resolution is hereinafter introduced.

AMERICAN LIBERTY is the rallying point of freedom; is indispensably necessary to be established for the preservation and perpetuity of those blessings which through Divine Providence we now enjoy; and have judged ourselves to transmit unimpaired down to our latest posterity the preceding brief outline, exclusive of a series of...

minor causes, being seriously and deeply reflected on, by a few genuine Sons of Liberty, whose Patriotic Virtue, Fortitude, and Perseverence, eventually, after years of opposition surmounted all difficulties. Resolved to establish the contemplated Institution, and to call it Tammany Society of Columbian Order.

The total assessment is $120,922. From original report in city clerk’s record-room. See also M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 359.

The common council passes an ordinance for paving “front or first street” from Old Slip to Fly Market Slip; Water St. from Wall St. to the Fly Market, and King St. “from the Cellar Door of Henry Waddingtons Store to the East River.”—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 359.

The commissioners for rebuilding Trinity Church advertise for proposals for carpenters’ work and materials; “for bringing under cover, inclining and finishing the outside of Trinity Church, compleat, including the porch, in front, the columns and arch within the Church;” also, “for building the Steeple, on a base of twenty-four feet square;” and “for cutting the stone that may be wanting for the above building.” A plan of the church may be seen at Mr. Rogers’, No. 35 Queen St.—Daily Adv., Aug 7, 13, 1788.

In a petition of this date to the common council, the freeholders and landholders of estates in and near King George Street state that “upwards of two years ago” this street “was surveyed in order that the same might be levelled and paved;” that part of it has been dug out, and other parts “remain totally neglected,” so that the street is “impassable with a Carriage.” They ask that the street be dug out and finished without delay, so that they will have “a convenient passage from the head of Queen Street directly through William Street, a place of considerable trade.”—From original petition (in metal file No. 8, city clerk’s record-room), endorsed “read Aug 20th 1788.” It is referred to the alderman and assistant of Montgomerie Ward.—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 391. For location of King George St., see Plate 18. It was the northern extension of William St., north of Frankfort St.

John Harrison and Stephen Purdy, Jr. shorten the title of their paper (see My 17) to The Impartial Gazetteer.—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 442; Early Newspapers, II: 420. The title was changed to The Impartial Gazetteer, and Saturday Evening Post. The last issue with this title was that of Sept. 13.—Brigham, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 442; Early Newspapers, II: 420.

The vestry of Trinity Church requests “Dr. Johnston” (Hon. Wm. Samuel Johnson, LL.D., president of Columbia College) “to prepare an Inscription for a Corner Stone to be placed by the Bishop in the foundation of Trinity Church.” The commissioners appointed to build the church are directed to arrange for the ceremony of laying the corner-stone, giving $70 as a Compliment to the Masons.”—Trin. Min. (M.S.).

A gale from the south-east, “attended by a sudden swell of the sea,” drives the water over the wharves and into the streets and cellars. Parts of the facing of the Battery are torn away, “a considerable extent of solid stone work, seven feet in thickness,” being totally demolished.—Daily Adv., Aug 20, 1788.

The common council orders an advertisement published for proposals for removing the leaky copper roof of the city hall, and covering the building with cedar shingles.—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 391–392, 117, 222–23; and see Aug 27; Daily Adv., S 5, 1788.

The common council appoints a committee to treat with a committee of Trinity corporation “on the Subject of the Triangular piece of Ground at the junction of the Post & Blooming Dale Roads” (see Mr 12).—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 392. See, further, Je 17, 1789.

Payment of $25 on account is made “towards filling up the White Hall Slip;” $65 “for erecting Bulkheads across Cortlandt & Ellis’s Slip;” and $59 “for filling up Vesey Slip.”—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 391.

A committee of the common council is appointed to attend to “new Roofing the City Hall.”—M. C. G. (1784–1781), I: 394. The News, Ibid., No. 170, July 1788, recorded that Mr. Simmons, a member of the Committee of Robinson, was accepted.—Ibid., I: 397. See Aug 20.

The common council advances to Van Zandt & Janeway $100 “towards purchasing Materials for repairing the City Hall.”—Ibid., I: 397.

A meeting of the Society for the Relief of Distressed Debtors is held at the tavern of John Simmons, and adopts resolutions to earnestly request the clergy of the city to preach charity sermons for promoting the work of the society, whose funds are “totally exhausted.” They represent that there are several debtors in prison who have “no other Subsistence” than that derived from the society, and that a quantity of fire wood will be necessary during the ensuing winter for the prisoners, which “might be purchased at present, at a very low Rate.”—N. Y. Jour., Ja 1, 1789.

After repeated discussion regarding the place where congress 13 Congress should meet under the Constitution (Philadelphia, Lancaster, Baltimore, Wilmington, and Annapolis), congresses having been considered at various times since July 28), the following resolution is finally agreed to: “That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several states, which, before the said day, shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective states, and vote for a president; and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time, and the present seat of Congress [New York City] the place for commencing the proceedings under the said Constitution.”—Jour. of Cong. (ed. of 1821), IV: 867; Winzer, VII: 265. See also broadside in N. Y. P. L. (Early 659). Congress had been sitting in New York since 1787 (p. 79).

The mayor lays before the common council the act of congress (see S 13) appointing New York the city for the meeting of the general government of the United States under the new Constitu-

It is thereupon resolved that "the whole of the City Hall shall be appropriated for the accommodating of the General Government . . . and that this Board will provide for the present by a change of putting the same in proper order & Repair." A committee is appointed "to consult the Delegates of this State in Congress" and others, and report "what Alterations & Repairs are necessary." The same committee is also directed to "examine the Exchange & report what Repairs it will require to render it convenient for the accommodation of the Courts of Justice & Meeting of the Corporation of this City."—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 398-99. For the report of this committee, see S 30 and O 7.

A petition of John Byvanck and others that Burling's Slip "may be filled up & Front Street continued across it" is referred to a committee of the common council.—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 399. The committee on the McAdam petition reported on Oct. 25, "and therewith Mr. John Stagg together with Ewen Backhouse, &c. to Mr. McAdam, City surveyor were appointed to survey that part of the Broadway which hath lately been regulated & paved & to report to the Board such Plan . . . for the better regulation of the said Street as they may conceive most effectual for removing the Difficulties complained of."—Ibid., I: 412-13. See, further, O 27.

The name of The Imperial Gastronome and Saturday Evening Post (see Ag 26, changed to The New-York Weekly Museum.—Brigman, A. A. S. Proc. (1917), 507; Early Newspapers, II: 420. See My 7, 1791.

The ship "America," intended for the India trade, is launched at the ship-yards. The builder is Ebenezer Young—N. T. Packet, S 23, 1788.

Elias Burton, Jr., is paid £100 on account "towards building the Wharf in Fly Market Slip."—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 403.

The meeting of the common council at the city hall on this day is the last held there, owing doubtless to the alterations in the building for the accommodation of congress.—See M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 403, 404 et seq. The place of meeting was changed, evidently, to Simmons' tavern, pending the necessary repairs at the exchange. Simmons was paid, on Dec. 31, £171 14/ for "the Use of his Room fire, Canrels &c."—Ibid., I: 412.

The brigade commanded by Gen. Malcolm is inspected by the adjutant-general. It then marched to the vacant grounds of Ald. Bayard, and was reviewed by Maj.-Gen. Baron de Steuben, who was so well pleased with its military appearance and behaviour, and particularly with the evolutions and manoeuvres, which were performed "with great promptitude and exactness by the legionary troops under the command of Colonel Lewis," that, after the review, he addressed the commanding officers of the different corps, saying (in part): " . . . Whilst the militia of New-York continue to be animated by the patriotic sentiments which have led you to these exertions, they will prove a perpetual nursery of good soldiers and virtuous citizens."—Daily Adv., O 1, 1788.

The committee appointed Sept. 17 in connection with alterations to the city hall for the accommodation of the general government reports that it has procured a plan, executed by Major L'Enfant, for the necessary additions, alterations, and repairs, which they recommend to the common council. A number of citizens having "by voluntary Subscriptions engaged to advance the Monies necessary for the said Buildings & Repairs in expectation of being reimbursed by a Grant from the Legislature or a Tax on the Citizens," and they having nominated five commissioners—Robert Watts, Alexander McCombs (Macomb), Major L'Enfant, James Nicholson, and William Maxwell—"to purchase the Materials & superintend the said Business," the common council approves of the proceedings, "So that no Charge be made on this Corporation for any Part of the Expenses."—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 404. See also descrip. of Frontstipe III, I: 538.

The alterations at the city hall are begun.—N. Y. Packet, Mr 6, 1789.

The committee of the common council which was appointed on Sept. 17 to determine what repairs and alterations were needed in the city hall for the accommodation of congress, and in the exchange "for the accommodation of the Courts of Justice & Meeting of the Corporation of this City," now makes its report regarding the change (the details of which are not entered in the Minutes), and the board orders that the committee "direct the repairs necessary to be made in the most economical & expeditious manner."—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 407. On Oct. 14, £100 was paid, on account, for these repairs, and on Nov. 9, another £500 was advanced.—Ibid., I: 418. For description of the finished "Federal Edifice" see J. B. 1789.

The common council orders that the hay scales at the end of the Bear Market, which have been obstructing the street, be removed into the passage leading behind the market.—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 408; De Voe, Market Book, 310-21. The Bear Market is shown on a Bancker plan in N. Y. P. L. (box R-W, folders V & W).

It is also ordered that a room be provided "in the Vicinity of the City Hall for the accommodation of the City Watch until the Repairs making to the City Hall are completed."—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 408.

The programme of military review for the day comprehends an inspection of Col. Bauman's regiment of artillery in the fort by the adjutant-general; and a review by the governor in the fields of the event of the light horse under command of Capt. Stake, a brigade company of artillery under Capt. Van Dyke, and two companies of light infantry under Capt. Stagg and Swartwout. The regiment of artillery will display fireworks at the fort in the evening.—Daily Adv., O 9, 1788.

A petition from various citizens is read in the common council, showing that they are anxious to accommodate them so as to have the Courts of Justice for this Country, and other meetings, were about to remove to the Exchange in the South Ward, they are anxious to accommodate them as far as lies in their power. That pursuant to this Intention, and apprehensive that the Market, now held under that Building, may at certain Seasons of the Year, be offensive to those Honourable Bodies, they are anxious this evil should be obviate. That for this purpose they respectfully propose that a Market place should be built on the Long Bridge in the same Ward. That its dimensions should be one hundred and thirty feet in length, and twenty feet in breadth. They are willing to build it at their own expense. They observe that the place designated by them is much superior for such a Market to any in the City.—That it is necessary for the Albany and other Trade.—That the site from the situation of the place, is at all times most favorable for the Burgesses, Staten Island, and other places near those situations.—That its vicinity to different ferries render it exceedingly commodious to passengers, necessary to travellers, and convenient to all. . . . That to erect a Market in any of the Streets now unoccupied will darken, obstruct and injure the City: But that the Long Bridge which is already taken up by Oyster Men and others only tends to increase the Dirt, without benefitting the Ins among other Individuals. They therefore ask that they may be allowed to build the market at the Long Bridge.—From the original petition, in record-room, city clerk's office, with endorsement showing that the committee to whom it was referred reported favourably. On Oct. 17, the common council agreed to permit the petitioners to erect, at their own expense, a market-house in the street leading from the exchange to the river.—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 406, 410; L. M. R. K., III: 938. This was the fourth and last public market-place established in Broad St.—De Voe, Market Book, 370.

The public whippers, Joseph Shelly, receives £25 a year, payable quarterly.—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 411, 414.

A number of the officers of "the late American Army," and a few gentlemen of distinction, dine together at the Coffee-House, "in commemoration of the two great events that took place in the late war—the surrender of Saratoga, the 17th October, 1777, and that at York-Town, on the 19th October, 1781."—Daily Adv., O 22, 1788. Those who expected to attend the dinner had previously been requested "to give in their names at the Coffee-House Bar."—Ibid., O 16, 1788.

The committee is appointed to direct the Bridewell to be more effectually secured so as to prevent escapes.—M. C. C. (1784-81), I: 412.

It is said "that the alterations and additions now making to the city hall will, when completed, render it the most elegant and commodious building for a legislative body in the United States. . . . The readiness with which the citizens entered into a subscription for defraying the expense" shows that they "are sensible of the honor" conferred on them by congress; and "the expedition with which the work is carried on, is a sufficient proof of our public spirit and ardent attachment to the federal cause."

— N. T. Jour., O 23, 1788.

24 The First Regiment of militia, commanded by Maj. Henry Rutgers, receives a new standard, on which the arms of the state are painted, and is reviewed by Gen.-Gen. Malcolm.—N. T. Packet, O 28, 1788.

27 Trinity vestry passes a resolution requesting the bishop to present the thanks of the corporation "to Mr L'Enfant [see Je 18, 1787] for his great Attention & Services respecting the Monument of General Montgomery which has been erected at St. Paul's Church under his Direction, in a Manner that reflects Honor upon his Taste, and has given universal Satisfaction."—Trin. Min.
(M.S.).

The commissioners appointed to survey that part of Broadway which has lately been regulated and paved (between Rector St. and "Verlettingham" Hill) report a profile of the existing surface of the roadway. The common council passes a resolution making specified amendments in the grade; and orders that John Stagg be employed "to take up and Repave the Broadway and Verlettin-

The recorder then moves, according to notice given, "that John McComb [Sr] be removed from his Office [as city surveyor].
"It is improper for him," say they, "to be employed at the Trade of a Mason, employed in Building Houses for Individuals should be longer employed in regulating the Public Streets and copy of the charges and notice of hearing, in reply to his petition that he might be heard.—Ibid., I: 415.

The last entries on the records of the congress of the Confeder-a are of this date.—Wissor, VII: 267.

25 In commemoration of the fifth anniversary of the evacuation by New York of the British, "the Artillery, Light Horse, Grenadiers and Infantry of Gen. Malcom's brigade under command of Major Christie" parade at noon, and exhibit "many beautiful and soldierly maneuvers."—Daily Advertiser, N 26, 1788.

After the parade by a detachment of the Legion, and the discharge of a salute from the fort, some of the officers and citizens repaired to the City Tavern where they spent the day, drinking many "patriotic and sentimental toasts." Other officers and citizens celebrate the day at West Bro'dard's, and there are "several other entertainments at different houses in the city, in honor of the day."—N. Y.
Packet, N 28, 1788.

The common council passes a resolution "that the Commissioners provide the necessary Tools & erect two Forges for the manufacturing of Nails by the Vagrant & other Prisoners from time to time confined in Bridewell."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 419.

For a later employment of the bridewell inmates, see My 18, 1812.

A standing committee of the common council is appointed to report "where more Lamps are necessary & wherever it can be done, that instead of Posts the Lamps are fixed to the Houses."—
M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 419. See, further, Mr 29, 1791.

The common council decides to borrow on the city's credit £5000 from the Bank of New York "to be applied towards the Repairs & additions making to the City Hall for the Accommodation of Congress;" and it is ordered that a promissory note for that sum be made out, payable in twelve months, and that it be sealed with the city seal, and signed by the recorder.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 420. See, further, Ja 7, 1789.

A balance of £104316 is paid to Elias Burger, Jr., "on Contract for building Wharl at the Fly Market."—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 420.

The twelfth session of the state legislature begins at Albany (see Je 1). The senate and assembly met there until July 16, 1789, when they New York City as their next meeting place.—
Assembly Journal (1788-89), 31 ibid. (1789), 3 27; Senate Journal (1788-89), 3 23; Ibid. (1789). They met in New York on Jan. 11, 1790 (q. e.).

An estimate, amounting to £16,453 8, of the money required to defray the city expenses for the coming year is approved by the common council, and a petition to the legislature for permission to raise the money by tax is adopted. The board also requests that the time of collection of taxes be altered from the winter to the summer.—M. C. C. (1784-1831), I: 421. See Ja 15, 1790.

The inhabitants of "Lumber Street" petition the common council for a well and pump and some lamps in that street. The petition is referred to the standing committee on lamps.—M. C. C.
(1784-1831), I: 421. The original of this petition (preserved in metal file No. 7, city clerk's record-room) shows the street designated as "Lombard Street." The petition argues that in its "obscure position" the street is rendered extremely dark and dangerous by the lack of lamps, and the entire city is endangered by the lack of a well, "since, should a fire happen in their Quarter (which consists of wooden Buildings), it might . . . easily extend itself."

The committee writes a favourable endorsement on the petition.

On Dec. 31, freemen complained to the common council that most of the public lamps at the time of the late fire at the House of Mr. Burling in Beacon's Street about 1 O'Clock at Night were gone out; and an inquiry was ordered. At the same time, the inhabitants of Herman St. asked that their street might be provided with "some of the public Lamps."—Ibid., I: 422.

Members of the association "for the relief of distressed Debtors confined in the Goal" (see Ja 26, 1787) address a memorial to the legislature, in which they say that from Jan. 2, 1787, to Dec. 3, 1788, there have been 1626 commitments to the goal for debt, 716 of which have been for amounts not exceeding £20; or less than £8. These are "deprived of the comfort of their families, prevented from the opportunity of obtaining the means of subsistence by their own industry, subjected to the danger arising from putrid and contagious diseases . . ., and liable to become useless if not pernicious members of society from . . . acquiring habits of intercourse . . . ." The memorialists contend that society is greatly endangered by confining debtors who owe small sums, because their labour is worth so much more than their debts; and they ask for a remedy through legislation.—From the memorial, in Mass.

The vestry of Trinity Church orders "that the Commissioners appointed to rebuild Trinity Church be directed to proceed towards completing the same until the Funds they are now possessed of, be

A meeting of the N. Y. Society Library members is held at the Coffee House, and trustees elected. Later, new conditions for membership were published.—N. Y. Morn. Post, Ja 7, 1792 (in Antiquarian Society Library, Worcester).

The sum already subscribed "for the building intended for the accommodation of Congress" amounted to £40,000. The room for the senate is nearly completed. The whole building will cost near £50,000, and will be 165 feet long.—Mass. Centinel (Boston), D 24, 1788.

John and Archibald McLean establish The New-York Daily Gazette as a successor to The Independent Journal.—Brigham,

The common council limits the size of a butcher's stall in the Fly Market to eight feet in length and three feet, six inches in width. The entire market floor is laid out by measure, with the exact location of passages, stalls, and cutting-blocks.—M. C. C.
(1784-1831), I: 423.

The value of articles produced by the State of New York for 1789, is estimated to be £70,000, the exports being valued at about £1,000,000 (N. Y. currency). The value of the exports from the city, for 1788, exclusive of articles of foreign manufacture, and other articles in the coastwise trade, is:

There is also published a comparative statement of the value

1765, and July 5, 1766, amounting to £277,146; those shipped from Philadelphia from April 5, 1765, to April 5, 1766, amounting to £492,616; and those exported from New York, from Jan. 1,

At this time, on the south side of Crown Street (the present Liberty Street), stood Livingston's sugar-house, adjoining the Middle Dutch Church, east of Nassau Street. "Built of stone, with five stories and a loft, pierced with three small windows on each floor on front, and five on the side, this structure remained for many years a monument to the sufferings of the American prisoners who had been inhumanly packed within its walls by the British."—Smith, The City of N. Y. in its Year of Washington's Inauguration, 1789 (N. Y., 1886), 36-37. The Rhinelander sugar-house, which had been erected by Bernard Cuyler in 1763, at the corner of the present Rose and Duane Streets, resembled it.—Ibid., 37; also see Mem. Hist., II: 454, 457.

The race-course, where the parade of the military companies was held, was "in the vicinity of the present junction of Division and Water Streets."—Ibid., 105.

The ferries across the Hudson were: Paulus Hook (Jersey City) ferry, from the foot of Cortlandt St.; Hobuck ferry, from the foot of Vesey St; Weehawken, Bull's, and Fort Lee ferries. Another ran from the foot of Whitehall St. to Elizabethtown. Those to Brooklyn were from the foot of the Fly Market stairs, and from Peck Slip.—Ibid., 106.

There were 22 churches in the city representing the following 13 denominations: Reformed Dutch, Protestant Episcopal, French Huguenot, Quaker, Lutheran, Jewish, Presbyterian, Baptist, Moravian, German Reformed, Methodist, Roman Catholic, and Independent Congregational.—Ibid., 125. This year the Methodists erected a second church, of stone, on Second (Forsyth) Street near the corner of Division St.—Ibid., 163. The new meeting-house of the Independent Congregational Church stood at the upper end of Great George St. For on the west side, a little below Leonard St.—Ibid., 164; Geerck-Mangin map of 1803, Pl. 70, Vol. I. About 1786, the Presbyterian congregation bought a lot on Nassau St., opposite the Middle Dutch Church, and erected a two-storey brick school-house, measuring 25 by 40 feet.—Knapp's Hist. of the Brick Church, 90, 201.

The legislature passes an act amending and repealing parts of the provincial ferry act of 1732. New ferry rates are established. The inhabitants of Brooklyn are permitted "to transport their own Goods, in their own Boats, from the Island of Nassau to the City of New-York, and from the City of New-York to the Island of Nassau, with paying any Ferriage for the same." This act in no way disturbs New York City's claim to the ferry privilege originally acquired.—Laws of N. Y. (1789), chap. 37 (Gene ed., 1789, II: 450). Cf. N. S. 1717; O 14, 1732.

Alexander Hamilton, in a letter dated simply "Tuesday," but evidently written on Tuesday, March 3, 1789, urges the mayor to convene the common council on this day, "to pass an act for appropriating the City Hall to the use of Congress," to publish such act in the papers, etc.—See Pl. 534, Vol. V, reproduced from the original in the collection of J. Pierpont Morgan, Esq., formerly in the collection of the late John D. Crimmins.

Such action is taken, the common council passing the following resolution: Whereas this Board did on the 17th Day of September last [p. 6] Resolve that the whole of the City Hall of this City be appropriated for the accommodation of the General Government of the United States And whereas the said Building hath been improved & repaired for the purpose Resolved that Mr Recorder be requested on behalf of this Board to communicate to the Congress of the United States the Substance of the said Resolution of the 17th September last in such manner as he shall deem most respectful & proper."—M. The proceedings of congress, beginning with the first session (under the Constitution) on this day, were published as separate journals for the two branches of congress, one entitled the Journal of the First Session of the Senate, and published here on Sunday; the other the Journal of the House of Representatives, published by Francis Childs and John Swaine, N. Y. (1789). The daily proceedings of the congress of the Confederation appeared in the Journal of the United States in Congress Assembled, printed by John Dunlap (Phila.).

The following address, signed by Wm. Mooney, chairman, is drawn up at a meeting of some of the founders of the Tammany Society: "The vicissitudes which occur in Political as well as in Civil life, are indelibly recorded in the Annals of Human affairs, and confirmed by the all seeing Eye of the Great Spirit; by whose Providence we exist, and have become a Great & Free People."

"It is therefore remembered, that in consequence of encroachments on our inherent rights, by adventurers from Foreign lands, it has become imminently apparent that our Independence, so recently and so dearly obtained by our Fathers and our Brothers, in the Glorious but cruel sanguinary War of the Revolution, is in danger of being temporarily disturbed. In order therefore to counteract the machinations of those Slaves, and Agents of foreign Despots;—A Great National Institution, founded on the basis of American Liberty as the rallying point of Freeman, is indispensably necessary to be established, for the preservation and perpetuity of those blessings which through Divine Providence we now enjoy, and have pledged ourselves to transmit unimpaired down to our latest posterity. The preceding brief outlines exclusive of a series of minor causes, being seriously and deeply reflected on, by a few genuine Sons of Liberty, whose Patriotic Virtue, Parditude and Patriotism actually, after those oppositions suffered and those difficulties, Resolved to establish the contemplated Institution, and to call it Tammany Society or Columbian Order."—From bound photostats (made from originals in Tammany Hall) in MSS. Div., N. Y. P. L.

There had been a Tammany Society in New York in 1787 (q.v., Ap 30 and May 1), but the organization makes its reemergence from 1789 as the year of its establishment. The birthday of its patron was celebrated on May 22 (q.v.), and its constitution was adopted on Aug. 10 (q.v.), of this year.

To this Washington replied on March 15: "I shall make it a point to take hired lodgings or rooms in a tavern until some house can be provided. Because it would be wrong, in my real judgment, to impose such a burden on any private family, as must unavoidably be occasioned by my company; and because I think it would be generally expected, that, being supported by the public at large, I should not be burdensome to individuals." He adds that his reception in New York will be most congenial to his feelings if it is "a quiet and business manner of ceremony, be such as shall not occasion any expense to the New-Yorkers, but shall be in such manner that they shall take pleasure in entertaining me, and shall be supplied with all that they can afford my use."—The Writings of Washington (Ford ed.), XI: 375. See also Mr. 30.

As a quorum is not yet present for the congress to transact business, it is agreed that a circular will be written to the absent members, requesting their immediate attendance.—Annals of Congress (Gales ed.), I: column 16.

The committee appointed on Dec. 10, 1788 (M. C. G., 1784-1831, I: 421), to ascertain how the Brooklyn ferry can be disposed of so as best to promote public convenience and the city's revenue, makes its report to the common council. It is decided to rent the ferry-house and other buildings at Brooklyn independently.—Ibid., I: 434. At the next meeting, March 18, it was further resolved to license six persons to operate a large and a small boat each, the large one to carry heavy freight and passengers and the small one to carry light freight and passengers. Four of the large and four of the small boats were to "ply to & from the ferry from the City and the Corporation Ferry Stairs at Brooklyn," and two of the large and two of the small boats were to "ply to & from the Stairs at Pecks Slip & the Corporation Ferry Stairs at Brooklyn." The boats, masts, and sails, were to be "of such Form & Dimensions as the Water, & the Port of New York, shall approve," and the boat was to be "constantly worked and managed by two sober & discreet able bodied & experienced Water Men." Each boat was to be furnished with "four good Oars & two Boat Hooks." The boats were "all numbered," and "the Name of the Owner and the number of each Boat" were to be "painted on the inside of the Stern of the Boat easily to be seen." Ferry rates were already established. Horned cattle were not to be "taken off or landed by any of the said Boats at any Place in this City to the Westward of the City, except a Slip in Green-Wood, N. Y. and ferry-boats plying to and from the Ferry Market Slip was to pay to the city treasurer $7 per month; and each one licensed to ply to and from Pecos Slip $1.00 per month. Anyone in default ten days after the time appointed, or contravening any of the laws or ordinances relating to ferries, was to forfeit his license.—Ibid., I: 435.

See also the Daily Advertiser, Mar. 24, 1789.; see, further, Ap 1, 1789.

When no additional members appeared, it was agreed that another circular should be written to eight of the nearest absent members, particularly desiring their attendance, in order to form a quorum.—Annals of Congress (Gales ed.), I: column 16.

The recent enlargement of the Ferry Market proving insufficient, the common council appoints a committee to report a plan for a suitable addition and directs the ways and means committee to carry it into effect.—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 436.

The common council directs the clerk to advertise for proposals for "keeping the Ferries from this City to Powls Hook & Hoback" for the term of three years from May 1.—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 456-7. On April 25 John Holdren's offer of $30 per annum for the former, and John Stevens' offer of $60 per annum for the latter, being the highest bids, the board appointed a committee to confer with them to find out if they would offer more if the term were lengthened.—Ibid., I: 444. On April 27 Holdren offered $80 for six years; but the first proposal of $50 for three years was finally accepted.—Ibid., I: 448.

The common council appoints a committee "to treat with Mr. Verplanck of Ohe puuring this Lot adjoining the City Hall to establish the ferry at the same place and in the same manner as before."—M. C. G. (1784-1831), I: 475. See Pl. 57. Vol. I. On Sept. 24, the board ordered that the treasurer "pay the hall* due to Mr. Verplanck for the Lot between his House & the City Hall lately purchased of him . . ."—Ibid., I: 486. Cf. Sept. 16.

Samuel Webb writes from New York to J. K. Van Rensselaer: "it gives me great pleasure to find the good people of Columbia are in opinion with us, respecting a change in the Administration, and I have a 't doubt if the Northern Counties exert themselves we shall have the pleasure of hearing Judge Yates announced our Governor,— . . you well know the art and cunning of Clinton and his party, and that they are using every possible exertion for his reelection—we must work double skies to defeat them, in this quarter we have nothing to fear, he is most heartily despised, except by a few Syrens whom, he has put in Office and their dependents,— whose power of Office has been Obedience to their Chief—there is a series of letters now publishing in Childs' daily paper, which are worthy your attention, they have taken up his line of conduct from a period, previous to the commencement of the late War, and will be shut down to the present time, & as those letters will contain a great variety of interesting facts, they will have a just influence, wherever they are read.

"Congress have not yet made a quorum, to open the Votes for President and Vice president, but 'tis daily expected they will be able to proceed on that necessary & important business.—The City is gay and lively, a vast number of strangers with us, and next week or the week after the Theatre will open."—From original in Emmet Coll. No. 2172. For the election, see Ap 6.

In anticipation of Washington's being elected president of the United States, and because he "may be expected in a few weeks," brigade orders are issued for the brigade to prepare to receive him "with every possible demonstration of military respect and honor."—N. Y. Packet, Ap 3, 1789.

In a report to the common council, the "Commissioners appointed to superintend the Building for the accommodation of Congress" state that "their funds are again exhausted and the Building unfinished." They ask that the board "will lodge with the Bank Security for the further Sum of Two thousand pounds in order to enable them to proceed." The report is signed by Alex. Macomb, P. C. L'Enfant, and James Nicholson.—From the original MSS. in "Petition 1790-1792," city clerk's record-room. The report is not entered in the M. C. C. See, however, Je 18.

Federal hall is thus described: "The southern front, towards Broad street, is composed of a plain arched basement, which likewise bounds the east and west sides of the building, and forms a flagged walk for the recreation and convenience of the citizens.

"Over the basement are Tuscan columns, supporting Doric

Pillars, which form a grand balcony with a handsome entablature of stars, &c.

The attic story is composed of ornamented figures, festoons and trophies, crowned with a pediment, on which is a large eagle, surrounded with a glory, appears bursting from a cloud, and carrying around him the arms of South Carolina. A small, though elegant, spire, finishes this division of the edifice.

After entering the building through any part of the arched walls, we come into the first ball, flagged with marble, judiciously laid out, and communicating with several rooms, which we suppose are intended for offices. Passing through the first, we come to a second spacious ball or aera [sic], which runs up through to the roof, and is roofed by a glass cupola, throwing a strong light down on the lobby, which is on the first floor, running quite round this centre aera, and communicating with the senate chamber, saloon, audience, and anti-chambers.

The senate-chamber is about 40 feet square and 15 in height, with convenient fire-places, and is neatly wainscotted; the ceiling [sic] plain, except a sun and thirteen stars in the center. The saloon, audience chamber, &c. are all equally well contrived, as are the stairs, which lead to them and to the two galleries, erected in the representatives' apartment, for spectators.

The representatives' apartment, which is the master piece of the whole, and most entitled [sic] to the name of federal hall, is an oblong room, the ends somewhat octagonal, all 70 by 30 feet. This room comprises two stories, a basement, a principal basement contains four fire places with oval windows placed between each. The principal has 6 large windows, 3 to the east and 3 to the west, with semicircular pediments. Several Ionic columns and pilasters, fluted and otherwise decorated, are properly arranged throughout this room. On the south side, the two galleries, one over the other, for spectators, have a fine effect, and at the north end is the President's chair, with a very large table, projecting into the center of the room, around which are the seats for the 39 representatives. On the wainscot of the north end are several trophies, and other emblematical fancy figures, together with the arms of the United States; but as they are not yet completed, it is not in our power to give an adequate description of them.

The whole composition is most admirably contrived for the purpose for which it is intended. It is an object which indicates, that something more considerable would have been executed, had not the artist been confined to such narrow limits. The style is bold, simple and regular; the parts, few, large and distinct; the transitions sudden, and strongly marked; and we think the whole has an air of grandeur.

Complaint is made of the neglected condition of "the street which leads from Powels-Hook ferry into Broadway" (Cortlandt St.), which is called "the key of the city." It contains filth and rubbish, and pigs going at large are a nuisance. Some people "advocate the destruction of the pigs, by saying that they keep the streets clean." The opinion of the majority is that, as the pigs only serve to scatter the dirt already collected in heaps, the law should be strictly executed."—N. T. Jour., Mr 26, 1789. See also L. M. R. K. III: 942.

Washington writes from Mount Vernon to James Madison:

I have been favored with your Letter of the 17th; by which it appears that a quorum of Congress was barely to be expected until the beginning of the past week—As this delay must be very irksome to the attending Members, and every day continuance of it (before the Government is in operation) will be more sensibly felt;—I am resolved, no interruption shall proceed from me that can well be avoided (after notice of the Election is announced); and therefore take the liberty of requesting the favor of you to cudge lodgings for me previous to my arrival.—Col Humphreys, I presume, will be of my party; and Mr Lear who has already lived three years with me as a private Secretary, will accompany, or precede me in the stage.

On the subject of lodgings I will frankly declare, I mean to go into none but hired ones.—If these cannot be had tolerably convenient I am not very particular, I would take rooms in the most decent Tavern, till a house be provided for the more permanent reception of the President.—I have already declined a very polite & pressing offer from the Governor [Clinton—see Mr 10], to lodge at his house till a place could be prepared for me; after which should any other of a similar nature be made, there would be no propriety in the acceptance.

But as you are fully acquainted with my sentiments on this subject, I shall only add, that as I mean to avoid private families on the one hand, so on another, I am not desirous of being placed early in a situation for entertaining. Therefore hired (private) lodgings would not only be more agreeable to my own wishes, but, possibly, more consistent with the dictates of sound policy.—For, as it is my wish & intention to conform to the public desire and expectation, with respect to the style proper for the Chief Magistrate to live in, it might be well to know (as far as the nature of the case will admit) what are these before he enters upon it.

After all, something may perhaps have been decided upon with respect to the accommodations of the President, before this letter have reached you that may render this application nugatory.— If otherwise, I will sum up all my wishes in one word,—and that is to be placed in an independent situation, with the prospect I have alluded to, before me.—From original in possession of V. H. Pultsits, a photostat of which is in N. Y. P. L. Cf. The Writings of Geo. Washington (Ford ed.), II: 374. (It should be observed that this letter was written a week prior to Washington’s election to the Presidency and two weeks prior to his notification. He had been advised by Hamilton and others of his expected selection, and had very reluctantly decided to make the personal sacrifice necessary to accept the nomination for the good of the Union. See Ap. 6.)

"The matter, however, was by no means settled by the request of Congress to Mr. Osgood to fit up for the President the use the house, No. 3 Cherry Street, which had been used by former Presidents of Congress. This house had been built in 1770 [q.v.] by Walter Franklin, an old merchant in the city, and upon his death had passed into the possession of Mr. Samuel Osgood, who was appointed Post-master General in September, 1789. It stood on the north side of Cherry Street several doors east of the present line of Cobble Hill Square which received its name in March, 1787 [q.v.] in honor of Benjamin Franklin, its former appellation having been St. George’s Square. The house was square, five windows wide, and three stories high, but was neither very spacious nor conveniently situated. . . . The Franklin house was in after years used as a music store and by the Franklin Bank, and was demolished in the summer of 1836, at which time the chair now used by the President of the New York Historical Society was constructed from its materials."—Smith, N. The common council, on examining the applications for “keeping Ferry Boats across the East River” (see Mr 11), decides to license Henry Dawson, Gilbert van Master, John Hicks, and Jacob Wilkins, Jr., to keep two boats each, to ply between the Fly Market and Brooklyn. No one having applied to keep the ferry from Peck’s Ship, the board orders that the advertisement for applicants be continued in the newspapers.—M. G. C. (1784-1831), I: 439.

The common council agrees to the proposal of the committee appointed on Jan. 30 (q. v.) "to report a Plan for disposing of the 1789 Common Lands," which expressed the opinion "that such part of the Common Lands as are unappropriated and laid out into lots by Mr. Goerick, . . . from the southernmost part thereof to lots No. 66 & 67 should be sold at public Vendue . . . at the Coffee House.

Additional notes of the Senate having arrived on March 19, 21, 28, and April 6, a quorum is now present, and is called to order. Their credentials having been read and filed, John Langdon is chosen by ballot "President pro tem.,” for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes of the electors for president and vice-president of the United States. Twelve senators and fifty-seven members of the house of representatives participated in this voting. Washington received the unanimous vote of the electors for president. The vote was scattered among eleven candidates for vice-president, John Adams receiving the largest number, which was thirty-four, and John Jay the next highest number, which was nine. Adams was therefore declared elected. "The "Federal Barge" is launched. It is "between forty and fifty feet long, and moulded upon the finest model."—Gaz. of the U. S., Apr 22, 1789.

About noon, the president's barge, "being entirely completed, and making a most beautiful appearance," started for Elizabeth Town, where it arrived at about four o'clock. From the original MS. in metal file No. 19, city clerk's record-room. Artists who have pictured Washington's arrival and departure in this vessel do not show the mast and sail, these were probably not used on ceremonious occasions.

It is thought advisable to dispense with illuminations on the evening of the arrival of the president, and the citizens are notified that there are to be none. The following is the proposed order of procession, from the place of landing:—1. The Troop of Horse. 2. The Artillery, and the residue of the Legion. 3. The Military Officers, in uniform, who are off duty. 4. The President's Guard. 5. The President, the Governor and their Suites. 6. The principal Officers of State. 7. The Mayor and Corporation. 8. The Clergy. 9. The Citizens."—Daily Adm., Apr 23, 1789.

Contrary to this notification, the common council passes a different resolution: "Whereas this Board have reason to believe that a very great proportion of the Citizens are earnestly desirous to illuminate their Houses on the Evening of the arrival of the President of the United States, as a Testimony of their Joy on that interesting Event; and that Preparations are already made for that purpose. It is therefore recommended to the Citizens to illuminate their Houses from the Hour of seven to nine; . . . that the Bells of the several Churches and other public Buildings commence ringing on the Presidents landing and continue for half an Hour."—M. C. C. (1784-1785), I: 446. At the same time, they issue a warrant to pay Gen. Malcolm £16 "to procure Gun powder for the Militia on the President's arrival in this City."—Ibid.

"The Eagle in the front of the Federal State House is now displayed; the general appearance of this front is truly august."—Gaz. of the U. S., Apr 23, 1789. See F. 6.

President Washington, having left Mount Vernon two days after being notified of his election (see Ap. 14), came North to take up his duties as the first chief magistrate of the United States. He passed through Alexandria, Baltimore, Chester, Philadelphia, and Trenton to Elizabeth Town Point, and was everywhere welcomed with public rejoicing and festivity.—Avery, Hist. of the U. S., VII: 18-19.

On the 25th he is conveyed to New York from Elizabeth Town, amidst the joyful acclamations of every party and every description of citizens." One newspaper account of the event states:

"On this great occasion, the hand of industry was suspended, and the various pleasures of the capital, were concentrated to a single enjoyment.

The President was received at Elizabeth-Town, by a deputation of three Senators, five Representatives, of the Congress of the United States [see Baker, Washington after the Rev., 128], and three officers of the State and Corporation [Chancellor Robt. R. Livingston, Adj.-Gen. Nicholas Fish, Recorder Richard Varick], with whom he embarked in the barge, built for the purpose . . ., and rowed by thirteen pilots of this harbour, dressed in white uniforns; Thomas Randall, Esq. acting as cockswain.

"No language can paint the beautiful display made on his excellency's approach to the city. The shores were crowded with a vast concourse of citizens, waiting with exclaming anxiety his arrival—his Catholic Majesty's Sloop of War the Galviston, (Mr. Dohrman's) ship North Carolina, and the other vessels in port, were dressed and decorated in the most superb manner—his excellency's barge was accompanied by the barge of Hon. Gen. Knox, and a great number of vessels and boats from Jersey and New-York, in his train.—As he passed the Galviston, he received a salute of thirteen guns, and was welcomed by an equal number from the battery.

"The whole water scene was animated and moving beyond description. The grand gala formed an object the most interesting imaginable.

"On his excellency's arrival at the stairs, prepared and ornamented, at Murray's wharf [foot of Wall St.], for his landing: he was received and congratulated by his excellency, the Governor of the State [Geo. Clinton], and the officers of the State and Corporation, and the following procession formed. First Col. Lewis, accompanied by 2 officers, and followed by the troop of dragoons, commanded by Capt. Stakes—The German grenadiers, headed by Capt. Scriba—Music—Infantry of the brigade, under the command of captains Swartwout and Steedsmid—Grenadiers, under Capt.
Harin—Col. Bauman, at the head of the regiment of artillery—music—Gen. M'Leod and aid—Officers of the Militia—Committee of Congress—The President, supported by Governor Clinton & Gentlemen [in Queens (now Pearl St.) opposite Cedar St], with whom his Excellency died.—In the evening the houses of the citizens were brilliantly illuminated.—Daily Adv., Ap 24, 1789. This account is followed closely by the Gent. of the U. S., Ap 25; Penn. Gaz., Ap 29; and N. T. Jour., Ap 10, 1789.

Another newspaper account states that the president arrived at New York about two o'clock, after a trip of two hours up the bay. His barge "was accompanied by a barge containing the Heads of the great departments of the United States, viz. The Honourable the Board of Treasury, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Secretary of War." The Spanish packet ("Galviston") displayed "every flag known to foreign nations." The "North Carolina," belonging to Arnold H. Dohaman, Esq., was similarly decorated.

Boudinot, at whose house in Elizabeth Town Washington took breakfast and met the committee of congress (of whom Boudinot was one), wrote to his wife on April 24 an account of the events of the day. After describing the crossing of Newark Bay, he says: "When we drew near to the Mouth of the Kill, a number of Boats with various Flags came up with us & dropped in our wake. Soon after we got under the Black Ball, Captains Knox & myself, went in a large Barge, presented themselves with the splendid Colours. Boats after Boat & Sloop after Sloop added to our Train gaily dressed in all their naval Ornaments made a most Splendid Appearance—Before we got to Bedler's Island, a large Sloop, came with full Sail on our Starboard Bow when their stood up about 20 Gentlemen & Ladies with most excellent Voices, sung an elegant Ode prepared for the Purpose. The Tune of God save the King, welcoming their great Chief to the Seat of Government—At the conclusion, we gave them our Hats, and then they with the Surrounding Boats gave us three Cheers.

"Soon after another Boat, came under our Stern & presented us with a number of Copies of another Ode, and immediately about a dozen Gent's began to sing it in parts as we passed along—Our worthy President was greatly affected with these tokens of profound respect—As we approached the Harbour, our Train increased & the Huizinga and Shouts of Joy seemed to add Life to this lively Scene—At this Moment a number of Porpoises came playing amongst us, as if they had risen up to know what was the Cause of all this Joy—We now discovered the Shores crowded with thousands of Ladies & Majors—Men & Women as far as the Eyes could see—Ten of thousands; from the fort to the Place of Landing altho' near half a Mile, you could see little else along the Shores, in the Streets and on Board every Vessel, but Heads standing as thick as Ears of Corn before the Harvest—The vessels in the Harbour made a most superb appearance indeed, dressed in all the Pomp of attire. The Spanish Packet in a moment, on a Signal given discovered 27 or 28 different Colors of all Nations, on every part of the Rigging and paid us the Compliment of 23 Guns with her yards all Manned—as did another Vessel in the Harbour, displaying Colors in the same Manner.

"I had omitted the like Compliment from the Battery of 18 Pounders—we soon arrived at the Ferry Stairs, where there were many thousands of the Citizens waiting with all the eagerness of Expectation, to welcome our Excellent Patriot to that Shore, which he had regained from a Powerful Enemy by his Valour & good Conduct—we found the Stairs covered with Carpeting & the Rails hung with Crimson—the President being preceded by the Committee was received by the Governor & the Citizens in the most brilliant Manner—Here he was met on the wharf with many of his old & faithful officers & fellow Patriots who had borne the Heat & Burthen of the Day with him, and who like him had experienced every reverse of Fortune with fortitude & Patience, and who now joined the universal Chorus of welcoming their great deliverer, (under Providence) from all their fears.

"It was with difficulty a Passage could be made by the Troops thro the pressing Crowds, who seemed to be incapable of being Satisfied by gazing at this Man of the People—you will see the particulars of the Procession from the Wharf to the House appointed for his residence in the News Papers—The streets were lined with the Inhabitants as thick as the People could stand, and it required all the Exertions of a numerous Train of City officers with their Staves, to make a Passage for the Company—The Houses were filled with Gentlemen & Ladies the whole distance, being about half a Mile, and the Windows to the highest stories, were illuminated by the sparkling Eyes of innumerable Companies of Ladies, who seemed to vie with each other to show their Joy on this great Occasion.

"It was half an hour before we could finish our Commission and convey the President to the house prepared for his residence. As soon as this was done, notwithstanding his great Fatigue of both Body & Mind, he had to receive all the Gentlemen & Officers to a very large amount, who wished to show their Respect in the most affectionate manner.—When this was finished & the People dispersed, we went undressed, and dined with his Excellency Governor Clinton, who had provided an elegant Dinner for the Purpose—"This Ended our Commission. The Evening, tho' very wet was spent by all ranks in visiting the City, Street after Street, being illuminated in a superb Manner.—I cannot help stating now how highly we were pleased with the weather, as the Rain that had been completely finished & we had repaired to the Governors before it began to rain.—When the President was on the wharf an officer came up & addressing the President said, he had honor to command his Guard and it was ready to obey his orders. The President answered that as to the present Arrangement, he should proceed as was directed but, that after that was over, he hoped he would give him the honor of a trip in his own boat among his fellow Citizens (turning to the crowd) was all the Guard he wanted."—Bowen, Hist. of the Centennial of the Inauguration of Geo. Washing, 28-30, citing the original letter in the possession of Boudinot's grand nephew, Mr. E. Boudinot Colt, of Short Hills, N. J. The letter is also reproduced in the same history (by Clarence Winthrop Bowen), as first published in The Geni. Mag., Ap, 1889, so see Emett Coll., No. 3.

Dr. James Lloyd Cogswell, one of the spectators who witnessed Washington's arrival, wrote a description of the event, saying: "... The Geo.'s barge had an awning hung around with red morun curtains, festooned. It was attended with the New Haven and Rhode Island packets, and a number of boats and barges decorated in the most beautiful manner. From the Battery to the Coffee House, where the Geo.'s landed, the ships, docks, and houses were crowded with people as thick as they could stand. The guns of the Battery were fired as soon as the General passed, and all the people upon the battery gave three cheers. The cheers were continued along from the battery unto the place of landing, as the barge passed. I was on board Captain Woolsey's ship, which lies in the bay, and had the honor of hospitality from his highness. Another officer of the King's said he felt the success motion of the hats from the Battery to the Coffee House was like the rolling motion of the sea, or a field of grain waving with the wind when the sun is frequently intercepted with a cloud.
